Passing from the subject of juries, Mr. Thurman spoke of the subject of elections, and their freedom from political interference, and the necessity and justice of repealing the present laws, which were instrumentalities of corruption and fraud.

These laws were pretended, when passed, to be for the protection of freedmen in the South against Ku-Klux, but their real object was to oppress voters in the North, and especially to disfranchise, imprison, and persecute naturalized citizens of the North. The Almighty Father, said Mr. Thurman, had given him a capacity to feel, for which he was truly grateful, though he was sometimes inconvenienced by it. His indignation sometimes made him forget that he was weak and ought not to give way to his feelings too much. In speaking of the election laws there came to him a picture of their operation in New York city, of a cage full of men sweltering and suffering under the arbitrary and dictatorial mode of a corrupt and contemptible Commissioner of Elections, and he could not suppress the thought that a transaction had taken place in this country that could not have occurred in any other civilized country without blood being shed. But he proposed to speak dryly to-day, hoping thus to make a better legal argument than if he exhibited feeling.

Even if constitutional they should be repealed, but he denied their constitutionality. Certain Senators had nothing but a sneer for anyone who cited the constitution, and the Senator from Minnesota (Windom) had said the Democrats objected to the constitutionality of something "as usual," intimating that it was a part of their stock in trade to cry "unconstitutional." It would be a sad day for this country when objection to a measure on constitutional grounds could be put down with a sneer. Those election laws provide, among other things, that any person who, by the law of any State, is required to perform some act in order to entitle him to vote shall, if he offer to perform that act and his offer be rejected on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, have a right to vote, notwithstanding the refusal of the proper officer to allow him to perform the act. Section 2,004 was merely a repetition of the Fifteenth amendment to the constitution, and, therefore, not objectionable; but section 2,005 provides for offering to citizens facilities to fulfill the prerequisites to voting required by the State laws, and section 2,006 imposes penalties upon officers refusing to provide such facilities. Section 2,007 makes an offer to fulfill any prerequisite to voting equivalent to its performance, and section 2,008 imposes fines on the judges of elections who refuse to receive the votes cast under the preceding section. These sections are in execution of the Fifteenth amendment, but they are so comprehensive that they include all citizens, free-born as well as those who have been slaves, and they apply to all local as well as general elections. Where is the constitutional warrant for the enactment of these laws? Two provisions have been cited as warranting it in that very remarkable document, veto No. 1, which we lately had the honor to receive from his Excellency, the President, and he is about equally unfortunate in his reference to law in veto No. 2. First, he cites article 1, section 4, of the constitution. The Fifteenth amendment does not support these statutes. But the statutes go further, and undertake to regulate the right of every citizen to vote, no matter what his color or what his previous condition. The Supreme Court has decided that these provisions are unconstitutional; that the Fifteenth amendment confers no right upon any man to vote, but guarantees those otherwise qualified against discrimination of any sort against voters. There is abundant provision in these sections to prevent men from voting, but not for their protection, and ample provision for blackguard Deputy Marshals drawn from the lowest portions of New York and Philadelphia. There is power for them to arrest without warrant the most peaceful and respectable citizen who offers to vote and bring him before a United States Commissioner. They can tear the State justice from his seat, when he is executing the State laws. It is not a law to secure, but to prevent, the right to vote. Article 1, section 4, of the constitution gives Congress power to regulate the times, places and manner of holding elections for Representatives. The laws sought to be repealed have nothing to do with the times and places. Therefore the only present application of that article lies in the word "manner." The student of this subject will observe that the present object of this constitutional provision is to enable the Federal Government to preserve its existence.

Mr. Thurman maintained that the laws now sought to be repealed were not a constitutional exercise of power to regulate elections; for it is fundamental that Congress cannot, under article 1, section 4, interfere in any manner with the election of State officers, and any regulation for Congressional elections enacted by Congress must be so framed as not to interfere. No legal proposition was ever clearer to him than that. He proceeded to show that under the existing law persons prevented from voting for Congressmen or for Presidential electors were at the same time prevented from voting for local and State officers. Article 1, section 4, would never have been adopted if our fathers had foreseen the uses to which it would be put. But, even if these laws were constitutional, they ought to be repealed, for, instead of being in the in the interest of pure and honest elections, the mind of man never devised a worse instrument of fraud, corruption and oppression than these laws. When they were passed there were only eight Democrats here, and they were powerless to prevent their adoption.

Mr. Conkling asked if it were possible that eight men would have made so much noise as was made on that occasion.

Mr. Thurman said those eight men were inspired. They stood up for the constitution and for honest elections, and naturally made a noise and something besides noise. It was argument and that argument had its effect. It has filled these seats and increased the number of Democrats from seven, as when he first came here, until they spread out and reached over into the promised land. He did not believe at that time that these laws were passed to protect the freedmen, and history has shown his incredulity to be well founded. They originated in the city of New York, in the Union League Club, a partisan, political club. He read from the report of the Committee of Expenditures in the Department of Justice of the Forty-Fourth Congress the testimony of Samuel J. Glasson before that committee, which showed him to have been chief counsel employed by that club to get up these laws, and, therefore, he will be acknowledged, by the other side of the Senate at least, as a respectable man. He was assisted by a man not so respectable, and who has become quite historical, one John I. Davenport. Thurman read from the testimony at length, showing what measures the Union League Club took to procure the passage of those laws, and the connection of Davenport therewith. When the laws were first proposed, they contained many provisions not ultimately passed. As first proposed, they almost disfranchised every naturalized citizen in the United States; made it almost impossible to be naturalized, and gave no naturalized citizen security in his right to vote. Mr. Thurman called Senator Morton's attention to these provisions, and said: "Morton, you cannot support those sections." He said, after examining them, "Certainly I cannot," and he used his influence against them, and so they were defeated. The laws originated in the Union League Club, and were passed for party purposes, and not at all for the protection of the freedmen. He would cite some figures to support his assertions. In 1876 there were 4,863 Supervisors of Election appointed under these laws, of which 1,779 were appointed in the State of New York, nearly one-half of the whole number. There were 11,610 Marshals, more than one-fourth of them in New York. The main point is, where did the money go? In that year there was expended $285,931. How much was expended to protect poor freedmen down in the country where the night-rider, the White Leaguer and the Ku-Klux oppose him? In the ten Southern States there was expended $48,719, and in the other States $237,250 was disbursed. That is to say, about one-sixth of the money went to the South, and five-sixth to the North. That is the way the freedman was protected. They made the South give the negro a right to vote, but, when it came to using the money of the United States, for every dollar they gave to protect him they spent $5 to corrupt elections at the North, and to deprive men of their right to vote there. The Senator from New York (Conkling) had carefully enumerated the different varieties of thugs, shoulder-hitters and roughs which formed a part of his constituency. If New York city were raked from Harlem to the Battery there could not be found in it a worse set of men than the Deputy Marshals selected in 1876 and 1878 to execute these laws. Of the $237,250 spent in the North in 1876, $156,000, being more than one-half, was sent to New York State. The roughs of adjacent States did not like to see their brethren in New York getting all the money, so, to pacify them, some was sent out of that State. Thirty-seven thousand dollars went to Pennsylvania. That was enough because the local managers of the machine in Philadelphia knew how to manage elections perfectly, and did not need any help from Federal Supervisors to secure the election of Republicans. But $37,000 was spent in Pennsylvania to satisfy the clamor of the roughs. Then they paid some attention to Baltimore and sent $12,000 to Maryland. Jersey City was a pretty important town and got $12,276—not much, but it helped to pacify the brethren. So these four States, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Maryland, absorbed $217,000 of the $285,000, leaving $68,000 for the other thirty States. In 1878 there were 4,881 Supervisors, of which 1,953 were in New York, and 1,862 in Pennsylvania, leaving only 1,066 for all the other States. Of the 4,725 Marshals more than half were in New York. The expenditures were $222,714, of which only $18,341 went South. The gains of the Republican party in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania will show why this money was spent in the North. In one single election, fourteen Representatives were gained, and, singularly enough, the greatest gain was where the most money was spent. Mr. Thurman said there was evidence that this money was spent corruptly. In selecting Deputy Marshals persons thought to be purchasable were sent for and asked if they would work for the Republican candidate, and upon promising to do, so they were appointed Deputies. In this manner large Democratic majorities were destroyed in certain districts. If the Democrats were to obtain power on March 4, 1881, and there was such a blessing as a Democratic President, the Republicans would clamor for the repeal of these laws more loudly than they cry now against it. They would not trust such power over the public purse and officers with a Democratic President. Another ox would be gored then.

Mr. Thurman said it would surprise some to learn how Davenport had feathered his own nest. Without speaking of 8,000 affidavits at 10 cents each which he made out against the people for false registration six months before they offered to register, he would refer to other evidences of his corruption, because it was right that this man should be held up to eternal infamy. He showed how $34,000 of the secret-service fund got into Davenport's hands and was never accounted for to the Government. He hated to deal with such a fellow, but he was the most potential man in the country. A former Doorkeeper had jokingly said of himself that he was a "bigger man than old Grant," but this man is a bigger man than half a dozen such Presidents as we have now in controlling elections. He meant no disrespect to the President. He could not turn up his nose with Senatorial dignity and ignore this man. It was not a pismire under his foot, but an elephant. He read testimony showing Davenport's acquisition of wealth since his appointment to office, and said Johnnie prospers and is a fruitful tree, though the fruit is of a very bad kind. He had intended to say something about the Army bill and the veto, though he preferred to stick to his text. In his judgment there was never so inexcusable an exercise of the veto power as in the vetoes lately sent to them. It is the first time a President has vetoed an appropriation bill and the first time a bill has been vetoed because it repealed existing laws. The veto power was intended as a check upon unconstitutional, hasty, and ill-considered legislation, or to enable the Executive Department to defend itself from encroachment by the Legislative Department. It is also the first time a President in a message has quoted the remarks of Senators and Representatives in Congress to impute to them improper motives. He enlarged upon the impropriety of such allusions. There were other strange things about the messages. In the first message the President was understood as saying troops could not be used at elections under the laws; but in the second he tells us that the Government might be overthrown if the military could not be used on election days. Was there ever so thoroughly shallow—he would not say contemptible—but so transparent a sophistry as this?

In conclusion, Mr. Thurman said he had never been more pained than by the course of debate in opposition to this bill. It had been made the occasion of reviving sectional hatred. He appealed to every candid man to say if the course of the Democratic party, and especially of the Southern members, warranted such censure. The Southern States are an integral part of the Union, and their citizens are as much interested as any in its welfare and as fully entitled as any to try to promote that welfare according to their convictions. If such appeals resulted in making the North solid to rule forever over the other section he would despair of there ever being a real Union in this country. He warned the man engaged in this attempt to create sectionalism that sectionalism might in the future be drawn by other lines than those of Mason and Dixon's. It might take other shapes, and they who now are most anxious to promote it and to govern by a solid North may find that there is another solidarity that will govern them.

GOV. SEYMOUR.

His Views of the Situation at the Federal Capital—The Democratic Party United as One Man.

[From an Interview in the Chicago Times.]

I asked Gov. Seymour: "What in your opinion will be the effect of President Hayes' veto of the Army Interference bill?"

The Governor said: "It will unite the Democratic party and lift it out of the troubles springing from the differences of opinion about candidates and finances. The Democrats of all shades and sections will be of one mind about military interference at elections."

Correspondent—"How far will the President's message help his position?"

Governor—"The country will look at the attitude and not at the language of the President. It is now clear that Hayes is not willing to give up the power of the sword in politics. There is a difference of opinion about the strength of parties, but, assuming that they are about equal, how does the case stand? The Republicans have an army of 100,000 officeholders and the army engaged on the public buildings and works. They have the power of collecting and paying out the vast revenues of the country. The courts are filled with Judges of their selection and faith, and their Marshals and other officers can harass innocent persons and control the votes of those who are charged with wrong-doing. They demand the army also. The pretext that the plan to take the army out of politics by a rider upon an appropriation bill was improper is now their only defense. Is this a fair or safe state of things? Mr. Hayes says he is opposed to the use of the army at the polls, but he brings out no plan to carry out his avowed views. He simply cavils at the bills of Congress. His veto makes the issue of the next Presidential canvass. It unites the Democratic party upon a grave question. There is a deep feeling on this subject in the North as well as the South. Repeated attempts have been made to overawe the voters of New York. The first was in 1864. The Republicans cry out against the ways of Gen. Butler in Massachusetts, but they thought he was the man to put at the head of the army over the elections in New York. I issued an order to Sheriffs and the police that no soldiers should be allowed to show themselves at a single poll, and that against any interference they should put forth the full force of the law and call out the power of the districts. The election passed off quietly, as no soldiers showed themselves at the place of voting. The advocates of military interference are the most violent partisans and those who seek to keep up sectional hate. They are the men of whom it has been well said that they are full of fight now because they did not fight when they had a chance. The Senator who first called for blood-letting in 1861 was the first to run away from the field when blood was flowing. He now grows fierce again. I do not think it is true, as has been charged, that he broke the lines of our troops by his retreat, but it is certain that his anxiety to save his own blood did not encourage our soldiers in the fight. I do not think the country will follow the lead of those who stir up strife which others are to fight out, maybe, at the cost of their lives. The Democrats will feel as one man on the new issue. They see that it means that fraud is to be upheld at the polls."

Cor.—"Do you not think that this question should be put before the President and the people upon its merits?"

Gov.—"I think it will be wise to pass a bill that would put this question to the President distinctly on its merits, so that there would be no room for the pretext that other things than its merits were to be considered. If it is true, as the President says, that he does not wish to have the military interfere, let him frame a bill that will reach that end."

THEY WANTED TO KNOW.

How a New Haven Man Won a Small Bet.

[From the New Haven Register.]

A gentleman passing by an unattractive show window the other day stopped and began looking at an old-fashioned square clock exhibited for sale (price $1.75). It so closely resembled the timepiece that he had so many times gazed upon with affection in his old home, that he began to examine it, musing meanwhile on the many scenes of his boyhood days that would come back to his memory. He seemed so absorbed in what was before him that another gentleman passing thought he would take a look, and likewise came to a standstill in front of the window; an old woman, going by with a basket, had her feminine curiosity aroused, and, partly to rest, sat down her burden, and, adjusting her shawl, turned her eyes in the direction of the big square clock; a couple of small boys, rolling hoop, next stopped to see what was going on; and all the time the nucleus of the gathering was undoubtedly ruminating on the happy past, unconscious of his surroundings. In about five minutes a crowd of twenty-five people from the different walks of life had halted before that same window, all eagerly stretching their necks to get a peep at what was the central object of view. The crowd grew larger each succeeding minute, and the man inside rushed down to the back of the store to black his boots and smooth down his hair, in anticipation of a big rush of trade; and the original cause of the commotion was still revolving in his mind the joys of his boyhood, utterly oblivious of the rapidly gathering multitude, who by this time had begun to push and crowd each other, in order to see what was the matter. In a moment more the clerks in the various stores near by had started on a dead run for the spot, and, the fever spreading, 500 or more, men, women and children, all broke into a canter, bound to reach the scene of disaster in time to get a good seat. Every team that came down that street reined up, and in less time than it takes to tell it the street and sidewalks were one surging mass of humanity, horses and wagons, yelling, swearing and fighting, and the first man that stopped was still indulging in reminiscences of the days of his pastoral simplicity. Just then a policeman strolled in sight, and, noticing something a little unusual, became a little nervous and somewhat mixed, pulled the fire-alarm hastily, and another guardian of the peace down the other corner of the block let drive in the same way, pulling in an alarm from another box. Whang, whang, whang, went the fire-bell, box 4-11-44, and every other cancelvable number. The Fire Department started out in three different directions, with the entire town at its heels, yelling, "Where's the fire?" and the black smoke from the steamers, and the rumbling of the heavy wheels, with the gongs and bells of the hose-carriages and hook-and-ladder trucks, made up a bedlamatic compound of rackets that would have awakened the dead, if it were possible; but the man that was the prime cause of all the hubbub had his eyes fixed unmovedly on the object that first attracted his attention, apparently dreaming of the golden days of the past. After a time the confusion came to an end, and he walked off, having won a bet of $5 that he could stand still and draw a bigger crowd than any walking-match in the country.

The Raid on the Indian Territory.

The "evil-disposed persons" whom a proclamation by the President forbids to carry out their plan of settling Indian Territory were bands of emigrants, said to number 10,000 altogether, which have been secretly formed at Baltimore, Philadelphia, Cincinnati and St. Louis. The fertile lands of the Territory have long excited the cupidity of speculators, who have claimed that 2,000,000 of the 14,000,000 acres the Government bought of the Indians in 1866 were open to white settlers, because they have never been divided among the Indian tribes and probably never will be. It was held that these 2,000,000 acres were part of the public domain, and might be taken up like other Government land. Certain schemers at Washington secretly corresponded with emigrant societies in the larger cities, scattering maps of the land that might be taken up. One of these maps found its way to Secretary Schurz, and, learning the scope of the undertaking from the prospectus on the margin, he called the question up in a Cabinet meeting. The proclamation is just in time to nip the enterprise in the bud, for the Fourth of July had been set as the time when the emigrants were to leave the different cities for their destination. Notwithstanding the proclamation, however, from fifty to 200 persons are leaving Independence and Coffeyville, Kan., daily for Indian Territory, and as they are the same class of men as those who invaded the Black Hills in 1875, and are led by Col. Carpenter, the leader of the Black Hills gold-seekers, bloodshed is feared. There are 1,000 soldiers within easy access, and Gen. Sheridan has been imperatively ordered to prevent the invasion of the Territory by the whites, and to remove, without parley, delay or argument, all trespassers upon its soil.—Springfield Republican.

McKinstry's Great Orchard.

The largest orchard in the world is doubtless that owned and worked very successfully by Mr. Robert McKinstry, of Hudson, Columbia county, N. Y. The orchard is situated on the east bank of the Hudson river, on high, rolling table land, and contains more than 24,000 apple trees, 1,700 pears, 4,000 cherries, 500 peaches, 100 plums, 200 crabs, 1,500 vines, 6,900 currants, and 200 chestnuts.

The orchards are remarkably thrifty, and the oldest trees are about 20 years old. The soil is dry, rolling gravel, with some limestone; the trees are planted twenty feet apart, and do not by any means seem to be crowded. The ground is plowed several times in the year and kept fallow; except when thought advisable it is seeded to clover. The orchard is intersected by roads over six miles in length for the passage of wagons, and is bounded by a continuous row of apple trees set ten feet apart for four miles and a half. The apple crop of last year is 30,000 barrels. Twenty-four men and fourteen horses are employed hauling out the crop or in plowing.

The success of this orchard has not been achieved, nor is it maintained, without the closest supervision and most industrious work. Suckers and sprouts are removed as soon as seen; the borers are watched and followed with vigor. Wires are used to reach them in their burrows, and the damaged bark is removed with chisels. As trees fall, others are planted in their places.—Rural Home.

INDIANA ITEMS.

THE State Eclectic Medical Society was in session last week at the capital.

THE enumeration of school children in Indianapolis for 1879 shows 26,245, 1,233 more than last year.

ASBURY UNIVERSITY will graduate twenty-nine students this year. Commencement day is June 18.

J. M. TYLER, merchant, of Plainfield, has failed. Liabilities, over $6,000; assets, not more than $3,000.

A FULL-GROWN lynx was shot and killed three miles west of Rushville, by a farmer named Thomas Walker.

TWENTY-EIGHT employes of the Ohio and Mississippi machine-shops at Vincennes have been discharged for want of work.

THE State Treasurer has transferred $100,000 from the general fund to the credit of the State House fund to meet the demands of the work now in progress.

THE town of Jonesville, Bartholomew county, had a narrow escape from destruction by fire a few days since. At one time twelve buildings were on fire, yet only about $900 damage was done.

WE are informed that the Buffalo gnats have killed over fifty head of horses and mules recently, in Columbia township, this county. Such a thing was never known before in this section. —Princeton (Gibson county) Democrat

THERE is still a great deal of excitement over the gold discoveries on Bear creek, in Brown county. Despite the dictum of the geologists considerable dust has been found there, and there is talk of a stock company to work the placers.

THE wife of David Stoops, living twelve miles from Wabash, was fatally burned while lighting a fire with coal oil. The unfortunate woman was enceinte, and within a month of her confinement. The child was born alive after her death.

TWO HUNDRED members of the Blue Ribbon Club met in State Convention at Indianapolis, last week, and discussed the present phase of the temperance question in this State, and what should be the future attitude of the temperance people.

THERE is on exhibition at the Union office in Danville a flexible stone brought from North Carolina. It is fourteen inches long, and inch wide and half an inch thick, an can be bent or stretched. It is white and hard like marble. Since it was placed on exhibition the six-legged cow, which gives four-legged milk, has ceased to attract visitors from Danville to Clayton.

DELEGATES from Knox, Pike and Gibson counties met in Vincennes for the purpose of making arrangements for holding a reunion for the survivors of the Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers, which it was decided to hold in that city Oct. 7 and 8. The reunion was held in Princeton last fall, and was attended by 20,000 people, among them the most prominent soldiers in the country.

THE Grand Jury have returned an indictment against Mrs. Louisa Parrott, Joe Greer and Willard Brown, for the murder of their father, Wash Brown, at Martinsville, Jan. 27. The parties were remanded to jail without further examination. Willard Brown turned State's evidence and testified before the Grand Jury to having been one of the parties engaged in the murder of his father.

WHILE two men, Harry Milleson and T. S. Milleson was horribly mangled and has since died. Baldwin, in some mysterious way, escaped with but a slight bruise. Milleson's father lives in Indianapolis. Over 500 people witnessed the accident.

TIPTON Times: Over in Windfall recently a man and his wife got to that point of disagreement so graphically described in "Betsey and I Are Out." They decided to separate, and the assets of the partnership were divided up until only the baby was left, when the father said: "If you will leave the baby with me I will give you a good cow." The mother considered a moment, and decided that a good cow was worth $25, and a baby—well, pretty poor property. So she took the cow.

THE commission consisting of Representatives Works and Sleeth and Senator Hutstiner, appointed by the last Legislature to investigate the Attorney General's office during the administrations of J. C. Denny and C. A. Buskirk, have finished the examination of the accounts of Denny. In their report to the Governor they state that, according to Denny's own construction of the law, he is in default to the State about $30,000 on collections made during his term of office. About $14,000 of this amount is due on claims collected from the counties and the remainder in claims collected against the General Government. They find that a large amount of money which Denny in his reports had stated had been turned over to the State had not been so paid. The commission will next proceed to investigate the accounts of ex-Attorney General Buskirk.

THE MOVEMENT WESTWARD.

The Unprecedented Rush of Immigration, and Its Effect on Eastern States and Markets Beyond the Sea.

[From the New York Times.]

The westward flow of population still continues apparently unabated. Reasoning on the basis of experience it has been assumed that with the return of brighter prospects the movements from the older States to newer States and Territories would decline. Such movements, on a large scale, have almost uniformly been among the consequences of hard times. On the return of prosperity, they have as uniformly returned to their normal proportions. Their continuance now must, therefore, be accepted as a proof, either that the signs of improvement which are discernible in the world of business have not been recognized by the migrating classes, or that, as a result of exceptional circumstances, the forces in operation have acquired a momentum not easily checked.

Whatever the explanation, the fact is beyond dispute. Western reports contain abundance of a renewal of the stream which severe weather for a time arrested. Inclement as the weather still is, it no longer retards the rush of people in quest of new homes. Additional passenger trains are found necessary at Chicago, and the routes which these trains are intended to serve indicate with tolerable accuracy the direction in which the spring pressure is already felt. Nebraska, Kansas, and Colorado supply the greater number of objective points. From all the railroad centers west of the Mississippi the statements are identical. Trains are crowded. On the highways teams are as plentiful as though railroads were not running. Things are not quite so far advanced in Minnesota and Dakota, but from both the information received gives assurance that the same condition of things will be experienced there. The proportion of foreign element in the movement, so far as it has been developed, is comparatively small. Immigration is reviving, as the arrivals at Castle Garden show, but not with the degree of strength which might be inferred from the general facts reported from the West. Indeed, the movement which challenges attention represents migration rather than immigration—the migration of Americans or of foreign-born settlers who have been more or less Americanized. They go to stay. And their greater aptitude for life in a new region renders more certain the industrial results of the expanding area of settlement.

Looking at the area now regarded as available for the formation of new homes, one finds good reason for distrusting dogmatic attempts to define the precise limits within which profitable settlement is possible. The Land Department of the Union Pacific railroad could tell a curious tale respecting the change that has occurred in the value of land under the Congressional grant. At first, much the larger portion of the grant was supposed to be unfit for any form of agriculture; beyond the valleys of the eastern end, the land was described as worthless. Actual settlement has overthrown the prejudice which the reiteration of this opinion created. Herds of cattle now range where, as we are told, no living thing could find sustenance. Settlements thrive where great authorities placed a desert. More recently the same lesson has been taught very emphatically on the line of the Northern Pacific. Gen. Hazen, professing to speak from observation, would have had the country resent as madness the disposition to hope for local traffic west of the Red river. The strip of "bad lands" which begins in the British Possessions and extends to Texas is, according to Gen. Hazen, wide enough to take in the principal part of Dakota, not a little of Nebraska, and so on downward. Vast grain farms now yield rich rewards to the enterprise and industry that have opened them, where he would have us suppose a blade of grass could not grow. For a hundred miles west of Red river, on the Northern Pacific, wheat is profitably raised on a scale that is without parallell, and the area of cultivation rapidly extends toward the Missouri. As far as Bismarck, in fact, fine arable land is obtainable, as the march of settlement and the cultivation of crops prove; while beyond the Missouri, for a hundred miles or more, preparations for settlement are going on, based upon the extension of the railroad. And the prejudice against climate has been destroyed as effectually as the prejudice against the land. What we witness in Northern Dakota has its counterpart in the Canadian provinces still further north. Migration and immigration go on there at a rate scarcely less remarkable than that which distinguishes the rapid development of our own West, from Dakota to Kansas. If it maintains its ratio of growth, the day is not far distant when Kansas will be the Empire State of trans-Mississippi country.

It is not easy to estimate the effect which these enormous additions to the grain-producing and cattle-raising areas of the West will have upon the character of farming in the Middle and Eastern States and the market beyond the sea. The depressed condition of English agriculture has given rise to a discussion of the probable future; and, in the statement of the problem, American competition plays an important part. Assuming that American wheat can be sold in Liverpool for $1.25 per bushel, the case of the English wheat-grower is pronounced hopeless. As a matter of fact, however, wheat can be profitably grown in the Red river valley at a figure which would admit of its delivery in Liverpool at $1 per bushel. With more reasonable charges for transportation, and with the cheaper rates which will ultimately be available, it might be sold for 90 cents. Deduct from this figure the cost of the ocean freight, and we have a general idea of the influence which Western development must have upon American farming in the older States. Gradually they will give up the wheat-growing. The new forces which the present phases of development imply will also be potent when the time comes for legislative action in regard to railroads and the general question of transportation.

The time is coming when Tilden's Indiana blowers will be compelled to strike at Hendricks, a la Waterson, or give up the "barrel." The little old man is getting desperate.

The gross earnings of the Pittsburgh Ft. Wayne & Chicago railroad for the year 1878, were $7,830,109, nearly one half of which was profit. The net earnings were $3,689-196.

John Sherman was recently elected a director of the Pittsburgh Ft. Wayne & Chicago railroad. He is now playing second fiddle with Tom Scott. Tom will probably favor John for the presidency.

If Henri Waterson, of the Louisville Courier-Journal, takes another tilt at Hendricks, it will require at least 100,000 unarmed Kentuckians to nominate Little Sammy—the man who toots through Henri's bugle.

Hon. W. S. Holman declines to be a candidate for governor of Indiana. His friends will urge his nomination for congress, in view of his valuable services in that capacity in times gone by. If nominated he will surely be elected.

General Grant opened his mouth down in China, and made a little speech in favor of Chinese immigration. It is feared now by the stalwarts, that it will not be advisable for Grant to land in California. It is possible that he might be received with a greater "boom" on the Canada side of the United States.

Geo. Hazzard landed in Auburn last Saturday evening. He landed in jail a few moments afterward where he remained until yesterday. He pleaded poverty and asked the court to appoint an attorney to defend him; failing in this he pleaded his own case. He gave bond with his usual ability. He is unworthy of further notice.

An enterprising Bostonian offers Jeff Davis $400 per night, to deliver a series of lectures throughout the north. It is not stated whether he is to appear before his audience en petticoat or not. Should the proposition be accepted, the northern people will have an opportunity to pay Jefferson back, for the part he took in the late unpleasantness—at the rate of $1.00 or $1.50 a head.

Gene Girardot, a little boy about 8 years old, had a tussle with a cow, last Tuesday morning, in which Gene came out second best. He was on his way from school, when the cow attacked him and tumbled him around somewhat promiscuously until some of his companions brought some club influence to bear on her cowship and she withdrew. The cow belonged to Hank Ford, and she was uninjured in the fray; the boy belonged to Mr. Girardot, and was scared out of about six years growth. Only this and nothing more.

Angola Republican.—"Just before the court adjourned the jurymen met and adopted resolutions complimentary to the court officers for the kindness with which they had been treated during their sojourn here. The compliment paid to Judge McClellan was particularly deserved. There were no unpleasant hitches in business, and every thing was attended to promptly and in order."

From the same paper, we clip two of the resolutions referred to, which are as follows:

Resolved:—That we, the Jurors, tender our sincere thanks to the Court and its Officers for the kind treatment received from them while in the performance of our duties.

Resolved:—That our especial thanks are due the court for promptness in placing before us the testimony in each case, avoiding unnecessary delays, which are always tiresome to Jurors.

He Means It.

Some time since Hon. T. A. Hendricks intimated to a representative of the New York World, that he would not accept the second place on the presidential ticket of 1880 with Mr. Tilden. To this statement many Tilden organs took exceptions, urging that Hendricks had no right to decline to serve his party, and that public sentiment would compel him to yield to the demands of the democratic national convention. This attempt to compel Mr. Hendricks to sacrifice personal honor, that Tilden may receive the benefits, has resulted in a positive refusal on the part of Mr. Hendricks to accept the place named, as the following extract from a recent interview plainly indicates. Mr. Hendricks said:

"I do not propose to be a candidate for vice-president with any one, and have declared this publicly, and so far as I am concerned, the old ticket will not be in the field."

This ought to satisfy Tilden enthusiasts that Mr. Hendricks means what he says; and in our opinion he deserves great credit for the decided stand he has taken. A large majority of Indiana democrats are opposed to a renomination of Tilden, and the stand taken by Mr. Hendricks will be endorsed by the same majority. Without the consent of Mr. Hendricks to take the second place, Tilden cannot be nominated, for which the democracy of the country ought to be truly thankful. Tilden may stand aside; candidates from the west will be in demand by the next convention.

Secretary Sherman says the movement to start him as a candidate for governor of Ohio, was merely sensational; that while he does not doubt that he could be elected to that position, he feels that it would be a desertion of public duty, (that is, duty to bond holders) and would be clearly wrong for him to entertain such a proposition. He closes his letter, recently written to a prominent New Yorker, with a suggestion as to what he would aspire to, in case public opinion should decide to make him a candidate for president; among other things he says "his general ideas would lead him to lean greatly upon the war democrats and soldiers in the service, who have been influenced by political events since the war to withhold their support from the republican party." It is not very probable that "war democrats," or any other democrats, would allow a tarred stick to lean upon them with very great force.

A Very Valuable History.

The Pictorial History of the world, embracing full and authentic accounts of every nation of ancient and modern times, and including a history of the rise and fall of the Greek and Roman Empires, the growth of the nations of Modern Europe, the Middle Ages, the Crusades, the Feudal System, the Reformation, the discovery and settlement of the New World, etc., etc., by James D. McCabe. Published by The National Publishing Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., Chicago, Ill., St. Louis, Mo.

It is a well-known fact that the great mass of the people are compelled to rely, for their knowledge of history, upon the outline works intended for the use of schools, which by their very nature are brief and only designed for the comprehension of children. There has long been felt a genuine want of a more elaborate history of the world, covering the whole period from the creation to the present day, and presenting in a succinct and entertaining form the history of the various nations of the world. This demand we are happy to say is being met in "The Pictorial History of the World," a work which is destined to take rank as a Standard History. It is from the pen of James D. McCabe, a well-known historical writer, who has devoted years of study and research to the production of this great work. The history of each country is related separately, and in the clearest and most comprehensive manner, and the deeds of all the great actors in the events of ancient and modern history are brought before the reader in the most vivid style. Ancient history is related in full, and the accounts of the Middle Ages, the Crusades, and the great nations of modern times, are equally complete and interesting. There is not a dry page in the book. It is as fascinating as a romance, and at the same time one of the most valuable works of reference ever published. So many discoveries have recently been made, so many of the old ideas and traditions have been exploded and shown to be mere myths and legends, that the subject of history may be said to be almost entirely new, and he who was well informed twenty years ago will find himself unable to discourse intelligibly upon historical subjects now unless he has kept up with the advance of historical research.

The mechanical execution of the book fully sustains the high reputation of the publishers. It contains 1260 large double-column pages, and over 650 fine engravings, illustrating the events recorded in the narrative, embracing battles and other historical scenes; portraits of the great men of ancient and modern times, and views of the principal cities and modern times, and views of the principal cities of the world. The engravings in this book are genuine works of art, and were made at a cost of over $25,000. The great number and high character of these engravings make this the most valuable art publication of the century. A prominent feature of the work is a full History of the late War between Russia and Turkey.

The price is so low that every one can afford to purchase a copy. It is sold by subscription only, and Mr. T. E. Barstow who comes well recommended by citizens of Bryan, Ohio, and who is the authorized agent for this section, is now canvassing for it.

Hendricks and Church.

The democrats of North Carolina propose a new democratic ticket for the presidency. The Charlotte Observer, after theorizing upon the claims of Tilden, Thurman and others, arrives at the following conclusions concerning a new combination. It says:

"As to the second theory, suffice it to say that the only state in the entire north which we may reasonably consider democratic is the state of Indiana. Unlike Mr. Thurman, Mr. Hendricks has no foes in his own state. But we must remember that when Mr. Hendricks was elected governor he was the only person upon the whole democratic state ticket who was elected, and that his majority was, comparatively speaking, small.

His popularity as governor and his continuous efforts have so strengthened our party there that our majority is some 15,000 votes. His scholarship, eloquence and overmastering power of argument, and the vehemence and impetuosity of his repeated attacks in each campaign on the republican party, have endeared him to the democracy of Indiana.

The purity of his private life, his unsullied integrity, and his kindness of heart, have endeared him to a large circle of friends irrespective of politics. In our opinion we can not rely upon the vote of Indiana if the friends of Mr. Hendricks are dissatisfied. Even he will not be able to control their indignation if his really paramount claims are slighted.

A moment's reflection will convince the reader that if our party can but carry the states of New York and Indiana, the necessary electoral votes will be secured. These states can be carried, provided the following named ticket is put into the field:

Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, for president.

Sanford E. Church, of New York, for vice-president.

The first named can unquestionably carry his own state.

Can the Empire state be carried by the chief justice of its court of appeals? Mr. Church is a citizen of Orleans county, N. Y. He was at an early age elected district attorney of that county. Subsequently he was elected comptroller of the state of New York, and then lieutenant governor. He afterward founded the celebrated law firm of Church, Munger & Cooke, which enjoyed a reputation second perhaps to no firm in the eastern or middle states. At the democratic national convention, held in Tammany Hall in 1868, the delegation from the state of New York were unanimous in presenting his name as their candidate for the presidency. This delegation voted for him more than 60 times, until Mr. Vallandingham nominated Horatio Seymour. And when the court of appeals was reorganized, in accordance with an amendment of the state constitution, some eight years ago, the democrats of that state elected him by the wholly unprecedented majority of over 70,000 votes. He has never been defeated. He is still in the prime of vigorous manhood. He has never been in doubtful political relations, or held dubious intercourse with rings or stock jobbing politicians. He is to day, all things considered, the strongest man in the democratic party of New York. His selection, therefore, as the democratic candidate for vice-president would give the ticket, with Hendricks at its head, much more local strength than it had in 1876."

Rough on Williams.

The Indianapolis Sentinel of last Saturday contained a lengthy account of the matrimonial adventures of Col. W. C. Williams, of Albion, who will be remembered as the greenback candidate for congress, in this district last year. The Sentinel says: "On the 29th of March, 1855, Louisa Brewster, daughter of ex-Attorney General Brewster, and William C. Williams, M. D., both of Philadelphia, were united in marriage by Rev. Dr. Dowling, a Baptist minister of that city. After the ceremony, by mutual consent, the parties separated and returned to their respective homes, intending to begin house-keeping as soon as his practice became remunerative enough to render such an action desirable. The wedding was no secret, both families being cognizant of it, and also approving it. The marriage certificate is still retained by Mrs. Williams, and it is all she ever had to show that she is not still a maiden.

The bride and groom saw each other frequently during a few days—the young physician often visiting his wife at the residence of her parents. Things continued this way until the Monday following the marriage, when Dr. Williams went to Talbot county, Maryland, where it is alleged he changed his name to Alfred C. Jones, M. D. Here he practiced his profession and taught school for about a year, and boarded at the house of one Bowman. During the first three or four months of his sojourn there, he continued to write to his wife, when he suddenly ceased, and she heard nothing further from him for some months. Miss Alphonso Bowman, daughter of the man with whom he boarded, was a handsome young woman, and it is supposed he immediately became fascinated with her charms, forgetting his wife at home, for at the end of nine months it was formally announced that Miss Alphonso and Dr. Jones would soon pool their issues for life. Things moved on smoothly for some time, and nothing occurred to induce any one to believe that Dr. Jones was otherwise than what he represented himself to be, but one Sunday he was seen and recognized while in church by a Mrs. Hickman, who was a friend of both himself and wife.

Mrs. Hickman, on hearing of the engagement between Williams and Miss Bowman, let the cat clear out of the bag, and just told all she knew about his history. This made it decidedly warm for the doctor in that neighborhood, and as his father and sister died about that time, he returned to Philadelphia. When he first returned he refused point blank to see his wife, and did not consent to visit her until her mother called upon him and unburdened her mind by telling him what she thought of such conduct. He then visited his wife, confessed everything, received her forgiveness, and opening an office on Third street, resumed practice. He remained at this location for about six months, seeing his wife occasionally, and everything appeared pleasant between them. His wife watched his increasing practice with the utmost satisfaction, as every new patient brought her nearer the day to which she had so long looked forward, when she could call her husband her own, and they could go to housekeeping. This, however, was not destined to be, as at the end of six months, the doctor closed his office and left without informing his wife of his contemplated departure and destination. After the lapse of some time Mrs. Williams learned that he had gone to Europe, and that while there he had a particularly hard time of it, being shipwrecked at one time.

At the end of a year he returned to Philadelphia, and to the residence of his mother. When his wife heard of his return she visited him, to ascertain his intentions concerning herself, and was informed that he wanted nothing to do with her. That night he again left, this time for the west, and as she supposed for Canada or Indiana. After he had been absent for some months she received a note signed Mrs. Hannah Williams (the name of the doctor's mother), announcing his death in Indiana. She immediately took the note to his mother who pronounced it a forgery. The deserted wife was informed that William was in Indiana, but could get nothing more definite.

Nothing more was heard of him until 1863, when Mrs. Williams attended a church, of which her husband's brother was pastor. During the course of the sermon he said he had two brothers in the field, and incidentally mentioned the name of William. After services were concluded, she approached the minister, and was informed by him that her husband was in a southern prison, having been captured at the battle of Murfreesboro, where he had fallen severely wounded. When released he returned to Philadelphia, where his wife had him arrested, under the Pennsylvania law, for desertion, and at the hearing before the board of aldermen he pleaded a divorce obtained in Indiana, and the aldermen held it not to be good, as he admitted no notice of the suit had been given her. He was committed to the county prison where he remained two days, when he was released at the request of General Rosencranz, his commanding officer, who said his services were required at the front. From that time until last fall she heard nothing more of him. Last fall Mr. Cady opened a correspondence with W. A. Lowe, of this city, and from him ascertained that Colonel Williams was residing at Albion, this state. Mr. Lowe was then retained by Mrs. Williams to assist Mr. Cady in the prosecution of the colonel.

Mr. Lowe ascertained that Williams procured a divorce from his wife in the Wells county circuit court on the 7th, of February, 1861, Mr. M. Jenkinson, a Fort Wayne attorney, appearing for Mrs Williams.

Mr. Lowe also ascertained that Williams was married to a daughter of John Bliss, of Albion, November 14 1864 with whom he still lives. Mr. Lowe forwarded the results of his investigation to Philadelphia, and immediately received instructions to begin suit to vacate the decree on the grounds of fraud.

Mrs. Williams has in the meantime been supporting herself by teaching music, and has acquired a little home near Long Branch. Hard times coming on, she desired to sell this property, but being a married woman could not give a title. Mr. Lowe so informed Colonel Williams at an interview in this city during the winter, and asked him to join her in making the deed, but this he positively refused to do.

Mrs. Williams No. 1 denies that she ever received any notification of the pendency of the divorce proceedings, and did not know where her husband was at that time; she never employed M. Jenkinson to defend her; she never heard of Jenkinson before. She never filed an answer to the suit, and asserts that the entire proceedings, as far as regards her, were false and fraudulent, and on that ground expects to have the decree vacated.

Before taking any further steps in the matter, Mr. Lowe has felt desirous of having further consultation with Colonel Williams, and so informed him and the colonel promised to meet him in this city this week, but this he has as yet failed to do.

Mrs. Williams No. 1 is spoken of in the very highest terms by Mr. Cady, who says she is a most estimable woman and has been grievously wronged for the past 24 years. A suit to vacate the decree will be brought in the Wells circuit court in a few days.

Further developments in this case will be watched with great interest in all parts of the state, as Colonel Williams is a man of prominence in politics. It is possible that when his side is heard, it will put an entirely different complexion to the strange story, and it is no more than fair that a suspension of judgment should be had until he can be heard."

So say we.

NO MATTER HOW HIGH THE "TONE."

WHEN A TAILOR

No matter how high up his "tone" is, asks you $10 and $14 for a pair of "trousers;" as he calls them, the wool of which is sorted by orphans and poor blind girls, and is kept some years in some old mill in Germany before he buys it on credit; when this noble tailor stands off and views you, enveloped in one of his $35 suits, gesticulating like a maniac, you may think here is a little humbug about it all, but it is not humbug; it is just twenty dollars out of your pocket into his'n. There is a place where you can get precisely the same suit for—well, you call on —Circuit court is now in session.

—To-morrow you must decorate.

—George Haz'ard time, doesn't he?

—To prevent hair from falling out—shave it off.

—F. E. Davenport and wife are doing Indianapolis this week.

—J. J. Whittington, jr., left last night for his home in Pella, Iowa.

—The boot upside down has the spring fever. He said so.

—Mrs. Basheller returned Monday from a visit at Fort Wayne.

—Butter, with or without hair, is worth 8 cents to our farmers.

—The county commissioners meet in regular session next Monday.

—A wedding is on the tapis, but we daren't say more; we promised.

—New time-card on the Ft. W., J. & S. road took effect last Sunday.

—Some of the Defiance girls got on a whiz, the other day, and were jugged.

—A nice assortment of pocketbooks, purses, etc., very cheap at Willis & Co's.

—Another half-sheet supplement enclosed in this week's COURIER. Read it carefully.

—Rev. A. Marine, of Ft. Wayne, conducted services at the Methodist church last Sabbath.

—Have you seen the doctor lately?—we mean Tritch? Echo answers: "Mean Tritch."

—Well, Mr. Lockwood, where are those cigars? Marriages can't be kept a secret always.

—Schaab, Beugnot & Co, are still having a fine trade, notwithstanding the dull season.

—F. S. Clark, the handsome and winning clerk at the junction, has got it again. Feverangue.

—John Van Nest, the buggy man,—sometimes called "Pull down the blinds"—left for Ohio yesterday.

—Defiance has a new calaboose, and it was dedicated the first night by one "drunk and disorderly."

—Clyde Moore, who has been attending business college at Valparaiso, returned home Saturday last.

—Miss Laura Cunningham, of Bryan, Ohio, sister of Mrs. E. D. Hartman is in the city visiting the latter.

—When you want the very latest patterns in dress goods go to Schaab, Beugnot & Co's. They lead the market.

—G. Rodenbaugh started Monday afternoon for Hannibal, Missouri, where he expects to abide for a few weeks.

—Who was the young attorney that was so anxious to know if a certain Auburn girl had any "solid" fellow?

—Mrs. A. J. Little received another lot of millinery goods, of the very latest styles, this week. Call and see them.

—The fantastic signature of R. Wes McBride, of Waterloo, decorated the docket at the Swineford last Tuesday.

—By carefully reading the supplement you will ascertain where to buy dry goods, notions clothing and groceries.

—From our exchanges we observe that decoration days, excursions and picnics are ripening all over the country. Circuses, too, will soon be prolific.

—Our people evidently do not take to panoramas. The turnout to Pilgrim's Progress was extremely meager each night.

—E. G. Smedley, the whole-souled and popular boot-and-shoe dispenser, of Ft. Wayne, was seen rushing around town Tuesday.

—Willis & Co. have a fine line of baby carriages that they are selling a little cheaper than any other house in the county.

—It is said that men born blind never learn to smoke. Of course they don't; they couldn't see which end to put in their mouth.

—WANTED, at Kiblinger's hardware store, immediately, nine good customers. John Leasure told us so, and that's how we know it.

—Milt. Roth started for Kansas last week, where he will join his two brothers. His father accompanied him to Fort Wayne.

—Thursday night's May hop was a "big thing," not so much in numbers as in enjoyment. The girls say it was "awful nice."

—The addition to Schaab, Beugnot & Co's business room is about completed. Look out for a stock of new goods in a short time.

—You sort o' went off half cocked, Maj. Durkee, didn't you? He wasn't shooting at you; it was the dogs he sought to slay.

—We advise every farmer in the county to read the inclosed supplement, and learn where to get the latest improved farm machinery.

—Eggs sold in town this week, including spring chickens, at 8 cents a dozen. This is a cheaper way to buy 'em than by the pound.

—Messrs. N. & G. Ensley make a statement of the kinds of machinery handled by them, in the COURIER supplement this week.

—A number of Auburn gentlemen were in town yesterday, among whom were Messrs. Somers and Teift and Dr. Cowan.—Garrett Herald.

—Subscribe for Dr. March's new book, "From Dark to Dawn," and get a treasure for your home. Miss Georgia Bitner will introduce the work.

—B. F. Blair, of Newville, and Geo. H. Duncan, of Waterloo, two of our county commissioners, were registered Tuesday at the Swineford.

—Jas. McClellan, Coop. Ralston and Lute Wright started yesterday for the northern lake, on a big whaling excursion. Now we will have fish.

—An enlightened individual called at F. N. Wright & Co's. lime-house, a day or two ago, and wanted lime enough "to whitewash five cents worth."

—A three-line item in the Indianian starts out with the impertinent question, "Are you going to paint?" If we were a girl, we just wouldn't answer it.

—A Fort Wayne saloonist, according to the News, commits irreverence by hanging up the following sign in his gin mill: "In God we trust; all others, cash."

—Rev. Minton, pastor of the 3rd Presbyterian church of Ft. Wayne, preached last Sunday morning and evening at the Presbyterian church of this place.

—Pensioners are requested to execute their vouchers, for quarterly pension payment, on Wednesday, June 9, 1879. Mail them the same day, and they will be promptly paid.

—The Saginaw road now runs refrigerator cars, Tuesday and Thursday of each week, to Detroit and points east. They start from Pleasant Lake, where the ice-houses are located.

—"Pull down your white vest," says the Hicksville News. We would, Bro. Starr, if we had ours; but in the event that our wash-woman won't give it up, how can we? Could you?

—Tom Bell, the accommodating driver of one of Ford's depot hacks, was on his muscle last Friday evening. For further particulars, see pane of glass in Billy Rainier's saloon.

—Bob Jones, of Fort Wayne, was in town Monday, selling the patent celluloid collars and cuffs. They are a good thing, and we hope Bob may accumulate much wealth on his rounds.

—A young lady was heard to remark a day or two ago: "Why, I haven't had a woolen hoe on my limb this winter." That's culchah.—Concord Monitor. Is that story a really leggitimate one?

—Step around livelier next time, young man, if you would fain escort the girls from the junction to the city. We donate this suggestion to our friend Leonard, free gratis without charge.

—If you have been unfortunate and have a broken mirror on hand, take the frame to Willis & Co's. and have it filled with a nice German plate, on most reasonable terms, any size up to 18x22.

—The celebrated Murdoch & Hamilton's Frolique Company will give one of their excellent entertainments at Ensley's hall, Tuesday evening, June 3. Give them a full house, as they are deserving of it.

—W. W. Hoffman says his "sit" at Attica wasn't a bit "soft," and he has relinquished it, now acting as relief agent and operator for the B. & O. company. He moved St. Joe-ward Monday morning.

—C. H. Hoyt, our druggist, made a three days' trip to Liberty, Ohio, a few days since. He left on Saturday, when it was hot, in a duster; he came back Tuesday, when it threatened snow, in a—duster, too.

—Last week's Hicksville News announces that it will this week issue a "mammoth four-page supplement." By the way in which its huge advertisements loom up on the first and eighth pages, we infer that it will "pay big."

—If the Swineford House, at Auburn, is a sample of "the way they keep hotel in Indiana" we are decidedly in favor of the Indiana plan. Having recently registered at that justly popular hostelry, we found it one of the cosiest, neatest and best conducted hotels in two states.—Delphos (O). Herald.

—The clock in Sam. Pommert's barber shop is a hummer. It ran for 48 hours last week, during which time the hands moved two minutes' worth. All it needs—like the clock in the COURIER office, which is "on a strike"—is another clock.

—Excursion parties over the Jackson road, from Auburn to Pleasant Lake and return, consisting of ten or more persons, can get tickets at half-rates from now until Nov. 1, which makes round-trip tickets only fifty-five cents. Let's all excurt.

—A little girl at Ft. Wayne found a roll of bills, a day or two ago, amounting to $38. She also found the owner of it and gave it to him, and was handsomely rewarded with a nickel. Such sublime generosity is recorded in heaven—against the perpetrator.

—Died, Friday, May 23, of heart disease, Dr. Philip Roskopf, in the 56th year of his age. We have been requested to state that any and all parties knowing themselves to be indebted to the deceased, or holding claims against him, will please call on Eli Swigert for settlement.

—Dr. Vincent, of Valparaiso, advertises in the Messenger the loss of a "stethoscope," offering a liberal reward for its return. Now, how many Valpoets know what they are looking for, or can tell what kind of a critter they have caught when they find it?

—There will be a grand Sunday-school picnic in seminary grove, Garrett, Ind., Saturday, May 31, 1879. Every school in the county is cordially invited. Speaking, vocal and instrumental music and many other recreations will constitute the programme of the day's enjoyment.

—Auburn, that classic village which Goldsmith says something about, is terribly excited over the existence of a gang of horse-thieves in that vicinity.—Fort Wayne News.

We don't believe it; anyway, our citizens don't know of it, and none of our own trotting-horses and thoroughbreds have been missed; we count them every day.

—Next Sunday being the festival of Pentecost will be the 1846th aniversary birthday of the Catholic church. We understand the festival will be suitably celebrated in the church here, by a high mass at 10 o'clock, a. m., the singing of the "Te Deum" and a sermon on the "Trials and Triumphs of the Catholic church."

—An old man in Davenport's drug-store stood fifteen minutes yesterday trying to read the sign "Brown's Bronchial Troches." He spelled it forwards, then backwards, then turned it upside down, and finally gave it up in despair. It tickled Billy Shaffer so largely that he smiled out loud quite vehemently.

—Another idiot is endeavoring to gain a few nickels, mixed in with some notoriety, by jumping into the falls at Niagara from the suspension bridge, a distance of 192 feet. He has already made the leap once, managing to get out alive, and will make it again July 4. This time he will doubtless jump into eternity.

—If the owner of that musical bovine in the south part of town will catch it some night and tie it to the hind end of a passenger train, the citizens of that otherwise peaceful neighborhood will get up a purse for him or donate a chromo and house and lot. Cow-bell serenades, in the calm hours of the night, are "conjurious to the institution."

—The new patent celluloid collars and cuffs can now be found at the dry goods and millinery establishment of Nick Ensley. We have examined and tested these articles thoroughly, and do not hesitate to pronounce them a good thing. A man can wear one collar four or five weeks, clean all the time, and unaffected by perspiration. Go and see them for yourself.

—Those who desire an arborvitæ fence planted around cemetery lots, can have it done by calling upon Joe E. Beugnot, for 20 cents per foot. He will also fix up lots and graves, and plant one moss rose, one weeping tree-rose, and one trepina, if you give him the contract. Call and see him when you want work of that kind done.

—John C. Weeks, aged about 42 years, a farmer living four miles east of town, died Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock and was buried on Monday. Mr. Weeks has been troubled for some time with pleuro-pneumonia, though his immediate death is said to have been caused by an accident sustained while plowing, the fore part of the week. He is survived by a wife and two children, for whom expressions of sympathy are tendered by neighbors and friends.

—Nine infants came down last Friday from Garrett, hardly any of them old enough to talk without lisping, for the purpose of scooping up our boys in a game of base-ball. The home nine, nearly all men, were confident of success when they saw the puny dimensions of their adversaries. But they take it all back now; their interest in base-ball has waned; they are sad at heart.—Score, 23 to 23 in favor of the six-year-olds from Garrett. Oh, boys!

—Arrangements have been made at Waterloo by which parties from this place, desiring to attend the meeting of the DeKalb county Sunday-school association, which meets at Butler on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 10 and 11, can make good connections by rail. The train leaves for Waterloo, on the Saginaw road, at 5:55, and leaves Waterloo for Butler, on the Lake Shore road, at 8:05. For any further information, enquire of T. J. Saxton, secretary, Auburn.

—The Central hotel is still there, but it is only by chance. A lamp hanging in the office fell to the floor Wednesday evening of last week when nobody was present, and came near playing smash, generally. Uncle Tom Gross, the good-natured proprietor, came in just in time to be soon enough, as the flames were fast devouring a portion of his floor and counter. A little "energetic activity," however, restored peace and quietude, and all is yet well at the Central.

—The Albion New Era, of last week, contains a lengthy account of the probable murder of Isaac T. Neff, a justice of the peace, of Avilla, Noble county. Mr. Neff had been on a visit to a sister at Columbus, O., and left there for his home with some $600 on his person, in company with another man. The body of a man found in the river, at about the time Neff was missed, has been recognized by relatives as his remains, and there is but little doubt that he was murdered and thrown into the river near Columbus.

—The Eagle Mills of this place changed hands on last Monday, the property having been purchased by Messrs. Beck & Simmers, who take charge of the mill in person. Mr. Beck, Jr., is a practical miller of several years experience; Mr. Simmers will have charge of another branch of the business, while Mr. G. W. Beck, the old wheel-horse, whose long experience as a miller enables him to understand the wants of his customers, will always be on hand to oversee the work and wait upon those who patronize the mill. We hope the people of DeKalb will give the new firm a trial.

—Last Saturday afternoon, as the southern-bound passenger train rounded the curve near the stave-factory, a farmer with a two-horse wagon, in which were a woman and child, undertook to beat the train past the crossing. He did it, too, but it was a close shave; so much so that the engine tapped rather unpleasantly on the hind wheel of the wagon as it went sailing by. Such carelessness is unwarranted, and if an accident had occurred in this case, the blame could not possibly devolve upon any one but the farmer himself, as the engine gave the customary whistle at the crossing.

Fiendish Flames.

A sad case comes to our notice, though rather late, of the burning of a half-witted girl, or mute, named Jennie Weaver, who was in her seventeenth year and lived with her parents on the state road, two miles north of town. The girl's clothes, by some means unknown to any one, caught fire Monday forenoon of last week, while her mother was attending to some duties in the cellar, and before the mother could reach her or render any assistance, the poor girl was most horribly burned. She was in the habit of romping around the house considerable and making as much noise as she pleased, though she was unable to talk or sing, having been born an imbecile; hence the mother thought nothing of the noise up-stairs, when in reality the frantic girl was burning alive. Though the flesh was burned off in many places, her sufferings were not taken away by the Angel of Mercy until Friday evening at about 8 o'clock. She was buried at the cemetery in Auburn, Sunday afternoon, at 3 o'clock.

FIRST SIGHT.

The girl was under fourteen years age; but such was the impression sh made on young Newton that his affe tion for her appears to have equaled a that the writers of romance have im agined. When in distant parts of th world, the thought of her checked hi in a profligate career. When sinking o the coast of Africa into a wretched stat of slavery and when ready to put a end to his life, the thought of he aroused him to energy and inspired hin with hope. All the impressions an scenes of misery and wickedness throug which he had passed never had banishe her from his waking thoughts for th following seven years. When he lived London he would repair twice a wee to Shooter's Hill, and from the top o that eminence comfort himself with distant view of the district in which hi loved once lived. Not that he could se the spot him itself, which was in reality too remote; but it gratified him even to look toward the spot. She eventually became the bright star of his life.

The Rev. Joseph Hall, Bishop of Norwich, and author of "Contemplations of the Old and New Testament," obtained a wife in a very singular manner. In walking from the church one Whit-Monday with a grave and reverend minister of the name of Grandidge, he saw a comely, modest gentlewoman standing at the door of a house where they were invited to a wedding dinner. Mr. Hall inquired of his friend whether he knew her.

"Yes," said Mr. Grandidge, "I know her well, and I HAVE BESPOKE HER FOR YOUR WIFE. She is the daughter of a gentleman whom I much respect, Mr. George Winniff, of Bretenham; and out of the opinion I have of the match for you, I have already treated about it with her father, whom I found very apt to entertain it." Mr. Hall, too, it seems, was [illegible] to entertain it; for he says: [illegible] the on-

GARRETT, May 26, 1879.

EDITORS COURIER:—Please permit space in the columns of your valuable paper for a few remarks, in reply to some mendacious and scurrilous vituperations which fumed forth in the Garrett Herald of last week, with the intention to injure the reputation of our town abroad, and cast a shadow of censure on the general character of gentlemen whose shoes the author of these malicious and defamatory delusions is in no wise worthy to lace. I will now take up the charges set forth against the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company, and the land and improvement company, in order as they appear in the Herald. First, he states that Wm. Keyser, of Baltimore, Md., anchored his car near the depot, Monday last, and in all the glory and circumstances of aristocratic dictation he sat upon the cushioned seat of his palace coach in anticipation of the good people of Garrett paying him potential honors.

Second, the land and railroad companies have combined to work against the interests of Garrett, and to-day the land improvement company has in its possession and under its control the greater portion of the town, and real estate owners are in their power.

Third, if a firm attempts to buy grain, produce, etc., for the eastern markets, the railroad company quickly settles their prospects by charging such enormous rates for shipping that the dealers are compelled to abandon the idea.

Fourth, the railroad company at this place is pursuing a very unwise course in discharging men of families and employing unmarried men and boys in their place.

Fifth, the B. & O. accommodates no one—unless it is done through mistake.

Sixth, this road does drag longer trains than any other east and west line, but then the merchandise and stock is so long on the road that shippers prefer short trains and quick time.

Seventh, the B. & O. have more roads now than they can manage successfully. It would be more sensible if there was an effort made to get business for the roads now under the control of this corporation.

Now, as a citizen of Garrett, and an employe of the B. & O., I would state that every one of the above charges is false; I have seen Mr. Keyser and other officials of the B. & O. in Garrett, on several occasions, and no person can say that they assume any undue deportment. While on the other hand, we have gazed day after day on some of the most adulterated shoddy aristocracy that ever tread the streets of any town or city, who have come to Garrett, leaving their bills unpaid, and not in possession of $25 in money—perfectly devoid of cultivation, refinement or ordinary intellect. The land and railroad companies have never done one act contrary to the interest of Garrett. There are no real estate owners here who are in the power of the land company, and the company has never distressed or tried to distress any person who has bought a lot here, but the trouble is this: There were too many persons come to Garrett, like the editor of the Herald, having too much sail out in proportion to the amount of ballast they carry.

There never was a firm that shipped grain and produce from here, that asked for concession in rates of freight, that did not get it granted; and to substantiate this statement I will refer to Messrs. B. D. Thomas and O. C. Clark, who are shipping and have been shipping grain and produce from Garrett, east and west. The charge that the railroad company has ever discharged a man of family, and hired a single man in his place, is an infamous lie, willfully concocted and maliciously published for no other purpose than to cast reflections of contempt on the management of our worthy master mechanic, and speaks well of itself to be emitted from the sanctimonious bosom of a Sunday-school superintendent. "Woe be unto ye scribes and hypocrites."

Next, "the B. & O. accomodates no one—unless it is done through mistake." Well, we understand the B. & O. did make a mistake, in 1878, by favoring the editor of the Garrett Herald with a pass; but as the company did not renew their mistake in 1879, and Mr. Keyser did not call at the Herald office and consult the old philosopher and listen to his wisdom in the management of railroads, etc., the reputation of the town and railroad must be injured. The railroad and land companies look to the interest of Garrett and those who have bought lots here. It is a well-known fact that the Herald has never invested one dollar in Garrett, and it is currently reported and generally conceded, that it was brought here and came here to help run a man out of town who had laid out his hard-earned money in town lots. So we presume that when this became known to the head officials of the railroad and land company, they failed to renew their "mistake" in 1879. Mr. Herald, doesn't the railroad and land company favor those who invested in the town?—and don't you see why you did not get your pass renewed?

—The seductive hay fork chap has been operating in this neighborhood, and Jonathan Shook living near Corunna is the last victim. A brace of well dressed sharpers approached him on Wednesday, 14th, with the old story, setting forth the immense profits to be derived from an investment in their forks. A co-partnership scheme was proposed, and Jonathan was hauled in to the tune of $800. A contract or article of agreement is duly signed, stipulating the amount to be paid for a certain number of forks at the rate of $30 each, a specified per cent. of all sales to be credited to the manufacturer; he is then induced to sign a promissory note in payment for the full amount of purchase, and everything is lovely and the goose hangs high. Mr Shook has since smelt something, but there is no possible relief or escape, the transaction being legitimate and lawful, and no doubt the note changed hands in twenty-four hours after it was made. There is a moral to this o'er true tale; Had Mr J. been a reader of the local papers he would have been duly fortified against the encroachments of all such vampires, and an investment of a few dollars in his home paper would probably have saved him hundreds, as the "tricks and manners" of this class of dead-beats have been effectually ventilated by the country press. We pass on and await the next victim.—Head Light.

THE LIGHTNING-ROD DISPENSER.

A Farm Ballad.

BY WILL CARLETON.

If the weary world is willing, I've a little word to say
Of a lightning-rod dispenser that dropped down on me one day,
With a poem in his motions, with a sermon in his mien,
With hands as white as lilies, and a face uncommon clean.
No wrinkle had his vestments, and his linen glistened white,
And his new-constructed necktie was an interesting sight;
Which I almost wish his razor had made red that white-skinned throat,
[illegible] necktie had continued a hangman's knot,
Ere he brought his sleek-trimmed carcass for my women-folks to see,
And his rip-saw tongue a buzzin' for to gouge a gash in me.

But I couldn't help but like him—as I always think I must,
The gold of my own doctrines in a fellow heap of dust;
When I fired my own opinions at this person round by round,
They drew an answering volley of a very similar sound;
I touched him on religion, and the hopes my heart had known;
He said he'd had experiences quite similar of his own.
I told him of the doubtin's that made dark my early years;
He had laid awake till morning, with that same old breed of fears.
I told him of the rough path I hoped to heaven to go;
He was on that very ladder, only just a round below.
I told him of my visions of the sinfulness of gain;
He had seen the self-same picters, though not quite so clear and plain.
Our politics was different, and at first he galled and winced;
But I argu'd him so able, he was very soon convinced.

And 'twas getting toward the middle of a hungry summer day;
There was dinner on the table, and I asked him would he stay?
And he sat him down among us, everlasting trim and neat,
And asked a short, crisp blessing almost good enough to eat;
Then he fired up on the mercies of our Great Eternal Friend,
And gave the Lord Almighty a good first-class recommend;
And for full an hour we listened to the sugar-coated scamp,
Talking like a blessed angel—eating like a—blasted tramp.

My wife, she liked the stranger, smiling on him warm and sweet—
(It always flatters women when their guests are on the eat),
And he hinted that some ladies never lose their early charms,
And he kissed her latest baby, and received it in his arms.
My sons and daughters liked him, for he had progressive views,
And chewed the quid of fancy, and gave down the latest news;
And I couldn't help but like him; as I fear I always must
The gold of my own doctrines, in a fellow-heap of dust.

He was spreading desolation through a piece of apple pie,
When he paused, and looked upon us with a tear in his off-eye,
And said, "O, happy family!—your blessings make me sad;
You call to mind the dear ones that in happier days I had;
A wife as sweet as this one; a babe as bright and fair;
A little girl with ringlets, like that one over there,
I worshiped them too blindly!—my eyes with love were dim!
God took them to His own heart, and now I worship Him.
But had I not neglected the means within my way,
Then they might still be living, and loving me to-day.

"One night there came a tempest; the thunder-peals were dire;
The clouds that tramped above us were shooting bolts of fire;
In my own house, I, lying, was thinking to my blame,
How little I had guarded against those shafts of flame,
When, crash!—through roof and ceiling the deadly lightning cleft,
And killed my wife and children, and only I was left.

"Since that dread time I've wandered, and naught for life have cared,
Save to save others' loved ones, whose lives have yet been spared;
Since then it is my mission, where'er by sorrow tossed,
To sell to virtuous people good lightning-rods—at cost.
With sure and strong protection I'll clothe your building o'er;
'Twill cost you fifty dollars (perhaps a trifle more);
What little else it comes to, at lowest price I'll put (You signing this agreement to pay so much per foot)."

I signed it, while my family all approving stood about;
And dropped a tear upon it—(but it didn't blot it out!)
That very day with wagons came some men, both great and small,
They climbed upon my buildings just as if they owned 'em all;
They hacked 'em, and they hewed 'em, much against my loud desires;
They trimmed 'em up with gewgaws, and they bound 'em down with wires;
They trimmed 'em and they wired 'em, and they trimmed an' wired 'em still,
And every precious minute kept a-running up the bill.

My soft-spoke guest a-seeking, did I rave and rush and run;
He was supping with a neighbor, just a three-mile further on.
"Do you think," I fiercely shouted, "that I want a mile of wire
To save each separate hay-cock out o' heaven's consumin' fire?
Do you think, to keep my buildin's safe from some uncertain harm,
I'm goin' to deed you over all the balance of my farm?"

He looked up quite astonished, with a face devoid of guile,
And he pointed to the contract, with a reassuring smile;
It was the first occasion that he disagreed with me;
But he held me to that paper with firmness sad to see;
And for that thunder-story, ere the rascal finally went,
I paid two hundred dollars, if I paid a single cent.

And if any lightnin'-rodder wants a dinner-dialogue
With the restaurant department of an enterprising dog,
Let him set his mill a-runnin' just inside my outside gate,
And I'll bet two hundred dollars that he won't have long to wait.

—Farmers' Review (Chicago).

NO YOU DON'T.

Mr. Jo Beckley stepped out on the ample porch of the Agricultural Club. He looked forth with disgust upon the dense fog in which London was enveloped, and then gazed with delight upon a ticket for Calais which he held in his hand.

Mr. Jo Beckley had an exceedingly rural air. Large and brawny and grizzled, his brown face covered with scrubby beard, his joints all clumsily developed, he looked like a backwoodsman. Being a bachelor, also, his toilet lacked that adjustment which a wifely touch or suggestion imparts, and intensified his rural air.

But that Mr. Beckley possessed intelligence was proven by his wide-awake air, and by the fact that he had brought no baggage to Europe, except the little sachel now depending by a strap from his shoulder.

The Hon. Felix Plimpot, M. P., stepped out on the porch with him.

"Bon voyage, Mr. Beckley. When you get back to America, pray forward us your articles in the Spade and Hoe, whenever they appear."

"Good-by, Mister Plimpot. The best time I've had in England I had in your demesne, sir; and when the land question comes up in Parliament again I hope you'll send me a copy of your speech."

"With pleasure, sir."

The two shook hands heartily, and Mr. Jo Beckley departed.

Ere he had gone half a block a seedy gentleman in gray approached, and slapped him familiarly on the shoulder.

"How do ye do, Barry? When did ye get in from Ploverton?"

"You are mistaken in your man, sir," said Mr. Beckley.

"What! Ain't this Barry Baxter?"

"No, sir. My name is Beckley."

"I beg pardon. I mistook you for Baxter—same build, same whiskers. Where are you from, sir?"

"I am an American."

"Possible! I have a brother in America. What part are you from?"

"Near Springfield, Mass."

"Ah, yes; my brother has been there. Stopping in town with your family, sir."

"With my family?" replied Mr. Jo Beckley, a sly twinkle creeping into his eyes. "Yes. My wife and the twins are staying at the Merry-Go Inn."

"Ah? Well, sir, if you see my brother when you get back, please give him my love."

And the seedy man in gray walked away.

Mr. Beckley looked after him in some surprise, then turned and went on.

Half a block beyond a voice hailed him.

"Cab, sir?"

"No, I'll walk," replied Mr. Beckley.

The cabman dashed on, and, just as Mr. Beckley turned back his head, somebody stumbled out of the fog against him. It was a tall, spare man, in clerical garb and necktie, with a sanctimonious air.

"Pray excuse me," he exclaimed. "What! is this Mr. Beckley? It certainly is. How do you do, sir? How do you do?"

And the spare man shook hands cordially with him.

"Really, you have the better of me," said Mr. Jo Beckley, perplexed. "I don't recollect your name."

"Cowper, sir, Cowper! We met in Massachusetts some months ago, you remember."

"Oh, did we? Where was it?—at the Horticultural meeting?" inquired Mr. Beckley.

He could have sworn he never met the man before.

"Yes, that was the time. How is Mrs. Beckley, sir, and how are the twins getting on? I should like to see them all. Are they in London?"

A light broke over Mr. Beckley's face. All uncertainty vanished.

"They are with me, Cowper, at the Merry-Go Inn," he said.

"Ah! glad to hear it. You are going that way? I shall be pleased to accompany you. When did you come over?"

"Last month," responded Mr. Beckley.

And the two walked on, apparently full of good feeling.

"I am proud to welcome you to our country. And what do you think of Hengland, Mr. Beckley?"

"Well, I think it is superior to America in some respects, but I wouldn't care to live in England. You are well organized here, while America is still crude; but, after all, you have a great many poor people, while we have almost none. What business are you in, Cowper?"

"Stock-raising. I am just testing a theory of my own. I've learned in what temperature cattle will fatten fastest, and have built sheds, so as to keep them in that temperature all the year round. Don't know how 'twill operate. I'm in town now to sell some cattle. By the way, that reminds me—where are we? Ah, this is No. 1,111. I have an errand at No. 1,123. I took a lottery ticket on a debt, and they say it's a prize number. I'd like to step in and see if it's good for anything. Here we are now; just drop in with me, Mr. Beckley."

"No, thank you," said Mr. Jo Beckley.

"Oh, yes, just a minute; then I'll go on with you."

"Very well."

"It's up stairs, I see. Come on, sir."

Mr. Jo Beckley followed him up three flights of stairs to a little front office, where a clerk stood busily writing at his desk, behind a long counter.

"Good morning. Is this the office of the Rio Janeiro lottery?"

"It is, sir."

"I have a ticket, No. 22,222. Please see if it has drawn anything."

The clerk looked into his books.

"It has drawn £75, 2 shillings;" and he went back toward his safe.

"Do you hear that, Mr. Beckley? Do you hear that? Luck, sir! I only allowed my customer 3 shillings for the ticket."

The clerk came back with £75 in clean Bank of England notes, and paid them over the counter.

"Where are the 2 shillings?"

"We never give small change, sir. I will give you two draws instead."

"Oh! All right. Here, make it four draws. Here are 2 shillings more."

"A shilling a draw is cheaper than we usually allow, except for six draws at one time," said the clerk. "Won't your friend take a hand?"

"Mr. Beckley, try a couple."

"No," said Joe, "I guess not."

"I'll give you four, then, at the six rate, this time," said the clerk, and he took the money.

A drum-like box was produced.

Mr. Cowper put in his hand and drew out four envelopes, each containing one ticket. He opened them and called off the numbers. Three drew nothing; the fourth drew £4, 1 shilling.

"This is splendid luck, Beckley!" whispered Cowper. "Don't you want to try it?"

"I guess not," said Mr. Jo Beckley.

"Gentlemen," said the clerk, confidentially, "I saw a remarkable sight here this morning. A man came in and gave £100, and drew a bushel of envelopes. Will you believe me—there were only two prizes among 'em! Well, gentlemen, after he went away, I found that the Queen sent him here to try for her. I was sorry that she had such a poor pull, but I could not help it; we must be impartial, and let luck go where it will. All the royal family patronize us and most always have good luck. And I never knew such a quantity of blanks drawn out without a heavy run of prizes right afterward!"

"You're right about that!" exclaimed Mr. Cowper, with enthusiasm. "Beckley, we can make a fortune here. Suppose we put in £5 apiece on trial?"

"No," said Mr. Jo Beckley; "I guess not."

"[illegible]," said Mr. Cowper. He paid the money and drew twenty-eight sixpence.

"Luck is against me," said the clerk, mournfully. "There's going to be a run of prizes now, sure!"

"Do you see that? Do you see that Beckley? I tell you we can make a fortune! Try a five-pounder!"

"No," said Mr. Jo Beckley, "I guess not. But I tell you, Cowper, you try two shillings for me; if it wins I'll pay you back."

"But if it don't?"

"Then I won't pay you anything."

"Better try for yourself, sir," said the clerk, affably.

"No," said Jo, "I guess not."

Mr. Cowper looked at him doubtfully.

"Well, I'll try for you on those terms," he said, at last. He tried and drew £10. Mr. Jo Beckley took it gravely, and handed out two shillings.

"Very much obliged," said he.

"You're welcome," replied Cowper. "Now let's try £5 together."

"What did you say your name was?" asked Mr. Jo Beckley.

"Cowper."

"Cowper! Cowper! Cowper! I thought you said Cooper. I guess it wasn't me you met in Springfield!"

"Oh, yes, it was."

"It must have been my son James."

"No, it was you."

"Or my son Jedediah, or Ephraim, or Samuel."

"No, it was you."

"Well, then, if it was me—good-by, Cowper."

The men stared.

"What, sir! Surely you will try your luck again?" said the clerk.

"This is not fair!" exclaimed Mr. Cowper.

"By no means! You must try, sir," exclaimed the clerk.

Mr. Jo Beckley retreated toward the door. They followed him fiercely, the clerk with club in hand. Mr. Beckley looked at them, then out of an adjacent window.

Upon the level the London fog is dense, but looked through from the house-tops is quite penetrable. A policeman stood below, on the opposite side of the street. Jo Beckley suddenly threw up the broad window.

"Do you see him?" he asked, pointing toward the officer. "I must leave you. Pray don't object, or I shall have to call him. Good-day, Cowper."

They glanced out into the street, looked at Jo Beckley's brawny, muscular form, and kept quiet, although livid with rage, as he stepped out.

In the hall Mr. Jo Beckley looked at the £10 note. To his surprise, it was genuine.

He came back and opened the door. The two men stood confronting each other, disputing angrily.

"Ah! Cowper, if you visit America again, come and see me. We'll go coon-hunting. You'll enjoy coon-hunting, I know. The coon is an innocent-looking animal, but he's mighty sly!"

He went down stairs, hailed a cab, and was whirled away to the depot, with a shrewd smile on his Yankee face.

Honorable Politics.

Honorable politics, although they may lead to civil war, need not occasion personal ill-will. But then honorable politics imply a respect of treatment, a freedom from misrepresentation, or taunt, or calumny, or ridicule, or innuendo, which are seldom found. When a man charges an opponent with unconstitutional conduct, or insists that he favors a course which is prejudicial to the public welfare, he merely states that his opinions differ from those of his opponent, and, of course, one opinion may be as defensible as the other. When Webster and Hayne differed as to the nature of the constitution, and each maintained his view with argument, there was no reason whatever that they should not eat together the quiet chop, nor smoke the peaceful pipe. But when one gentleman asserted that his opponent supported a system which was the sum of human villainies, demoralizing to all who were brought within its sphere, and making them man-stealers, brutes and assassins, it was hard to separate the abstract view from its concrete application. It is true that the accused might reply that the charge sprung from ignorance, and could not be accepted as a sincere assertion; but, on the other hand, if a man really believed that the person, the associate, or the colleague of whom he spoke was in fact a thief and a murderer, he could not honestly treat him as if he were a gentleman. If he did not think so, he had no right whatever to say so, and he showed himself to be no gentleman.

A member of Congress accepted an invitation to the house of a colleague. "Do you think him an honest man?" asked a friend. "No; I think him a blank scoundrel." "Why do you go?" "Because he is my colleague." That kind of courtesy is corrupting in the highest degree, because it makes a certain position screen rascality. All that blank scoundrels have to do, then, is to secure such a position, and they will be treated as honorable men. But, if this member of Congress did wrong in socially countenancing a man whom he believed to be a rascal, how could he have done right in taking the quiet chop and smoking the peaceful pipe with another man whom he believed to be a much greater rascal? When an especially brazen and outrageous offender is arraigned before any kind of tribunal, there is always some one who thinks to establish his own charity by saying that he who is without sin may cast the first stone. As a reproof to censoriousness, which was the significance of its first application, this is a wise and timely maxim. As an exhortation to constant forbearance and charity, it is a comfortable scripture. But when a fellow is caught smearing a baby with kerosene and scraping a match, or in the act of blocking the track of an elevated road so as certainly to throw the train into the street below, is it then Christian charity to whisper that he who is without sin may cast the first stone? Then let us close the courts and raze the prisons, and the more nton and cruel murders an assassin mmits, the more heavenly let our arity be in blessing him on his way commit more.—"Editor's Easy air," in Harper's Magazine for ne.

Land of "Magnificent Distances."

The enormous extent of the territory er which the Hudson Bay Company rries on its trade, and throughout ich depots and posts are established, n scarcely be comprehended at a rely cursory glance. From Pembina, the Red river, to Fort Anderson, on Mackenzie, is as great a distance as m London to Mecca; the space been the company's post at Sault Ste. rie and Fort Simpson, on the Paic, measures more than 2,500 geoaphical miles; from King's posts to Pelly banks is farther than from ris to Samarcand. The area of coun under its immediate influence is out 4,500,000 square miles, or more n one-third greater than the whole tent of Europe.

For the purposes of trade the original artered territories of the company, d the vast outlying circuit of comrcial relations, are divided into secns called the Northern, Southern, ntreal and Western departments. these the Northern department is uated between Hudson bay and the cky mountains; the Southern been James bay and Canada, includg also East Main, on the eastern shore Hudson bay; the Montreal department mprehends the extent of the business the Canadas; while the Western mprises the regions west of the Rocky ountains. These four departments again divided into fifty-three smaller portions, called districts, each of ich is under the direction of a superending officer, and has a depot fort, to ich all the supplies for the district are forwarded, and to which all furs and other produce are sent for shipment to England. These districts are again subdivided into numerous minor establishments, forts, posts and outposts. Over each of these there is an officer and from two to forty men, mechanics, laborers and servants. Besides the company employs multitudes of men as voyageurs, manning and working the boats and canoes in every part of the territory. The discipline and etiquette maintained are of the strictest kind, and an esprit du corps exists between the 3,000 officers—commissioned and non-commissioned—voyageurs, and servants such as is only to be found in the army, or in an ancient and honorable service.

The forts and trading posts of the company are scattered over its immense territories at distances apart varying from 50 to 300 miles. A better idea may, perhaps, be obtained of their relative positions, and of the isolated lives of their garrisons, by imagining the broad State of Ohio planted in the middle of the fur country. In that event the company would build one trading post in it.—H. M. Robinson, in Harper's Magazine for June.

The Longest Unnavigable Stream in the World.

The Dakota river, vulgarly known as "Jim" river, is a stream worthy of more than passing notice. Geographical writers have heretofore paid little attention to this great water-course, with its commonplace nickname, mostly, we presume, because they have never had their attention directed to the fact that it is the longest river in the world not capable of being navigated in any of its parts. Having directed attention to this striking feature of its physical make-up, an explanation of how it acquired its homely pseudonym may prove of interest. The early French traders and missionaries who came this way gave it its original appellation, and among them it was know as River aux Jacques. This was afterward Anglicized to plain James river, and speedily vulgarized into the more repugnant title of Jim river. Congress, in 1861, took the subject in hand, having, perhaps, a vague idea of the part which this extensive stream is to take in the future of the new West, and decreed that "it shall hereafter be called the Dakota river." But Congressional enactments are not always strictly obeyed, and in this case there seems to be no disposition to accord to the Dakota its legal cognomen. It is known as the Jim, is spoken of as the Jim, and printed the Jim oftener than any other way. But there is not much of anything in a name. The river is there and it will doubtless flow on forever, whether it be known as the Dakota, the James or plain Jim. We have stated that it is the longest stream in the world which cannot be navigated in any portion by steam vessels. This we believe to be the fact. It rises near latitude 48 degrees and traverses 525 miles of country. It is an exceedingly crooked stream, constantly doubling upon itself and crossing and winding along in its prairie bed. Though we have no official measurement of its crooks and curves, its actual length cannot be less than 1,000 miles. Throughout a large portion of its length it maintains a nearly-uniform depth and breadth and moves with sluggish current. These are a few of the characteristics of the Dakota river, which waters a valley of incomparable native richness. Settlers are now flocking to its banks, and in a year or two every quarter section of the valley will be occupied and worked.—Yankton Press.

Torture with the Cactus.

In all that wide land around the headwaters of the Rio Grande and Arkansas rivers—from Purgatory river, in Colorado, far west across New Mexico and Arizona as well—is kept alive the same religious superstition that held in Mexico in the sixteenth century. An incident of last Good Friday will serve to illustrate the degree to which fanaticism is carried among the order of men known as the Penitentes, who live in the region indicated, but who are neither clerics or recluses. There are three lodges of Penitentes in the neighborhood of Trinidad. On Good Friday morning thirty men gathered in the main lodge, and, preceded by a man who staggered under a heavy cross, marched to the river Purgatoire. The men wore no garment but their drawers. Every one carried in his hand a stem of cactus three feet long. The cactus is thickly set with needle-like spikes, about an inch sharp, the spike being slightly barbed. Soon after leaving the lodge the procession set up a chant, all lashing their backs, necks and chests as they cried their harsh Latin. They moved into the Purgatoire, the waters of which were red with blood, and, the cross-bearer having planted his emblem on a high hill beyond the river, all knelt before it, beating themselves ceaselessly with the cactus. A quarter of an hour ended the prostrations, when the procession returned as they came. Every blow left a long trail of blood. Red lines crossed the men's shoulders in every direction, and every back was a mass of red, raw, quivering flesh. Two men fainted and were dragged along with their fellows. One, recovering from his faint, began the laceration afresh. This spectacle was witnessed by the citizens of Trinidad and large numbers who had gathered from the surrounding country, and was described by a correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, sent thither for the purpose. The leaders of the Penitentes are Casimiro Barela, a Colorado State Senator, and Jesus Maria Gracia, a County Clerk at Trinidad.

Cheap Jellies.

Baltimore is the champion city of America for the manufacture of cheap jellies. It is well understood that the jelly is an animal rather than a vegetable product, being simply gelatine, colored and flavored according to the fruit that is to be represented. Boston jelly is chiefly made of apples, also flavored and colored in imitation of other fruits, and the imposition is discovered by very few. It costs 14 cents a pound, which is about what the genuine fruits represented can be supplied for.—New York Herald.

Stirring wrath in souls pacific;
Blighting visions beatific;
Thwarting agents soporific
With horrid din;
Tempting even spirits saintly
To utter—almost—low and faintly,
Words divided very scantly
From words of sin?

O ye brutes, my windows under!
Sleep and me who widely sunder,
O for power for once to thunder

O for boot-jacks, half a hundred!
O for hand that never blundered,

Cataracts be on ye falling!
Curse, concatenate, appalling,
Stop your ghoulish caterwauling,

Ice in the Sick-Room.—Mention is made in a foreign paper of a plan pursued by an ingenious physician for insuring a supply of ice for use in sick-rooms during the hottest nights, and without disturbing the patient. This plan is to cut a piece of flannel about nine inches square, and secure it by ligature round the mouth of an ordinary tumbler, so as to leave a cup-shaped depression of flannel within the tumbler to about half its depth. In the flannel so formed pieces of ice may be preserved many hours—all the longer if a piece of flannel from four to five inches square be used as a loose cover to the ice-cup. Cheap flannel, with comparatively open meshes, is preferable, as the water easily drains through it, and the ice is kept quite dry.

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

The Queen o' May.

The Queen o' May, she comes this way
With all things fresh and green—
By grace of fate a potentate;
Yes, every inch a queen!

She takes her stand, she rules the land;
She rules this house and me;
She rules my wife, my children all,
My very purse rules she.

Make room! make room! her busy broom
Waves in baleful air;
A dusting brush her scepter is,
Her throne is everywhere.

She rubbeth well, she scrubbeth well
She scrapes, and pokes, and pries;
O hidden haunts of dust, beware
The flashing of her eyes!

The Queen o' May works by the day;
Her forces, how they rush;
The household gods bow down and quail
Before her busy brush.

Where'er you roam through home, sweet home,
You tread on soap and tacks;
And when you sit, your wounds to nurse,
The chairs loom up in stacks.

Your boots, your traps your hoods and maps,
Your coats, your deeds of trust,
Lie massed with carpets newly raised,
All smothering in dust.

You moan "Keep cool!" your soul to school;
Pass in your beaver lies;
Your razor as a household tool
Is used before your eyes.

Ah, woman's will is blessed still;
We'll let her have her way,
But in heaven's dustless mansions, sure
This sort of thing won't pay.
We'll need no whitewashing up there;
There'll be no pail upon the stair;
And no such thing as moving day—
No, sir. Nor any Queen o' May

A Glimpse at Jenny Lind.

And, before I quit the theme of song and singers, let me mention a glimpse that I caught before leaving London of one of the celebrities of the past. On leaving the home of Mme. Albani I crossed the street to look at the dwelling of Jenny Lind. The house stands back from the street, and a garden that must in summer be a very bouquet of flowers and verdure extends in front of it. A bust of the great singer, life size, and in marble, stands in the large bay window that fronts the garden. And beside the bust sat an elderly lady in a white mob-cap and white cashmere shawl, engaged in partaking of the afternoon cup of tea that forms so prominent a feature in English social life. She was talking to some one in the room, and as she turned to the window I saw again the face that I had last looked upon, crowned with roses and lighted with inspiration, on the stage of Tripler Hall, 28 long years ago. Under the disfiguring cap the fair hair, now plentifully streaked with gray, was seen rolled back in precisely the same fashion as that which set all the girls in America to twisting back their tresses in those bygone years. In other respects Jenny Lind has greatly changed. Few could have recognized in the pale, worn lineaments of the elderly lady the well-nigh angelic countenance of the greatest singer of our day and generation. I permitted myself but one glance, not wishing to violate, even by a look, the sanctity of that tranquil home. I am told that Mme. Lind-Goldschmidt, as she styles herself, is very eccentric and peculiar. She still interests herself in music, being the leader of the Bach Choir, a private association, to which some of the first ladies in London belong; and so severe is she in her requirements, and so strict in demanding their fulfillment, that her high-born pupils are often tempted to rebel.—*Corres. Sentimental and Tragic Flirts.

How much mischief these sentimental flirts do in their day! They give you the impression that you and only you are the one sweet woman whose love is needed for their happiness. Your touch can heal them, your smile rejoice, your love render blessed. You give in to the fond illusion—one of the most seductive to a true woman—and find that you are just taken as an experimentalist takes a cat or a dog for vivisection; and that you are only one of many who has been so taken before you—to illustrate that point of female credulity and womanly soft heartedness which the flirt has set himself to learn by all the methods given to man. Or take the tragic flirt from the other side of the house, that beautiful little woman with the big eyes and melodious voice, who sings sad love songs as if she felt them, and around whom melancholy clings as a graceful garment, how many men has she not captured and drowned in the unfathomable abyss of her vanity. She looks all sorrow, and her life has not a cloud; she seems all sentiment, and no neither millstone is harder, more prosaic; she gives you the impression of one seeking consolation, and the merriest little grig who dances all night in pink and rosebuds is not more light of heart, more free from care. She is a sham all throughout, and she attitudinizes—she does not feel. But clever men believe in her and good ones fall down and worship her, and she rides on the crest of the wave in the world's esteem, while her sister, who disdains falsehood and coquetry alike, gets only scant admiration, and her heart, which never deceived human being, is disregarded as a common kind of thing, worth little love and less endeavor.—Home Journal.

Weary Women.

Nothing is more reprehensible and thoroughly wrong than the idea that a woman fulfills her duty by doing an amount of work that is far beyond her strength. She not only does not fulfill her duty, but she most signally fails in it, and the failure is truly deplorable. There can be no sadder sight than that of a broken-down, over-worked wife and mother—a woman who is tired all her life through. If the work of the household cannot be accomplished by order, system and moderate work, without the necessity of wearing, heart-breaking toil—toil that is never ended and never begun, without making life a treadmill of labor, then, for the sake of humanity let the work go. Better to live in the midst of disorder than that order should be purchased at so high a price—the cost of health strength, happiness and all that makes existence endurable. The woman who spends her life in unnecessary labor is by this very labor unfitted for the highest duties of home. She should be the haven of rest to which both husband and children turn for peace and refreshment. She should be the careful, intelligent adviser and guide of the one, the tender confidant and helpmate of the other. How is it possible for a woman exhausted in body as a natural consequence in mind also, to perform either of these offices? No, it is not possible. The constant strain is too great. Nature gives way beneath it. She loses health and spirits and hopefulness, and, more than all, her youth, the last thing that a woman should allow to slip from her, for, no matter how old she is in years, she should be young in heart and feeling, for the youth of age is sometimes more attractive than youth itself. To the overworked woman this green old age is out of the question; old age comes on her sere and yellow before its time. Her disposition is ruined, her temper is soured, her very nature is changed, by the burden which, too heavy to carry, is dragged along as long as wearied feet and tired hands can do their part. Even her affections are blunted, and she becomes merely a machine—a woman without the time to be womanly, a mother without the time to train and guide her children as only a mother can, a wife without the time to sympathize with and cheer her husband, a woman so overworked during the day that when night comes her sole thought and most intense longing is for the rest and sleep that very probably will not come; and, even if it should, that she is too tired to enjoy. Better by far let everything go unfinished, to live as best she can, than to entail on herself and family the curse of overwork."—Sanitary Magazine.

Wreaths of Tulle and an Opera Hat.

Mme. Taglioni's horror of the wreath of tulle which the ballet dancer of the present day wears around her waist is quite interesting. And it is not only in the cause of modesty, but of art, that she objects to the fashion. It may be well asked whether anything more ugly and offering a greater offense to the beauty of the human form could be invented. Mme. Taglioni would not find it so hard to approve the fashion if it were only indecorous, instead of being ugly as well, although she herself was never persuaded to wear a petticoat which would show her knee. She has been audacious enough to believe that feminine modesty can be as fascinating as feminine immodesty; her creed being that the very foundation of the art of dancing is never to forget one's sex, as so many dancers do. Once at Milan, an Austrian gentleman, to whom she had a letter of introduction, when calling upon her, made this pathetic appeal: "Oh, Mme. Taglioni, will you excuse my asking you whether it would not be possible to have your skirts made a little shorter?" Madame replied by another question: "Allow me to ask you if you are married?" "No," he answered. "If you were married, would you like to see your wife or your daughters in such short dress?" "Why, no." "Well," said Madame, "I dance not for you, but your wives and daughters." In Russia, on one occasion when Taglioni was dancing, some told the Emperor Nicholas that it was impossible to see her knee. He was so surprised that he left his box and went down into the stalls in order to try and catch a glimpse of it. But he was disappointed, it was impossible; the dancer's dress was well calculated to baffle even gazers from the stalls. Taglioni herself was edified during the performance by being told that the emperor had gone below in order to try to see her knees. The dress which she wore is one which now looks quaint. What she wore the others wore, for, from her first appearance, the fashion was set by her, so that she carried an atmosphere of grace and modesty on to the stage. In her zenith, Taglioni not only set the fashions on the stage, but even off it. She has been heard to relate a funny story illustrating the quickness with which she was copied in anything she wore. In Paris, she was going one night to the opera, and took out fresh from its box a new had just received from her modiste, Mme. Alexandre Baudrant, a celebrity of the day. This was in the time when ladies wore hats at the opera; and her new hat being very pretty, of a fine and delicate straw, she straightway put it on for the occasion. A few days afterward her milliner came to her in consternation. "Mme Taglioni, what have you been doing? I turned back the brim of your hat, because it was so delicate, that it might not be hurt in the box, and you have worn it so at the opera!" "O?" said Taglioni, "I supposed it was a new fashion." And so it was, Taglioni having worn it; next week all the ladies went to the opera with hats turned back at the brim.—University Magazine.

Transparent colored curtains of Madras cloth are pretty for summer.

The Louis XIII. style is already used by a few of the French dressmakers.

Almost any kind of a large bib or collar is fashionable now.

Old-fashioned cashmere shawls with narrow borders are preferred to all others in Paris.

Some new waists are not only laced at the back, but have vests of lace set in front, over which the waist seems laced with flat galloon.

Miss Dods, the Philadelphia cooking teacher, wears a black gown and white apron while lecturing, and decorates herself with a gold necklace and a locket as big and bright as a pie plate.

Dresses are growing fuller, and are more and more puffed at the back, but some have no polonaise or overskirt, or even the simulation of anything of the kind by trimmings.

A French woman, who wishes the world to understand that she is not in mourning, fastens a small colored flower encircled with black feathers in the back of the black bonnet which she wears.

Flower bonnets should be made of flowers actually in season. Cherries, currants and strawberries are already in preparation for the fruit bonnets which are said to be coming next.

Plush will, it is said, be used by the milliners through the summer; and plush strings are said to be among the coming tortures in preparation for the dog-days.

A frill of yellow or crimson silk edged with lace is recommended for a lamp shade by the Art Interchange. A frame of coarse net covered with artificial flowers looks pretty, and a handkerchief-shaped lace with a circle cut out of the centre is effective.

Among the wedding gowns soon to be worn in New York are several in which pale pink and pale yellow are employed, and the wreath of orange blossoms are mingled with blush roses both in the Worth and Pingat costumes. An actress who was married on Saturday last wore lace and sulphur-tinted brocade, embroidered with seed pearls, but the most gorgeous of all the gowns is of gauze interwoven with gold threads, and trimmed with pearl and Honiton.

Living jewelware to be worn in Paris, says the Paris Figaro—beetles brought from Yucatan, on the Gulf of Mexico. These beetles are dead gold in color, with coon black markings, and their feet sparkle like the glowworm. They are to be fastened on different colored satin ribbons by delicate golden chains, and can only be worn in well warmed rooms, being generally kept in a flannel envelope. In Cuba the Havanaise creoles frequently wear the cucujas—sparkling flies, imprisoned in white tulle.

A Thick-Skulled Negro.

Every man graduated from Williams College within the last twenty-five years has some recollection of Abe Parsons, or Abe "Bunter," as he is more commonly called, from his butting propensities. A correspondent of the Boston Journal writes: "Little is known of his early life, but he was owned as a slave and ran away to obtain his freedom. The story is told of his recognizing the picture of his old mistress, who had aided him to escape, in the room of one of the students, who was her son, and that after that she used to send him aid. The most powerful blows had no effect on his cranium. Two-inch plank are shivered at a single blow. At an agricultural fair he was once giving an exhibition of his powers by breaking cheeses, which had been place in bags, but a grindstone had been substituted for one of them. The first blow failed to break it, but, nothing daunted, he made the attempt the second time, and sure enough broke it quite to pieces. At a fire once some men had been trying to break in a strong door with axes, but they did not succeed in making an entrance till his power was put into use, when the door quickly yielded. A thousand stories might be told of his wonderful feats, but nothing has brought him into notoriety so much as his connection with J. Frank Baxter, the Spiritualist medium. At one of the Spiritualistic camp-meetings at Lake Pleasant, Baxter brought up his spirit and gave a detailed account of his exploits, but Abe proved too lively a ghost for him, as he was not dead, although reports of his death had been published. He is now about 70 years of age, but though he has given up some of his feats he can still make quick work with a dry-goods box or door of ordinary thickness."

Theories to Cure the Commercial System.

Our present commercial system is so complex that theorists for the most part are able to approach it from many different sides, and see only a little piece at a time. One sees one set of circumstances and cries over-production; another studies another set and declares an opposite view—too little work done. One says the rate of wages paid to the operatives has done the mischief; another attributes it to the lavish expenditure of the master. One cries we are beaten by cheap labor; another, we are lagging behind while others have been advancing in skill. One says the telegraph has rendered unnecessary the former large holdings of surplus stocks, and these must be worked off before the average demand can again come into play. Another view is that stagnation is due to antiquated machinery of business being attempted to be used when the conditions to which it was once suited are entirely changed. Another says that free trade is all a mistake, and we must revert to antiquated theories of protection. Who can decide for himself amid such a chaos of views? All the trader can do is to work on at the best he can, or deal in what he can, and wait patiently as his fathers had to wait before him. These forefathers no doubt bore their yoke more meekly, being without that intense apprehensiveness which makes a time of trouble come before it comes, and last after it is gone. —The University Magazine.

Her Looks Got the Citron.

In a pleasant little family in this city there is a bright-eyed, golden-haired 5-year-old girl named Louise. The family has a young lady boarder named Miss Annie. The young lady had some nice cake and a jar of citron sent her a few days ago by her mother, and she had been very liberal in dividing her good things with the family, and especially with little Louise. Yesterday morning Louise said: "Mamma, I believe I will go up stairs and ask Miss Annie for some citron." "Oh! no," remarked her mother, "you have already eaten up nearly all of Miss Annie's citron; and, besides, it would be very unladylike to ask Miss Annie for it." "Well, mamma," suggested Louise, "I will just go up stairs and stand and look like I want some." She went up stairs, an it is needless to say that her looks go the citron.—Nashville (Tenn.) Am

The Dolls of Japan.

The dolls of Japan are quite an institution, and are the funniest things imaginable. They look so like real babies and children, and I have often been deceived when I have seen them in the arms, carried about the streets. Besides playing with dolls New Year's time, and any other when they choose, there are two days set apart in April for what is called a "dolls festival," and all the girls, and even big women, make a great time of it. They take them out to walk and visit, and get new dresses for them, and treat them just as tenderly as if they were live children. You may think it funny for women to do this, but the poor Japanese women have a very aimless life, and I think playing with dolls is about as harmless a way for them to get pleasure as they could find.

When the hand-bill distributor begins to ignore you it is high time to get a new suit of clothes.

CURIOSITIES OF COURTSHIP.

Courtship, it will be admitted, is a very ancient practice, and prevails everywhere. And yet, whatever may be the inner and concealed lines on which it is conducted, the external and visible ones vary with the country, age and circumstances. In some lands it is an affair of the state, and with certain people it is a mere matter of family arrangement; with others the adjustment of a few financial questions. In such instances the true fire and inspiration of love—the "stound"—which give life to the forms of courtship, are of necessity absent. The following curiosities of courtship in its various phases may interest our readers:

WILLIAM DRUMMOND, THE POET,

wooed and won Miss Cunningham, a beautiful and accomplished young lady, who died when the wedding day was fixed. This melancholy event so overwhelmed the poet with grief that he never ceased to pour fresh tears over her grave. At least for many years after the death of Miss Cunningham life seemed to Drummond a "nought, a thought, a masquerade of dreams." He lived in a state of celibacy till the age of 47, when he married Elizabeth Logan, a lady in whom he traced many strong resemblances to her whom he first loved, and by whom he was so greatly charmed.

SHE LOOKED LIKE HIS FIRST WIFE.

A gentleman in Nottingham, looking from his window one day, saw a lady pass who looked very much like his late wife. He made haste after her, and, having succeeded in obtaining all necessary information, she was married to him because of the likeness she bore to the one he had tenderly loved.

Reported virtues have sometimes paved the way to the most romantic attachments. Colonel Hutchinson, governor of Nottingham castle and town in the time of the civil war, being at the house of Sir Allen Apsley, was greatly pleased with a child of a pleasant and vivacious spirit. One day when looking on a shelf, he found a few Latin books, and, asking whose they were, he was told by the young miss that they were her eldest sister's. He at once wished to see her; but as she was gone from home he was not likely to have his wish fulfilled. Meanwhile gentlewomen who had been Miss Apsley's companions used to tell him how reserved and studious she was, and these reports so inflamed his desire to see her, that he began to wonder why he should have such a strong impulse toward one whom he had never seen. There scarcely passed a day but some accident or discourse still kept alive and strengthened his wish to see her. Once in a company at a gentleman's house a certain song was sung which was said to have been written by Miss Apsley, who, by-the-by, was greatly praised by two or three gentlemen in the party. He (Mr. Hutchinson) heard all this, and said to one of the gentlemen: "I cannot be at rest till this lady return, that I may be acquainted with her." The same evening, while they were at supper, some statement was made which gave him the impression that the young lady was married. He was then taken ill immediately, and had to leave the table. He, however, learned shortly after that his impressions were wrong. Afterward they were fortunate enough to meet, and a friendship at once created which ripened into strong affection. Devotedly attached to her, she became to him a most admirable wife and companion, and lived to be the writer of the "History of the Siege of Nottingham Castle." Another instance of is told of the Rev. Joseph Gilbert, who was so charmed with the writings of Miss Anna Taylor and the eulogium of her personal merits pronounced by those acquainted with her, that, without having seen her, he addressed a letter to the young lady, inquiring whether any peremptory reasons existed which might lead him to conclude that a journey undertaken with the purpose of soliciting her heart and hand could not possibly be successful. After a little correspondence, the journey was permitted, and an interview was obtained, which ripened into happy wedded life.

The celebrated John Newton, of Olney, fell in love with a Kentish maid

AT FIRST SIGHT.

The girl was under fourteen years of age; but such was the impression she made on young Newton that his affection for her appears to have equaled all that the writers of romance have imagined. When in distant parts of the world, the thought of her checked him in a profligate career. When sinking on the coast of Africa into a wretched state of slavery and when ready to put an end to his life, the thought of her aroused him to energy and inspired him with hope. All the impressions and scenes of misery and wickedness through which he had passed never had banished her from his waking thoughts for the following seven years. When he lived London he would repair twice a week to Shooter's Hill, and from the top of that eminence comfort himself with a distant view of the district in which his loved once lived. Not that he could see the spot him itself, which was in reality too remote; but it gratified him even to look toward the spot. She eventually became the bright star of his life.

The Rev. Joseph Hall, Bishop of Norwich, and author of "Contemplations of the Old and New Testament," obtained a wife in a very singular manner. In walking from the church one Whit-Monday with a grave and reverend minister of the name of Grandidge, he saw a comely, modest gentlewoman standing at the door of a house where they were invited to a wedding dinner. Mr. Hall inquired of his friend whether he knew her.

"Yes," said Mr. Grandidge, "I know her well, and

I HAVE BESPOKE HER FOR YOUR WIFE.

She is the daughter of a gentleman whom I much respect, Mr. George Winniff, of Bretenham; and out of the opinion I have of the match for you, I have already treated about it with her father, whom I found very apt to entertain it." Mr. Hall, too, it seems, was equally apt to entertain it; for he says: "Being advised not to neglect the opportunity, and not concealing the just praises of the modesty, piety, good disposition and other virtues that were lodged in that seemly presence, I listened to the motion as sent from God." On this motion Mr. Hall acted; he spoke the necessary words; and at last, with due prosecution, happily prevailed, enjoying the society of that charming helpmate for the space of forty-five years.

THE CELEBRATED GEORGE WHITEFIELD began his courtship in a singular fashion. His biographer pronounces him one of the oddest wooers that ever wooed. When Whitefield was in America, and had under his charge the Orphan House in Savannah, "it was much impressed on his heart that he ought to marry in order to have a helpmate in his arduous work." He had also fixed his mind on the young lady whom he intended to ask to become his wife. So he addressed a letter to her parents, and inclosed another to herself. In his letter to the parents he stated that he wanted a wife to help him in the management of his increasing family, and then said: "This letter comes like Abraham's servant to Rebekah's relations, to know whether your daughter, Miss E——, is a proper person to engage in such an undertaking; and, if so, whether you will be pleased to give me leave to propose to her. You need not be afraid of sending me a refusal; for I bless God, if I know anything of my own heart, I am free from that foolish passion which the world calls love." He wrote in a similar strain to the young lady, asking her, among many other questions, if she could leave her home and trust in Him for support who feeds the young ravens; and bear the inclemencies of air both as to heat and cold in a foreign climate; whether, having a husband, she could be as though she had none. He also told her that he thought the passionate expressions which ordinary courtiers use ought to be avoided by those who marry in the Lord; and that if she thought marriage would in any way be prejudicial to her better part, she was to be so kind as to send him a denial; that she need not be afraid to speak her mind, as he loved her only for God.

The letters were not so successful as Abraham's servants. The parents were not very anxious to send their daughter on such an adventure; and Whitefield continued for a longer space in his bachelor condition. Some time after he essayed another courtship with a widow in Wales after the same style. The mode in which Rebekah was chosen for Isaac seems to have been Whitefield's ideal of obtaining a wife. The week after he was married he went on one of his evangelistic tours, and left his newly-wedded wife to muse alone amid the Welsh hills in the second quarter of their honeymoon.

HOW A PAINTER WON A WIFE.

Thomas Gainsborough's young friend (a commercial traveler in his father's establishment) had a sister, Miss Margaret Burr, an extraordinary beauty. That Miss Burr should wish to have her portrait painted by her brother's friend, is not a matter of wonder. Neither is it a wonder that the sittings should be numerous and protracted, for such they were declared to have been. The likeness was at last finished, and pronounced by competent judges perfect. The young lady greatly admired the painter's skill, and in glowing terms expressed her appreciation of the portrait, and in doing so gave the artist the gentlest possible hint that perhaps in time he might become the possessor of the original. On that hint Gainsborough spoke the magic word, and after a short courtship was rewarded by her hand, and each lent brightness to the other's life.—Chambers' Journal.

What was the Matter?

John J. Andrews, a Philadelphia merchant, lost the sight of his left eye twenty years ago, and physicians told him there was no cure. The useless member gave him no trouble until 1877, but thereafter it was occasionally so painful that he writhed on the floor until the attack was over. Many of the best oculists made careful examinations and were unable to ascertain the nature of the disease. Lately he put himself into the hands of a Philadelphia physician, of whose investigation he says: "He blistered me around the eye to draw out the inflammation, and at last he said: 'I know what it is not; it is not inflammation, and that is one point gained.' He drew out a diseased tooth and cut out a piece of the jaw bone and did some probing; finally he said: 'It does not come from a tooth nerve, and that is another point gained.' He dosed me with quinine until he was satisfied, and then he said: 'It is not miasma, and that is another point gained.' Last Thursday he put me into a darkened room, and, throwing an indescribably bright light into my eye, looked into my eye for two mortal hours. At last he exclaimed: 'I have the secret.' Looking in through the pupil of the eye he could see a live cysticercus, or embryo tape worm." This was the first case in America, and was exhibited to most of the physicians of Philadelphia. An operation with a knife removed the creature.

New Preservative Agent.

During some experiments in separating sugar from molasses a double salt of borate of potassium and sodium were found that proved to have valuable antiseptic properties. This salt is now manufactured on a commercial scale, and costs about ten cents a kilogram. It is obtained by dissolving in water equal quantities of chloride of potassium, nitrate of sodium and boric acid, filtering and evaporating to dryness. The salt is said to be quite deliquescent and must be kept in tight bottles. It is quick in action, retains its qualities for a long time and has no injurious effect on the taste, smell, or healthfulness of the substance to which it is applied. It has already found a use in making sausages, in preserving meats, in tanning and butter-making. A small quantity of the salt added to milk will preserve it in good condition for a week. It is also used in preserving beers and wines and is being made the subject of experiment in several other directions.—Scribner for June.

A Washington paper, by mixing two items, said to its readers: "A big bell has been given to the Newark mission chapel, and on the bell is this inscription: Deckertown is supplied at 3 cents a quart. Washington pays 5 cents a quart."

A RURAL RHYME.

"O maiden sweet, with delicate feet,
Tripping the fair fields over,
What do you seek by the gurgling creek
And amid the dewy clover?"
"Why, Mister," she said, "you don't know beans
I'm gatherin' yaller dock for greens."

HUMOROUS.

The oldest verse in existence—the universe.

"Don't you mean to marry again, Deacon Jones?" asked widow Simpkins. "No," growled he, "I'd rather lose what ribs I've got than take any more."

The older we grow, the more we enjoy friendly reunion, and naturally, because the nearer the bourne the sweeter the meet.

"My Soul's at the Gate," is the title of a new piece of music. He had better be careful or he may find the old man's sole at the gate, too, some of these fine evenings.—Cincinnati Saturday Night.

"What's de time o' day, ole woman?" said a colored countryman to Aunt Milly, trying to poke fun at the brass chain that held her front door key around her neck. "Look at de town clock, chile. Dat's built for po' folks."

"Why," asked a governess of her little charge, "do we pray God to give us our daily bread? Why don't we ask for four days, or five days, or a week?" "Because we want it fresh," replied the ingenious child.

Little six-year-old was obliged to take a dose of medicine that left an unpleasant taste in the mouth. When asked how he liked it he said, "It's good enough, all but the end of it."—New Haven Register.

It is stated that a little girl at Lewiston, in this state, has committed the whole of the New Testament to memory. It is hardly probable that she will grow up and marry a coachman.—Philadelphia Times.

Last Sunday a Sunderland, Mass., superintendent, after the lesson was closed, asked the little boys the following questions from the smaller question-book: "Who knows better than father or mother?" A little 5-years-old promptly answered, "I do."

And now the tackmakers are going to strike. We have seen the time when we should like to strike a tackmaster, and while on our knees, too. But being but a carpet knight, we struck the tack instead of the tackmaster.—Boston Transcript.

"John, did you go round and ask how old Mrs. Jones was this morning, as I told you to do last night?" "Yes, sir." "Well, what was the result?" "She said that seeing as how you had the impudence to send to ask how old she was, she'd no objection to telling you she's seventy-four."

"Professor," said the cheeky soph., "is there any danger of disturbing the magnetic currents if I examine that compass too closely?" And the stern professor loving his little joke, promptly responded: "No, sir; brass has no effect whatever on them;" thereby scoring three against the unsuspecting man of cribs.—Acta Columbiana.

The latest swindle is reported from Stanstead, Que. A peddler went about selling ten cent packages "warranted sure death to potato bugs; no risk of poisoning animals with Paris green." The packages were not to be opened until time to use them. One victim, having three, opened one, and found two square blocks of wood; on one was written, "place the bug on this block and press firmly with the other."

A gentleman not extremely given to piety was dismayed by being asked to say grace at a strange table. To refuse and explain, would be embarrassing; to comply would be equally so. He chose the latter, and started off briskly enough with "Oh, Lord, bless this table." Just here, being unused to the business, he nearly broke down, but by a gigantic effort pulled through with "World without end. Yours, respectfully, amen."

It isn't the frail, delicate girl, with the soft, gazelle-like eyes, that the divine afflatus of spring poetry rests upon. Not at all. The genius of rhyme and rhythm is more often found in the robust and somewhat wrinkled maiden of 40 summers, with a good appetite and superb digestion. Young man, beware of the rhyming female. She is the most expensive kind to feed.—New Haven Register.

There were two suitors to one girl in Des Moines. She married No. 1 while No. 2 was out of town, and on No. 2's return he called on her without knowing what had happened. There was his rival in the parlor, but he resolved to "sit it out." The girl made no explanation, and the hours passed until midnight. Then No. 1 said: "Excuse me, sir, but we desire to go to bed." No. 2 was dumbfounded.

Prepare for hot weather. Consign your hibernal integument to the pungent camphor, and smooth the creases out of your linen duster. Send your grass hat to the bleachers and resurrect your napkins from their winter's sleep, and be ready with your slender stick to rally forth to meet the vertical sun. "But," you say, "I may not be alive." True, true; but don't let that trouble you; make your preparations for warmth just the same.—Boston Transcript.

A LEADVILLE ROMANCE.

A Grass Widow's Adventures in the New Town.

[Leadville Eclipse.]

Leadville is now passing through its most romantic period, and from now until we settle into a city of one hundred thousand inhabitants such incidents as we are about to relate will be of not unfrequent occurrence. The circumstances came to the knowledge of a reporter at the dinner table this afternoon, and acting on the hint, the clue was followed up until at last one of those life histories, which occur now and then, and inspire new faith in human nature, was revealed. Five years ago a young man whom we shall call Smith because that is not his name, was married to a beautiful girl in one of the interior towns of Iowa. Smith was then only twenty-two years old, and, though intelligent, well-educated and active, was only a clerk in a dry-goods store, depending upon a meager salary for subsistence. Common prudence should have dictated to the young couple the propriety of waiting, but they loved each other, and laughed at the future. The father of the young lady was one of the pioneers of the town, rich, haughty and purseproud. He was enraged at the match, and coarsely told the delicate young girl that she had made a hard bed for herself and must lie on it. With an amount of money ridiculously small, considering his wealth, he dismissed her finally. The couple went to housekeeping, but with all their love and economy failed to make both ends meet. The money, which the young wife brought was expended during the first year, and love, which "laughed at locksmiths," flew out of the window when poverty came in at the door. Misunderstanding, bickerings and quarrels followed each other in rapid succession, and finally it seemed to the unhappy pair that it was impossible for them to live together, and, after a somewhat more violent scene than usual, Mrs. Smith took her babe and went to her father's, only to have the door shut in her face. Returning to her own home she found her husband had left a note stating that she would never see him again. In a fit of desperation, she sold her stock of furniture, placed her babe in the charge of her husband's parents, with money enough to make it comfortable for a year, and started for a large city to make a living. This was only a little more than a year ago. The old story of a young, refined and unprotected female in a large city was reenacted in her case. She fell, and in three months had become reckless. Always finding admirers, she drifted from city to city, occasionally sending a little money for the care of her babe, which she loved with passionate tenderness. During all this time however, she never forgot her husband, having learned that her love had been clouded, not extinguished. Last week she arrived in Leadville. As she descended from the coach she noticed in the throng of bronzed faces one that seemed strangely familiar, though covered with an enormous beard. It disappeared and she went to her lodging with a strange feeling of unrest and isolation. The next day in walking about town she again encountered that face and met a glance that caused her to tremble. In another instant both her hands were seized, and she knew that her husband, whom she had never ceased to love, stood before her. He had come to Leadville immediately after their separation, had prospered and, supposing that she was still at her father's, was about starting for home with sufficient means to establish himself in business in their native town. She told him all; he forgave all, and the next day the strangely-reunited couple left to begin a new and happier life.

◆

The custom of shaving the beard was enforced by Alexander of Macedon, not for the sake of fashion, but for a practical end. He knew that the soldiers of India, when they encountered their foes, had the habit of grasping them by the beard, and so he ordered his soldiers to shave. Afterward shaving was practiced in the Macedonian army, and then among Greek citizens. The Romans imitated the Greeks in the practice, as they did in many other things, and spread it to the different European nations yet barbaric. In the middle ages, at the time of the Renaissance, shaving was introduced, and the habit was retained, though classicism gave place to romanticism, and that, in its turn, was replaced by realism. The beard was a source of trouble to Peter the Great, who, simultaneously with the introduction of his great reforms in Russia, tried to induce his people to imitate the shaving nations. This innovation was resisted by his subjects with the utmost persistence, and they preferred to pay a heavy fine rather than suffer disfigurement, as they believed, of the image of God. To the Russians of olden times the beard was a symbol of liberty. In several countries of western Europe and in the United States the beard was restored to honor only about twenty years ago, but even yet the majority of men respect the custom introduced by Alexander the Great.

Horace Greeley's Shoe-Leather.

Mr. Greeley rolled into the shoemaker's store with that heavy, billowy sort of a gait he had. "Sit down, Mr. Greeley," said the shoe-maker. Greeley looked up with that broad, wondering, half child-like look, and said, "Why, do you know me?" "Every body knows you, Mr. Greeley," was the reply. A comfortable-fitting shoe was tried on. "No, that's altogether too small." Then a shoe that was really altogether too large, but that, too, was not large enough; then a cloth-shoe, so large that Mr. Greeley could put his hands in and arrange his stocking over his foot so as to fit him. He was amazed at the contrast with Broadway prices, not seeing that there was also a contrast with the Broadway quality; bought several pairs like it—all the man had, in fact—and went away greatly delighted, saying that he had a lot of shoes he would send around to be mended. Sure enough, a boy came in a few moments with a small basketful. The shoe-maker pledges me his professional honor that there were not two shoes alike in the whole basket. He hurried around to Mr. Greeley's house, and suggested that as none of the shoes mated, it was of no use to mend them. "Well," said Mr. Greeley, with that confidential half-whisper of his, "the fact is, I put 'em on just as they came along!" And it is not difficult to believe that he did.

A Dress of Spiders' Webs.

A dress woven from the webs of the large spiders common in South America has been presented to Queen Victoria by the Empress of Brazil. It exceeds in fineness any manufactured silk known, and is very handsome. Spaniards nearly two hundred years ago endeavored to make gloves, stockings and other articles of spiders' webs, but they yielded so little profit, and necessitated so much trouble, that the manufacture was abandoned. In 1710 the calculation was made that the webs of 700,000 spiders would be required for about forty yards of silk. Such dresses are occasionally seen in South America.

A Hen Becomes a Rooster.

Six years ago next July, says the Oglethorpe (Ga.) Echo, there was hatched in this section a female chick. With the exception of the usual adventures with hawks and owls, this interesting fowl reached age of pullethood without creating any unusual excitement. She quickly won the hearts of the lords of the barn-yard, and more than one pitched battle was fought for her favor by rival cocks. In time she developed into a steady, matronly hen, and not only proved a good source of eggs, but set upon and hatched five litters of chicks and one of geese, from which feat she was known in the neighborhood as the "gosling hen." Last February, however, a marked change was observed in the subject of this sketch. First the rooster ceased to worship at her shrine. A change was also observed in her general bearing—she assumed decidedly masculine airs, crowing with a voice and tone of a thoroughbred chanticleer; spurs commenced to grow from her heels; the tail feathers lengthened and curved; her comb grew in length, and now this remarkable fowl has developed into a full-fledged rooster. It is now on exhibition at Barrows.

Concerning Tea.

The addition of a few drops of lemon juice, or of any other vegetable acid, renders tea more exciting, and this custom prevails among poor Chinese and many Russians. The addition of an alkali, on the contrary, makes tea less stimulating, and in some measure narcotical. In the east some drugs are put into tea to give aphrosidiacal qualities. Tea excites the movements of the heart less than coffee; it is less hostile to sleep, and is less fit to sustan intellectual labor; but, more than coffee, it increases the eliminative activity of the skin and respiration. In many persons tea produces an astringent effect on the intestine, and a troublesome constipation. The addition of a few drops of generous wine can prevent the wakefulness which tea causes. More than everything, experience availeth to indicate to any one whether from the state of his nerves, his brain, or his digestion, he ought to prefer tea or coffee. In every fashion it seems to be proved that, after dinner, the Chinese leaf ought to be preferred to the Abyssinian berry. In very cold countries, and on very cold days, and consequently with supreme reason in the Arctic zone, tea is the best of drinks, as all travelers have demonstrated. Dr. Kane did not hesitate to call tea the "great panacea of Arctic travel." The excessive use of tea, especially of green tea, produces obstinate wakefulness, nervous tremblings, convulsions, cramps of the stomach, palpitation of the heart, and so on.—Exchange.

WORM SPECIFIC

OR

VERMIFUGE.

SYMPTOMS OF WORMS.

THE countenance is pale and lead-en-colored, with occasional flushes, or a circumscribed spot on one or both cheeks; the eyes become dull; the pupils dilate; an azure semicircle runs along the lower eye-lid; the nose is irritated, swells, and sometimes bleeds; a swelling of the upper lip; occasional headache, with humming or throbbing of the ears; an unusual secretion of saliva; slimy or furred tongue; breath very foul, particularly in the morning; appetite variable, sometimes voracious, with a gnawing sensation of the stomach, at others, entirely gone; fleeting pains in the stomach; occasional nausea and vomiting; violent pains throughout the abdomen; bowels irregular, at times costive; stools slimy, not unfrequently tinged with blood; belly swollen and hard; urine turbid; respiration occasionally difficult, and accompanied by hiccough; cough sometimes dry and convulsive; uneasy and disturbed sleep, with grinding of the teeth; temper variable, but generally irritable, &c.

Whenever the above symptoms
are found to exist,
DR. C. McLANE'S VERMIFUGE
will certainly effect a cure.

IT DOES NOT CONTAIN MERCURY in any form; it is an innocent preparation, not capable of doing the slightest injury to the most tender infant.

The genuine DR. McLANE'S VERMIFUGE bears the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS. on the wrapper.

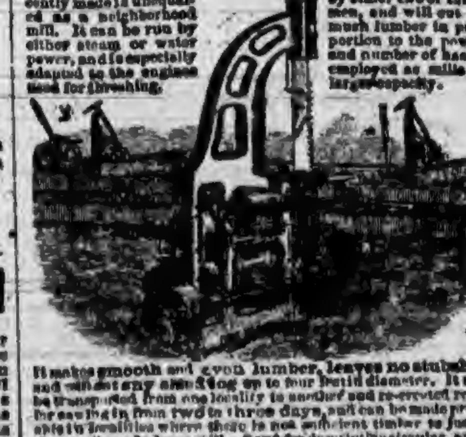
Portable Mulay Saw Mill,



With improvements recently made is unequaled as a neighborhood mill. It can be run by either steam or water power, and is especially adapted to the engines used for threshing.

It may be operated by either two or three men, and will cut as much lumber in proportion to the power and number of hands employed as mills of larger capacity.

It makes smooth and even lumber, leaves no stub-shot and will cut any size log up to four feet in diameter. It may be transported from one locality to another and re-erected ready for sawing in from two to three days, and can be made profitable in localities where there is not sufficient timber to justify the erection of a large mill. Send for descriptive circular, prices, &c., to CHANDLER & TAYLOR, Indianapolis, Ind.

WORLD WONDERS.

Eleven Thousand Years of Winter

Mr G. Hilton Scribner, ex-secretary of state for New York, has been giving to the Troy Times his views on the momentous geological changes through which the earth has passed, and is still passing. Mr. Scribner finds a ready solution of many of the difficulties which perplex the geologist. The epochs through which the globe has passed are due largely, if not wholly, he believes, to the fact that the earth's axis describes a circle in the northern heavens, and that the effect of this is to cause the earth to pass through long winters and summers of 11,000 years each. "During its winter," says Mr. Scribner, "each hemisphere is submerged and [illegible] ocean; its [illegible] decomposed into coal-beds; its whole surface covered with marine deposits and sediment transported and scattered by ocean currents; and thus enriched, it rises again after a long winter of 11,000 years, to be renewed in life, to be clothed in vegetation and beauty, to become again the theater of activity through a vast summer as long as its season of repose. Sixty-five coal-beds in horizontal layers, one above another, have been opened in the British islands, which makes it probable that at least sixty-five of these long years have passed since vegetation [illegible] upon the earth." [illegible] wonderful change in the ocean's level is brought about, Mr. Scribner argues, by a change in the earth's center of gravity, and this again is caused by the vast accumulation of ice around the pole of the hemisphere which is passing through its long winter. "We have supposed this center of gravity of the earth," he says, "to be shifted southward, by the causes enumerated, about two miles, or 10,000 feet. This would increase the depth of water in the southern oceans 10,000 feet, and would decrease the depth of water in the northern oceans 10,000 feet, in order to keep their surfaces equi-distant from the earth's center of gravity, or upon a water level; but to increase the depth of the ocean in the southern hemisphere by an additional 10,000 feet would be to submerge nearly all the lands in the southern hemisphere, and to increase the depth of the ocean by 10,000 feet north of the equator would result in draining off vast continents in the southern hemisphere. This is the exact condition of things which the earth presents." Mr. Scribner cites various facts which he believes to be confirmatory of these views, and finally sums up as follows: "First, the north pole is toward the sun while the earth passes slowly around the longer portion of its orbit. Second, the south pole is toward the sun while the earth moves more rapidly around the shorter portion of its orbit. Third, this gives to the northern hemisphere about three days more of warm and four days less of cold weather than the southern hemisphere receives of each. Fourth, this keeps the ice thinner and with narrower limits at the north pole, and produces vast accumulations of ice about the south pole. Fifth, this changes the center of gravity of the earth to the southward of its center of bulk. Sixth, this causes the oceans to flow from the north, draining off vast continents, to the southern hemisphere, and there submerging others of equal extent; and, lastly, extending the limit of the banana, the vine, of grain and of wood 500 miles farther north than the same varieties are found south of the equator." All of which, if not scientifically accurate, is at least an interesting contribution on a most fascinating subject.

EDISON'S LATEST.

A New Patent Bug that Can Crawl and Draw a Wire.

I heard a funny thing when I was at Menlo last, which has not yet got into the papers, and which tends to excite in any well-regulated mind considerable awe of Edison's genius.

Your readers will remember that one of my letters spoke of the possibility of utilizing the present gas-pipes by running the electric wires through them. "How is the wonderful Edison going to get his wires through the pipes, I should like to know?" asked an unbeliever, with a sneer in the Telegramme. Edison took the paragraph and thought it over.

"Why, see here, Johnson!" he exclaimed the next morning. "I'll make a bug that will drag wires through all the pipes in New York."

"Make a bug!" said Johnson, Bachelor, and Griffin, all in a breath: "what in the word are you talking about?"

"Well, I'll make a bug," said Edison, "an iron bug that will go where you send it and draw a wire after it."

And they drew around while he described his coming—or rather his going—bug.

Next day he hatched a rude specimen of that insect as large as a coat-button. And it stood out on the table and crawled.

It was constructed thus: A minute electro-magnet carrying behind it a fine insulated wire, and the armature of the magnet operating a friction pawl. Now observe—every time the circuit is closed through the magnet the armature is attracted, the pawl clutches the sides of the gas-pipe with its claws, and the magnet behind is drawn toward the armature about a sixteenth of an inch. When the circuit is open, the armature reaches forward ready to take a second step. Thus, at every closing of the circuit, the little magnet advances one step and drags forward the insulated wire.—Ex.

LABOR-SAVING MACHINERY

Of all kinds, for agricultural purposes, samples of which can be seen and examined at the agricultural store of

N. & G. ENSLEY

Among the leading [illegible] the following first class machines:

The Huber Farm Engine.

This engine, owing to its light weight and low price, is better adapted to the use of threshers and farmers than any other engine in the market. It is the LATEST IMPROVED portable engine of the day; strong and durable, and uses but a small amount of fuel; it is a vertical engine, which does away with end motion while at work; the boiler is constructed on the return flue plan. The truck or wagon is all iron; the hind axle is the usual length, while the front one is short enough to allow the wheels to travel under the team, thus preventing [illegible] the pole. It throws less fire, and is 2,000 pounds lighter than the average farm engine. THIS POWERFUL LITTLE ENGINE IS NOW BEING OFFERED TO THE PUBLIC FOR $750. Call and see it.

The Davidson Portable and Traction Engine.

The only complete TRACTION ENGINE in the market. This engine is becoming very popular among threshers, as it does away with the use of horses for transporting machines from one point to another. An effort will be made to have one of these engines in Auburn in time to draw a train of fifteen or twenty carriages across the country to [illegible]ville, during the June races at that place. This [illegible] can be turned short, the same as a two-horse wagon, and works on the road similar to a locomotive on the railroad.

The Farmer's Friend Grain Drill.

The most accurate and positive force feed drill in the market. This drill has been greatly improved since last season, so that the drill will sow corn, peas and beans to perfection, with but little trouble in changing the feed. It has all the advantages of other drills, besides having the best and only reliable and durable spring hoe attachment now in use. This drill was awarded the highest medal of honor at the Paris Exposition.

WEIR PLOWS,

ESPECIALLY THE

Sulky or Riding Plow,

Is recognised as possessing more advantages and practical features than can be obtained in any other sulky plow. Malleable and wrought iron has almost taken the place of cast iron, in the manufacture of the WEIR, thereby rendering the plow more wieldy, securing increased strength, and at the same time reducing the weight. If any person desiring a sulky plow will call on the undersigned, he will give them twenty reasons why they should buy the WEIR. Every farmer ought to have one.

Weir's Cultivators,

Riding, walking, or riding and walking combined; all of which are noted for their simplicity of construction, ease of management, depth of penetration, size and shape of shovels, adjustable eveners, fifth shovel attachment etc., etc. The combined cultivator has many advantages over other combined machines and is no more expensive. The WEIR VIBRATING AND SCOTCH HARROWS are well known and need no recommendation. All machines manufactured by the Weir Plow Company, if not kept in stock, will be furnished on short notice, at the very lowest prices.

The New South Bend Chilled Plow.

Which has given such excellent satisfaction, is kept in stock, and can be furnished to purchasers at any time.

Iron Turbine Wind Engine AND Buckeye Force Pumps.

This wind engine is made of iron, the wheel being constructed on the Turbine principle causes it to give more power than any other wheel of the same diameter; there is no wood about it to shrink and rattle, and be torn to pieces by the wind. It is self-regulating in storms, and will not blow down. Do not buy a WIND ENGINE until you see the TURBINE work. The BUCKEYE ANTI-FREEZING FORCE PUMP is the only safe pump to use with a wind-mill. These pumps, with all the attachments, will be furnished by N. & G. Ensley, on short notice.

The Carter Tongueless Cultivator,

Warranted to do more and better work, with less labor for man and team, than any other cultivator known. It has taken the premium at the state fairs in Michigan, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and has always given satisfaction wherever it has been [illegible].

TOWNSHIP TRUSTEES

Are invited to examine the [illegible] Steel Road Scraper.

The most perfect revolving scraper ever introduced in the county. No road district should be without one. They are easy to handle, and cannot get out of repair. Special prices made to township trustees ordering six or more at one time. Remember that they have steel bottoms and boiler iron sides, which makes them preferable to wood side scrapers. Call and examine them.

The Buckeye Reaper and Mower.

Winner of more GRAND GOLD MEDALS than any other machine in America, still has the lead. The improvements for 1879 make it perfect in every particular. This machine has no wood frame to shrink, swell and warp, and thereby throw the shafting out of line. There are no cogs in the drive wheels to gather mud and sand, the gearing is unequaled in simplicity; the cutter-bar is in front of the driver's seat, thus giving the driver full view of the cutters, and preventing accident by falling in front of the knives. Side draft and sore necks on horses, entirely obviated in the BUCKEYE by the perfect manner in which the machine is balanced. Many other features, such as the double jointed coupling for folding the finger-bar, wrought iron steel faced guards, adjustable pitman and pitman box, add greatly to the popularity of the BUCKEYE.

The New Buckeye is the Strongest, Neatest and Best Light Mower Made,

And is perfectly safe for the driver. The Buckeye is the only reaper in the market with Miller's improved table rake, allowing the use of an overhanging reel, which is adjustable for the different conditions of grain, while the machine is in motion. The Miller table-rake has no equal in lodged or tangled wheat or oats. Suffice it to say that the Buckeye, both as a mower and reaper, stands to-day clearly without a rival. Remember that the Buckeye table-rake will cut one foot wider than any reel rake, having the same length of bar.

The Hubbard and Meadow Lark Combined Machines.

Both first class machines, constructed upon new principles, with five rakes, and changeable speed. We ask the public to examine these new machines before buying, samples of which can be seen at our agricultural rooms.

We are also agents for the celebrated

ECKHART BUGGIES

DANCING.

The world is given to dancing; why not? Where is the harm? Who is injured? Let us be rational. Dancing is natural. It is in consonance with youth. It lightens [illegible] have turned raven locks to gray [illegible] the body in sympathy with the heart. It is the expression of joy, happiness and pleasure. It does no violence to any of the predispositions to benevolence, or the highest attainments of the mental faculties. It is the movement of the body in accord with music, the poetry of motion, the elegance of exercise, the fruition of movement. The heart responds with a quicker pulsation; the eye reveals the approval of the soul; the mind gets out of the ruts of humdrum employments and takes the elevation to enjoyments which youth, intelligence and common sense approves. Notwithstanding all this there is a class of moralists (?) who are "down" on dancing. They regard it as the [illegible] instrument of the devil, designed to carry out some dark design against the human family. [illegible] walks in [illegible] thus: "[illegible] moustached gentleman holding a piece of wood to his shoulder and frantically drawing a poor horse-hair over the dried viscera of a dead feline, shouting vociferously incoherent sounds, the meaning of which must be guessed at, while men and women are mostly jumping up and down, scolding, laughing, shouting, coughing, wheezing, bowing, smiling, frowning, winking, blinking, pushing, pulling, sweating, rushing, thundering, rumbling, tramping and stamping until the body is exhausted and the lungs cry for air."

It is not surprising that in the absence of such innocent amusement as dancing [illegible] into the business of child-murder in obedience to revelations. [illegible] the foregoing nonsense says: "I have often wondered why people danced," and to this the Boston Post responds: "Of course he has. There is a feeling of satisfaction and delight experienced by the man or woman who really enjoys dancing that is [illegible]. The mind delights in unities, and when the harmony of motion [illegible] with the harmony of sound, a great triumph of [illegible] has been obtained. The man who dances with hand and heart as well as with legs is more of a man, all other points of character being equal—and there is no reason why they they may not be equal—than he who wonders, in a dazed way why people dance. Must we wonder at everything in the illimitable universe that we do not understand? If so, men might go about with mouth agape all the days of their lives. Again, the reverend censor flings out once more the threadbare slanders and vulgar insinuations against the morality of dancing. We fear that he has wondered how he should feel in the poetry of the waltz, and has reached a conclusion not complimentary to himself. He does not know what is a fact, that young ladies enjoy waltzing with one another almost as well as with the opposite sex, if they are better dancers than their gentlemen friends."

But we have no patience to pursue the subject. There seems to be a purpose on the part of a set of demented fanatics to make the world a tomb, and ever-day life a funeral; to rob youth of its enjoyments; to hush the laugh of innocence and attune the ear only to the croakings of human owls and frogs. Against all of this, common sense rebels and the rebellion is likely to win.

"THE WHOLE REPUBLIC IS THEIR SEPULCHRE."

SOLDIERS AND FELLOW CITIZENS:—It is fitting that on this day of national mourning we should recall the names of our fallen heroes who died that the Republic might live, and that the perpetuity of its life should be forever linked with the perpetuity of their names. Republics are not ungrateful; and the children of the country, who have fallen in her defense, deserve and shall receive on her altars the incense of a peoples love, a peoples gratitude, a peoples praise. Yet their fittest eulogium is not framed in speech, it is not inscribed on monument, it is not painted on canvas nor chiseled on statuary—it is writ with their blood, with a pen of steel, along the perilous edge of battle, in deeds of heroism which have blossomed out in the rights of humanity established, a race redeemed and a Union restored. Justly then may we recall their patriotic devotion and the generous offering of their lives for the common good. They died not for themselves but for us, and the incense of their holy sacrifice will ever rise from the hearts of their grateful countrymen. And while they gave their lives for the Republic they have also received that renown which never grows old and the most distinguished tomb that they could have; for their grave is not merely that in which they are laid, but the whole Republic is their sepulchre.

To-day, their surviving comrades, their children, their relations and friends withdraw from a merely personal mourning and all participate in the general mourning. The sorrowful selfishness of private grief is silent, for the moment, in order to mingle with the mourning and regrets of all. Let us accept, alas! with a grave and resigned obedience the mysterious will of Providence who has multiplied around us widows and orphans, and let the orphan who has lost a father be consoled by the father who has lost a son. Let the child take for a supreme consolation the memory of what his father was. Let his father's beautiful life, so full of unselfish and patriotic works, reappear now to his young spirit with the grand renown and with the aureola of immortality with which death crowns the end of a hero's life, and let all petty hates, let all the divisions of factions, let all the madness of party spirit, let all the unholy possessions be silent about the tombs of our fallen braves. Let all injustice, strife, contention, all that which troubles and agitates the life of men, vanish on this sacred hour. Oh, the noble souls of our regretted dead, those souls who, during their short life in this world sought only one object, had only one inspiration, wished only one recompense for their sacrifice—light and liberty. But their names are not dead—they are not forgotten. They still live and they are continuing with a more magnificent irradiation, their sublime flight and their immortal destiny. They died for liberty but they live in the spirit of liberty through all the land, they died for the Republic, but the immortality of the Republic is their immortality; they died for humanity and humanity triumphant breathes the perennial fragrance of their names.

As I read the names of the few who lie sepultured in this cemetery, do not expect that I should be so sacrilegious as to make any distinctions or to select for eulogy any one out of all who were so noble and so brave. Their deeds are most adorned when unadorned; and their valor, their devotion and the circumstances of their death are sufficient praise. I read the names of twenty-three soldiers who lie buried in yonder cemetery.

Permit me to add a word and I am done. At the breaking out of the French revolution most of the aristocracy and nobility fled from France and refused to serve their country under the auspices of the young Republic. But there was one shining exception who was a decendant of the great Turenne; and whose name was De Latour D'Auvergne, and who entered the ranks of the Republican army. He served in all the campaigns of the Republic, distinguished himself by his valor, his accomplishments and his generous spirit and might have risen to fortune and the highest honors. But he refused all rank above that of Captain and would receive no reward but a sword of honor. Napoleon, in testimony of his merits gave him the title of the first Grenadier of France, which is the only title he would ever bear. He was killed in Germany at the battle of Newburg. To honor his memory his vacant place was always retained in his regiment as if he still occupied it; and whenever the regiment was mustered and the name of De Latour D'Auvergne was called out, the reply was: 'Dead, on the field of honor."

So when we call to-day and shall recall hereafter the names of our fallen heroes, whether dying in hospital or in the storm of battle, as each name is called out, from every patriotic heart comes the simple and fitting response—Dead on the field of honor.

Catholics at the South.

[Richmond State.]

Some religious statistician has discovered, but for what ulterior purpose we know not, that in the old states of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama and Mississippi, there is only a Catholic population of about 83,000. Following the geographical division of the states, it is found that the Catholic population of this country is divided thus: Southern states 799,000; Eastern states, 861,000; Middle states, 1,968,000; Western states 3,576,000. Is there any idea of reviving the old Know-Nothing party as an offset to Russian Nihilism, which it much resembled in its palmy days in New Orleans and Baltimore?

War Baloons.

The English war department is on the point of at length adopting war baloons into the land and sea services. Movable apparatus for inflating and manipulating military baloons in the the field has just been completed in the Royal Arsenel, Woolwich, and been tried with two new baloons specially constructed for military purposes. The appliances consist of a portable tank, weighing 400 pounds, containg iron shavings, together with a portable boiler and furnace. These appliances can be moved about with troops on the field or on vessels at sea. Hydrogen is generated by passing steam through the iron turnings. As soon as the necessary arrangements can be made it is in contemplation to send a few war baloons out into Zululand.—Nature.

Hen and Potato Bugs.

A correspondent of an eastern paper writes: "Our first experiment was to offer both larvæ and beetles to the fowls, but they refused to touch them, and acted as if somewhat afraid. Next we mixed the insects with the corn and other food that was given them, but they refused even to eat the corn for a time; by and by, however, they began to eat the corn, and soon lost all fear of the insects, although they refused to eat any. After a few days, by keeping the insects in their food all the time, some of the bravest of the hens began to eat a few insects, and it was not long before the rest joined them, and in a few days more they appeared to relish the beetles about as well as the corn. Up to this time I did not observe any of the fowls eat a beetle from the potato vines, but they now began to do so, and we were obliged to put them in their food no longer. After this the beetles were so reduced in number in this garden that they did no material damage." It would seem from the above that although the beetles were naturally repugnant to the domestic fowl, yet an appetite for them may be acquired.

A CURIOUS STORY.

The Conditions on which Napoleon III was to have Recognized the southern Confederacy.

Hon. James Lyons, of Richmond, Va. writes as follows in a letter to Colonel Magruder of Baltimore:

I will relate a conversation I had at my house, Laburnum, near Richmond, with Count Mercier, the French Minister, in the month of May or early part of June, 1863. He, it will be recollected, visited Richmond by permission of the Northern Government, but was interdicted from holding direct intercourse with President Davis or any of his Cabinet, and he spent nearly two days of his time at my house in Henrico. In point of fact, as the sequel will disclose, he was sent there (by Mr. Seward) with a view to make peace. In the course of a day's discussion in my library, he asked me a great many questions; among others, the question:

"Can you whip McClellan?" who was then lying with an army of men within six miles of Richmond, confronted by General Lee.

I told him in reply that I felt sure we could and would, and if the Emperor of the French would open the ports and keep them open, we would march to New York and not ask the loan of a man or a dollar. With great animation he sprang to his feet and said in French:

"If such be the temper of your people you are invincible. But why do you think you will whip McClellan?"

I answered: "Because the President and General Lee tell me they believe we will."

Then he added: "But, do you know how many men are bearing upon Richmond?"

I replied: "The President thinks there are two hundred thousand. General Lee thinks not so many, but more than one hundred and fifty thousand."

To which he replied: "They are both mistaken. There are two hundred and twenty-five thousand. General Burnside's force at Port Royal is a part of the force bearing upon Richmond—sent to Port Royal merely in the hope of inducing General Lee to detach a part of his army to meet it. I am just from the war office, and have all the statistics here" (holding up a paper which he drew from his pocket); "but," he added, "can't this war be stopped? Can't you come back under the old flag?"

I said: "I suppose that is impossible for Mr. Seward would not permit us to do so without the abolition of slavery, and it would be useless to propose that to the men from the exrteme south."

To that he replied; "You are mistaken. If you will only return and acknowledge the flag, Mr. Seward will permit you to return without any conditions."

"What!" said I, "with the institution of slavery?"

"Yes," he said.

I then said: "But there is yet one thing more to be considered. To use the phrase which was so much hackneyed with respect to the north-eastern boundary question of 'indemnity for the past and security for the future,' we can't ask, I know, indemnity for the past, but we must have security for the future. We can not live hereafter in the state of harassment and excitement in which we have lived for some years past."

Then drawing his hand across a piece of paper lying upon the library table, upon the opposite sides of which we were sitting he said:

"Mr. Seward will allow you to write your own guarantees."

I expressed my individual readiness to consent to those terms. I had been in favor of the southern convention which South Carolina proposed through Mr. Memminger, her commissioner, believing, as I did, in which I am now confirmed, that if all the southern states met in convention, as proposed by South Carolina, such guarantees would be asked of the northern people as they would grant, and which would protect us, and in that event there would be no secession, and I certainly did not wish secession if we could be protected in the enjoyment of our constitutional rights, and that I believe was the general sentiment of the south. I believe I have given you now almost, if not exactly, verbatim, these conversations to which I referred in my conversation with you. I will add that the day following the conversation with the French Minister, a large company of gentlemen dined with him at my house, and he left there after ten o'clock at night in a rain, in order, as he said a dispatch to Norfolk to fire up a steamer which could take him or his dispatches, I forget which, to New York, before the next Atlantic steamer sailed.

The battle at Coal Harbor and the other battles around Richmond occurred not long afterward, and I had no doubt of our acknowledgment by the French government, and was very much surprised that it did not come.

Some time afterward the French Consul, M. Paul, drove up to my house on Sunday afternoon, and very soon entered into conversation about the acknowledgment of the confederate government by the emperor of the French, and asked me if we could not pass some bill for the gradual abolition of slavery in fifty or sixty years. May be it might do even if it was longer, and said that if that were done the emperor would immediately acknowledge us, but that the French people would not be satisfied without such a provision for the abolition of slavery. They did not care how distant it was, so the price of recognition, and the emperor would be fully justified.

I expressed my individual willingness to accede to those terms, and promised to see the president upon the subject next morning when I went into congress and if he agreed with me I would immediately introduce a bill for the purpose.

"But," said I, "M. Paul, what guarantee can you give us that if we take so important a step, the emperor will acknowledge us?"

He replied: "Mr. Myons, nobody can guarantee the emperor will do what I tell you he will do," which I considered as but another mode of saying that he had been authorized to do what he had done.

It is due Mr. Davis to say that I saw him next morning, at his own house, before congress met as soon as I went into town, and told him what had passed between the French consul and myself. His answer was: "I should concur with you in accepting these terms but for the constitutional difficulty. You know that congress has no jurisdiction over the subject of slavery." "True' I said, "but that trouble may be gotten over, in my opinion, without any violation of the constitution. Let the bill for the gradual abolition of slavery also provide that it shall not take effect until the states have, by acts of their respective legislatures [illegible] approved and ratified it, which you know will be just as good as if passed before hand, authorizing congress to do the thing. I will not be guilty of the presumption of offering such a bill upon my simple responsibility, but if I may say that you concur with me I will introduce the bill to-morrow. He then asked me why the French Government could not deal with the states in the matter, so as to avoid all constitutional questions. I told him I had put that very question to the French Consul, and his answer was, "France does not know the States, but she knows the Confederate Government and president Davis."

Mr. Davis then said: "Well, I must consult the cabinet, and if they agree with you I will send for you." And there the matter ended.

America's Fifteen Inventions.

An English journal frankly gives credit to the American genius for at least fifteen inventions and discoveries, which, it says, have been adopted all over the world. These triumphs of American genius arethus enumerated: 1st, the cotton gin; 2d, the planing machine; 3d, the grass mower and grain reaper; 4th, the rotary printing press; 5th, navigation by steam; 6th, hot air, or caloric, engine; 7th, the sewing machine; 8th, the India-rubber industry; 9th, the machine manufacture of horse-shoes; 10th, the sand blast for carving; 11th, the gauge lathe; 12th, the grain elevator; 13th, artificial ice manufacture on a large scale; 14th, the electro-magnet, and its practical application; 15th, the composing machine for printers. It is not often that American achievements in this direction receive due credit from such a source.—New York Sun.

How a Boy Captured a Deer.

A correspondent of the Buffalo Commercial tells the following story of a deer hunt in Kentucky: "In an hour or so we first heard the distant bay of the hounds. From the cry, as it continued, the deer seemed to be circling around in the hills, instead of making a straight run for the river, as was usual. We remained almost stationery, not knowing which course the hunt would take, and the music became less and less, until we heard the bay of one hound only. But, to our great joy, that voice seemed to be coming our way. From the length of time the game had been afoot we concluded that the dogs had become tired and left the trail, with the exception of the stanch old hound, whose voice we could occasionally hear as he unflinchingly followed the quarry. Nearer came the sound. We dismounted, tightened the girths and waited. Our horses were as highly excited as ourselves, and we could with difficulty curb their impatience. We were stationed on the high road leading toward the village, and the deer was evidently running in that direction. At length he came, a noble buck, gallantly bounding through the woods in a line parallel with the road, and not more than a hundred yards away. We put spurs to our horses and followed.

"With the party was a boy 16 years old, who had never before seen a deer in the woods and was almost crazed with excitement. As he rode by my side he said it 'looked as big as an elephant.' On we drove, occasionally catching a glimpse of the buck as he dashed through the woods. He was very tired. The dogs had pressed him hard, and he had probably run twenty miles before he arrived at the point where we met him. Soon the noble old hound came in sight, and as he saw us he burst into such melody that we joined him at the utmost stretch of our lungs. On we pressed, rapidly approaching the village, directly through which the chase seemed fated to take us. Soon we came to a large cornfield, which was surrounded by a 'stake and ridered' fence six feet high. We could not jump it, and looked to see where the deer had gone in. We found the place, and tearing off the top rail leaped our horses into the corn. Rushing through we arrived at the other extremity of the field just in time to see the deer attempt to jump the fence. The dog was close at his heels and sprang upon him, and catching him by the flank prevented his leap. The deer animal was evidently worn out with his long run, but he gallantly charged the dog, and leaping over him ran gallantly back toward the point at which he had entered the field. We turned likewise, and taking different furrows among the corn pressed our horses to the top of their speed. My little friend rode between me and our companion. He rode leaning over his horse's neck, gazing straight ahead and yelling like a madman. I thought of a raving lunatic. The corn was high and the dust so thick, from the trampling of many animals, that at length I could see nothing, but all at once I heard a crash, a struggle, a shout:

"I've got him! I've got him! Come quick!"

"I rode toward the voice, and lo! the young lunatic on the ground was struggling with the deer. Fortunately the animal was so exhausted by his long run that the boy could pretty nearly handle him; but horns, hoofs, legs, arms, boy, deer and dog, were rather permiscuously mixed in a cloud of dust that enveloped them when I came in sight. I sprang from my horse and drew my hunting-knife across the throat of the animal, at the same time seizing the boy by the collar and drawing him away. After resting a few minutes he told me that, seeing the deer rush past him, he could not resist the temptation and threw himself off his horse upon the back of the hunted animal, clasping his arms round his neck. The shock threw the deer to the ground. We put the dead animal on one of the horses and rode through the village, and our young gentleman was the hero of the Springs for the rest of the season."

This is the way fortunes are made in Leadwith, Colordo. A. Cohen was one of the speculators who went there to look for a silver mine. His money dwindled rapidly until he had only $3.50 left. In desperation he went to a wholesale grocery and bought a barrel of apples, paying his entire capital on account, and remaining in debt $1.50. Then he set up a stand at a busy street corner and offered his apples for sale at ten cents apiece. Before sundown he had sold out, and was the possessor of nearly $30. The next day he had a larger stock in trade, and did equally well. In a fortnight he was a well to do man. His profits had been immense. Now he has a large fruit, nut, and candy business, and has a store full of assistants.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

Edward Reinhardt has been convicted of murder in the first degree at Stapleton, Staten Island, N. Y., for the murder of Annie Degnan, in July last. It will be remembered that the body of Miss Degnan was found in a barrel, and the case caused great excitement at the time.

William Lloyd Garrison died at the residence of Mrs. Villard, his daughter, in New York city, on the 24th of May. The cause of death was nervous prostration, consequent upon paralysis of the bladder and kidney trouble of long standing. The remains were removed to Boston for interment. Mr. Garrison was born in Newburyport, Mass., in 1804, and was therefore 75 years old; began to write for the press when 15 years old, being then an apprentice in the office of the Newburyport Herald; established the Liberator, an anti-slavery paper, in 1831; in 1832 organized the New England Anti-Slavery Society, and in 1843 was chosen as its President, a position which he occupied until the close of the late civil war.

Frank Paige was in the shoe-commission business in Boston, and, spending more money in fast living than he could afford, entered into a conspiracy with Stetson, his chief clerk, to destroy the books after ordering large quantities of goods, and surreptitiously disposing of them. He has just been tried and sentenced to two years' imprisonment....The new St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York, the largest and finest church edifice in the country, was dedicated with imposing ceremonies May 25.....A fire in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week, destroyed upward of $750,000 worth of property....A drunken fisherman named Walker was carried over Niagara falls last week. He stood up in his boat twice to take a drink out of a bottle of whisky, and in another instant bottle, boat and man shared the same fate.

At Lewiston, N. Y., while John King and Walter Swan were crossing the Niagara river in a small boat, they were drawn into the eddy, the boat upset and both were drowned.

Miss Delia Wheeler, a sister of the Vice President of the United States, died last week at Malone, N. Y., at the age of 65....A horrible case of wholesale poisoning is thus briefly disposed of in a dispatch from Grand Point, Vt.: "At Newark, ten miles distant from here, a party of nine children drank water from a brook, the waters of which had been polluted by the carcasses of a horse and several sheep, and were poisoned, from the effects of which seven died soon after, their bodies becoming putrid and demanding immediate burial. The others cannot survive. A Mrs. Morse lost two, Mrs. Carpenter lost three, and the two more are the ones referred to as dying, taking her entire family. Mrs. Aldrich lost two. There is great excitement in the community over the matter."....Another Gloucester fishing vessel, the schooner William Thompson, is reported lost with her crew of fourteen men. They leave seven widows and twelve orphans....An elevator accident, resulting fatally to two persons, occurred in New York the other day....A statue of Tom Moore was unveiled in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, N. Y., on the 28th ult., the anniversary of the poet's birth.

The committee appointed by the lower house of the Pennsylvania Legislature to inquire into corruption in conjunction with the attempted passage of the Pittsburgh Riot bill made a report last week. The report sets forth that Representative Rumberger, of Armstrong county, and Representatives Peloff and Smith, of Philadelphia, have been guilty of corrupt solicitation of members of the Legislature. The committee comes to the additional conclusion that the following-named persons were guilty of corrupt solicitations: Ex-Treasurer W. H. Kemble; ex-Representative Salter, of Philadelphia; Alex. W. Leisenring, President of the First National Bank, Mauch Chunk; Jesse R. Crawford, of Blair, and Chris. Long, of Cumberland county.

THE SOUTH.

Rich deposits of silver have been discovered at Brownwood, Tex., 120 miles southwest of Dallas, and there is a great rush to the new diggings.

In the Calcasieu river, a little below Lake Charles, during a thunder-storm, a whirlwind struck the small mail propeller Ramos, capsizing it, and causing it to sink instantly. There were six passengers on board, all of whom were drowned on account of their being unable to swim. The Captain and engineer escaped by swimming ashore.

Kentucky vendettas: The Underwood war has again broken out in Carter county. Elva Underwood, while peacefully at work in his field, was shot from an ambush. The adherents of the rival factions are arming, and it is feared there will be a fearful amount of bloodshed. Farmers, afraid of becoming the victim of some assassin's ball, are forsaking their fields. In Breathitt county, Andrew Carpenter, while peacefully at work in his own yard, was shot by an unknown party in ambush. Fears are entertained there that this is but the forerunner of more bloodshed.

The hardware establishment of M. Schwartz & Bro., on Magazine street, New Orleans, has been burned. Loss, $100,000.

The Washington House, at Hagerstown, Md., was destroyed by fire a few nights ago. Before the alarm could be given the fire had gained such headway that the flames rushed up the stairway, completely cutting off all escape. There were upward of sixty persons on the register, besides the regular boarders, nearly all of whom were compelled to escape by climbing down the porch pillars. Several of those who escaped in this way sustained serious injuries by falling. One man was burned to death, and about a dozen badly injured, two or three of whom will probably die.

THE WEST.

After numerous failures, arrangements have been finally completed to rebuild the Southern Hotel in St. Louis, which was burned down two or three years ago. Thomas Allen, President of the Iron Mountain railroad, has undertaken the enterprise....A fire at Monroe, Wis., destroyed seven stores, with a loss of about $50,000.

Manager Haverly seems to be in no danger of making a losing venture of his engagement of Lester Wallack, notwithstanding the large sum guaranteed, if the houses he draws in Chicago are any criterion. This week Robertson's charming comedy of "Ours," and Mr. Wallack's own play, "Rosedale," are billed, after which he starts immediately for San Francisco. The support of the star is deserving of special commendation, while in genteel comedy Lester Wallack has no equal, perhaps, in this country.

A horrible murder was recently committed in the town of Kewaskum, Wis.; a farmer named Nicholas Altenhofer beating the brains out of a six weeks' old child by knocking its head against a wall and cutting the scalp open with a picture-frame. The murderer was insane....Frank Dickerson, convicted at Janesville, Wis., of the murder of George Mack, has been sentenced to a life term in the penitentiary. Mrs. Mack, the wife of the murdered man, has already been convicted of complicity in the crime....The assignee of Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, has filed a schedule of assets and liabilities of the Archbishop and brother, Edward Purcell. The total amount of the claims is $3,697,623.40. The assets, total, are $1,181,569.47, of which amount $418,533.28 is classed as doubtful or worthless.

Alfred Zeigenmeyer, who murdered an Irishman named Gumbleton in Chicago, eight or nine years ago, threw his body in the lake, and took possession of his property, personating his victim at the bank and elsewhere with great ingenuity, died in the Joliet penitentiary a few days ago, protesting his innocence of the murder to the last.

An examination of the books and papers of the lately suspended Broadway Savings Bank, in St. Louis, reveals a condition of rottenness that is absolutely shocking. By false accounts the institution has been robbed of nearly $200,000 by the cashier, Philip Krieger, Jr., son of the President of the bank. While Krieger has been systematically plundering, the bank has been declaring 10 per cent. dividends semi-annually, and the stock has been away above par.

Troy Dye, formerly Public Administrator of Sacramento county, Cal., and his partner in crime, Edward Anderson, were hanged at Sacramento on the 28th ult., for the murder of A. M. Tullis last August.

POLITICAL.

The Ohio Republican Convention convened at Cincinnati on Wednesday, May 28, completed its work and adjourned the same day. Ex-Gov. Dennison presided. The names of ex-Congressman Charles Foster and Judge Alphonso Taft were placed before the convention for Governor, and the choice fell to Foster on the first ballot, he receiving 280 votes to 271 for Taft. Gen. Hickenlooper was nominated for Lieutenant Governor. The following is the remainder of the ticket nominated: Judge of the Supreme Court, W. W. Johnson, of Lawrence; Attorney General, George K. Nash, of Franklin; Auditor of State, John F. Oglevee, of Clark....The Greenback State Convention of Iowa met at Des Moines on the 28th inst., and placed in nomination the following ticket: For Governor, David Campbell, of Clark county; Lieutenant Governor, M. H. Moore, of Dubuque; for Supreme Judge, M. H. Jones, of Davis; for Superintendent of Public Instruction, J. A. Nash, of Polk county.

GENERAL.

Three murderers were executed, on Friday, the 23d inst., namely: A wife-murderer named Shelly, at Blackshear, Ga.; Abraham W. Ford, at Lake Charles, La., for the murder of Dr. Bazo, and Indian Jack, for killing a Chinaman, at Shasta, Cal.

WASHINGTON.

A circular from the Treasury Department notifies holders of called bonds maturing before the 1st of July that they may receive payment of principal and interest to date at once, by sending them to the Secretary. This offer is made as an inducement to holders to get this class of bonds out of the way, so that the whole force of the department may be able to give its attention after the 1st of July to bonds called in for that month, which include the enormous amount represented by the great syndicate purchase of refunding 4 per cents. The circular intimates that the huge job of redeeming the July bonds will not be interrupted to pay for bonds called at an earlier date, if this notice is not heeded by holders.

A bloody tragedy was enacted near Winchester, Ind., the other day. While farmer John H. Lewis and his son were opening a ditch, they were ordered to stop by their neighbors, John Lumpkins and two sons. A quarrel ensued, in which Lumpkins' eldest son was shot and instantly killed, the youngest son and father receiving severe injuries. Young Lewis was fatally injured by being struck on the head with a brick.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

The Senate, on the 23d, passed the bill to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases, by a vote of 34 yeas to 12 nays. The bill making subsidiary coins exchangeable for lawful money of the United States, and to make such coins legal tender in sums up to $20, was discussed.—The House concurred in the amendments to the Legislative Appropriation bill, after which the Warner Silver bill was taken up and discussed all day, and all night until 5 o'clock in the morning of the 24th.

The long contest over the Warner Silver Coinage bill was ended on the 24th, and the measure was passed by 114 yeas to 97 nays. The Republicans and Greenbackers who voted "aye" were: Messrs. Belford, Cannon, Daggett, De La Matyr, Ford, Fort, Gillette, Ladd, Marsh, Martin (N. C.), Murch, Russell (N. C.), Stevenson, Weaver, and Tolson. The Democrats and Greenbackers voting "no" were: Messrs. Bliss, Covert, Deuster, Hurd, Jones, Morrison, Muller, Poehler, and F. Wood.—The Senate was not in session.

The bill reported by Mr. Bayard, to provide for an exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money, and making such coins a legal tender in sums not exceeding $10, was taken up on the 26th, and Mr. Edmunds spoke against the bill. When Mr. Edmunds concluded, consideration began of the bill heretofore introduced by Mr. McDonald, authorizing the employment of the militia and land and naval forces in certain cases, and to repeal the Election laws, and Mr. McDonald addressed the Senate in support of his measure. The bill relative to the transportation of live stock was discussed.—The House was not in session.

The proceedings in Congress were not specially interesting on the 27th ult. In the Senate, Mr. McDonald asked leave to present the petition and memorial of the ex-soldiers and sailors of Providence, protesting against violations of the civil-service reform, especially in relation to the appointment of custom officers in Providence, and alleging interference by Federal officers in elections. The petition, after a spirited debate, went over, on objection. The bill relating to the transportation of cattle was then taken up. Mr. Edmunds said this was a subject of general legislation, and not one contemplated in the convening of the extra session. He moved that it be postponed until the first Monday in December next. The motion was agreed to.—In the House, the morning hour was frittered away by filibustering motions of the Republicans to prevent action on the bill relative to the removal of cases from State to Federal courts. The bill to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States was then taken up and passed in precisely the shape it came from the Senate. The Ways and Means Committee reported Fernando Wood's resolution, fixing the day of adjournment for June 10.

The bill providing for the exchange of subsidiary coin for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in sums not exceeding $10, was passed by the Senate on the 28th ult. Mr. Call, of Florida, addressed the Senate in support of the bill to allow the use of the militia and land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and to repeal the Election laws.—Nothing of importance transpired in the House, the day being devoted to District of Columbia business.

The Senate discussed the McDonald bill to authorize to use of military forces in certain cases, on the 29th ult. Mr. Wallace delivered a three-and-a-half-hours' speech in favor of the bill, after which Messrs. Blaine and Hill indulged in one of their characteristic colloquies. The President pro tem. announced the following as the select committee on Pendleton's bill providing that the principal executive officers of the Government may occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives: Messrs. Pendleton, Voorhees, Bayard, Butler, Farley, Conkling, Allison, Blaine, Ingalls, and Platt.—In the House, the resolution of the Ways and Means Committee, fixing the 10th of June as the day of final adjournment, was, on motion of Mr. Atkins, laid over for consideration on Saturday, 31st. The message of the President vetoing the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill was received and read. The reading was listened to with close, and, for a time, respectful attention. Only an audible titter went through the Democratic ranks when the sentence was read as to the effect of the existing law being to secure honest elections. Again, when the sentence was read as to what good faith, honest endeavor, and judicial authority can do for the protection of the elective franchise, the Democrats laughed outright, and the Republicans, as a counter-demonstration, applauded. The House refused to pass the bill over the President's veto—yeas, 112; nays, 91; not the necessary two-thirds in the affirmative. This was a strict party vote. Only four Greenbackers voted, two (Ladd and Stevenson) in the affirmative, and two (Barlow and Ford) in the negative. The message of the President was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with leave to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

The "Congressional Record."

Dissatisfaction with the Congressional Record is growing steadily and finding newspaper vent in Washington, mainly because it is not what its name implies. Everybody knows that the Record is far worse than its predecessor, the Globe, ever was, for printing speeches that have not been delivered. Even those that are made on the floor of the House and the Senate are seldom published as made. The authors cut, trim, enlarge, polish, and often change them completely before they are presented to the public. Hardly anybody reads or feels any interest in the Record except members of Congress, who, after they have published a speech they had uttered—perhaps written by somebody else—send to their constituents hundreds of copies, which are never scanned, though they may be useful as waste paper. The Record costs the Government, it is estimated, not far from $200,000 a year. The sole excuse for such expenditure is that its matter shall be what it assumes to be, a register of the proceedings and debates of the national body; and no man is so ignorant as not to be aware that it is nothing of the kind. The reporters and printers do their duty faithfully; but before the Record can be issued the "orator" demands to see a proof, and so alters it that frequently very little of the original is left. The Record is not merely a colossal humbug, it is a stupendous falsehood, and, as conducted, has no excuse for continuance. It should be made an inflexible rule of Congress that no member or Senator should be allowed to change a word he has spoken, unless to correct some typographical or other unimportant error. Until this be done, the Record will be worse than worthless.—Exchange.

Nitro-Glycerine.

Nitro-glycerine occupies a good share of public opinion just now. If a person in Canada wants to buy town lots cheap, he only has to circulate a report that there is a car of nitro-glycerine at the depot and he can have any amount of property at his own figures. The Toronto Globe wants to have the railroads positively refuse to carry any compound of nitro-glycerine except in exceedingly small quantities. The manufacture of nitro-glycerine is very simple. It is made by combining under water in wooden vats equal parts of strong nitric and sulphuric acids. One-eighth of the bulk of the acids of glycerine is added. The mixture, being heavier than water, sinks to the bottom and is drawn off as nitro-glycerine, in appearance like melted lard. Dynamite, giant powder, vigorite, hercules powder, or any other compound having nitro-glycerine as its basis is made by allowing infusorial earth to absorb nitro-glycerine in more or less quantities. The Globe thinks that as the manufacture is so simple these explosives could be made on the spot wherever required for use.

A married couple in Wellesley, Mass., can take the prize for large families. The lady is 47 years old, and is the mother of twenty-three children by one father, of whom nineteen are living. They were all single births, not a twin among them.

THE THIRD VETO.

The President's Objections to the Legislative Appropriation Bill.

To the House of Representatives:

Sirs: After mature consideration of the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," I herewith return it to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following objections to its approval:

The main purpose of the bill is to appropriate money required to support, during the next fiscal year, the several civil departments of the Government. The amount appropriated exceeds in the aggregate $18,000,000. This money is needed to keep in operation the essential functions of all the great departments of the Government—legislative, executive and judicial.

If the bill contained no other provisions, no objections to its approval would be made. It embraces, however, a number of clauses relating to subjects of great general interest, which are wholly unconnected with the appropriation which it provides for. Objections to the practice of tacking general legislation to appropriation bills, especially when the object is to deprive a co-operative branch of the Government of its rights to the free exercise of its own discretion and judgment touching such general legislation, were set forth in the special message in relation to the House bill No. 1, which was returned to the House of Representatives on the 29th of last month. I regret that the objections which were expressed to this method of legislation have not seemed to Congress of sufficient weight to dissuade form this renewed incorporation of general enactments in an appropriation bill, and that my constitutional duty in respect to general legislation thus placed before me cannot be discharged without seeming to delay, however briefly, the necessary appropriation by Congress for the support of the Government.

Without repeating those objections, I respectfully refer to that message for a statement of my views on the principle maintained in the debate by the advocates of this bill, viz.: That "to withhold appropriations is a constitutional means for the redress" of what a majority of the House of Representatives may regard as a "grievance."

The bill contains the following clauses, viz.: "And, provided further, that the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, namely, sections 2,016, 2,018 and 2,020, and all of the succeeding sections of said statutes down to and including section 2,027, and also section 5,522, be, and the same are hereby repealed, * * * and that all the other sections of the Revised Statutes, and all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of Chief Supervisors of Elections, special Deputy Marshals of Elections, or General Deputy Marshals, having any duties to perform in respect to any election, and prescribing their duties and powers, and allowing them compensation, be and the same are hereby repealed."

It also contains clauses amending sections 2,017, 2,019, 2,028 and 2,031 of the Revised Statutes. The sections of the Revised Statutes which this bill, if approved, would repeal or amend are part of an act approved May 30, 1870, and amended Feb. 28, 1871, entitled "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes."

All of the provisions of the above-named acts which it is proposed in this bill to repeal or modify relate to Congressional elections. The remaining portion of the law, which will continue in force after the enactment of this measure, is that which provides for the appointment by a Judge of the Circuit Court of the United States of two Supervisors of Elections in each election district, at any Congressional election, on the due application of citizens who desire, in the language of the law, "to have such election guarded and scrutinized. The duties of the Supervisors will be to attend at the polls at all Congressional elections, and to remain after the polls are open until every vote cast has been counted; but they will have no authority to make arrests or to perform other duties than to be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the elections, and to witness all their proceedings, including the counting of the votes and making a return thereof."

The part of the Election law which will be repealed by the approval of this bill includes those sections which give authority to the Supervisors of Elections "to personally scrutinize the count and canvass each ballot," and all the sections which confer authority upon United States Marshals and Deputy Marshals in connection with Congressional elections. The enactment of this bill will also repeal section 5,522 of the criminal statutes of the United States, which was enacted for the protection of United States officers engaged in the discharge of their duties at Congressional elections. This section protects Supervisors and Marshals in the performance of their duties, by making the obstruction or assaulting of these officers, or any interference with them by bribery, or solicitation or otherwise, crimes against the United States. The true meaning and effect of the proposed legislation are plain. The Supervisors, with authority to observe and witness the proceedings at the Congressional elections will be left, but there will be no power to protect them, or to prevent interference with their duties, or to punish any violation of law from which their powers are derived. If this bill is approved, only the shadow of authority of the United States at national elections will remain; the substance will be gone.

The supervision of elections will be reduced to mere inspection, without authority on the part of the Supervisors to do any act whatever to make the election a fair one. All that will be left to the Supervisors is the permission to have such an oversight of elections as political parties are in the habit of exercising without any authority of the law, in order to prevent their opponents from obtaining unfair advantages.

The object of the bill is to destroy any control whatever by the United States over Congressional elections.

The passage of this bill has been urged upon the ground that the election of members of Congress is a matter which concerns the States alone; that these elections should be controlled exclusively by the States; that there are, and can be, no such elections as national elections, and that the existing law of the United States regulating Congressional elections is without warrant in the constitution. It is evident, however, that the framers of the constitution regarded the election of members of Congress in every State and in every district as, in a very important sense, justly a matter of political interest and concern to the whole country.

The original provision of the constitution on this subject is as follows:

Section 4, Article 1. The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

A further provision has since been added, which is embraced in the Fifteenth amendment. It is as follows:

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude.

Sec. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Under the general provisions of the constitution (Section 4, Article 1) Congress, in 1866, passed a comprehensive law, which prescribed full and detailed regulations for the election of Senators by the Legislatures of the several States.

This law has been in force almost thirteen years. In pursuance of it, all of the members of the present Senate of the United States hold their seats. Its constitutionality is not called in question.

It is confidently believed that no sound argument can be made in support of the constitutionality of the national regulation of Senatorial elections which will not show that the elections of members of the House of Representatives may also be constitutionally regulated by national authority.

The bill before me itself recognizes the principle that the Congressional elections are not State elections, but national elections. It leaves in full force the existing statute under which the Supervisors are still to be appointed by national authority to "observe and witness" Congressional elections whenever due application is made by citizens who desire said elections to be "guarded and scrutinized." If the power to supervise, in any respect whatever, the Congressional elections exist under Section 4, Article 1 of, the constitution it is a power which, like every other power belonging to the Government of the United States, is paramount and supreme, and includes the right to employ the necessary means to carry it into effect.

The statutes of the United States which regulate the election of members of the House of Representatives, an essential part of which it is proposed to repeal by this bill, have been in force about eight years. Four Congressional elections have been held under them, two of which were at the Presidential elections of 1872 and 1876. Numerous prosecutions, trials and convictions have been held in the courts of the United States in all parts of the Union for violations of these laws. In no reported case has their constitutionality been called in question by any Judge of the courts of the United States. The validity of these laws is sustained by the uniform course of judicial action and opinion. If it is urged that the United States Election laws are not necessary, an ample reply is furnished by a history of their origin and of their results. They were especially prompted by the investigation and exposure of frauds committed in the city and State of New York at the elections of 1868. Committees representing both of the leading political parties of the country have submitted reports to the House of Representatives as to the extent of those frauds.

The committee of the Fortieth Congress, after a full investigation, reached the conclusion that the number of fraudulent votes cast in the city of New York alone in 1868 was not less than 25,000. A committee of the Forty-fourth Congress, in its report, submitted in 1877, adopted the opinion that for every 100 actual voters of the city of New York, in 1868, 108 votes were cast, when, in fact, the number of lawful votes cast could not have exceeded 88 per cent. of the actual voters of the city. By this statement the number of the fraudulent votes at that election in the city of New York alone was between 30,000 and 40,000. These frauds completely reversed the result of the election in the State of New York, both as to the choice of Governor and State officers, and as to the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States. They attracted the attention of the whole country. It was plain that, if they could be continued and repeated with impunity, free government was impossible.

A distinguished Senator, in opposing the passage of the election laws, declared that he had for a long time believed that our form of government was a comparative failure in the large cities. To meet these evils and to prevent these crimes the United States laws regulating Congressional elections were enacted. The framers of these laws have not been disappointed in their results. In the large cities, under their provisions, the elections have been comparatively peaceable, orderly and honest. Even the opponents of these laws have borne testimony to their value and efficiency, and to the necessity for their enactment.

The committee of the Forty-fourth Congress, composed of members a majority of whom were opposed to these laws, in their report on the New York election of 1876, said: "The committee would commend to other portions of the country, and to other cities, this remarkable system developed through the agency of both the local and Federal authorities, acting in harmony for an honest purpose. In no portion of the world, in no era of time where there has been an expression of the popular will through the forms of law, has there been a more complete and thorough illustration of republican institutions. Whatever may have been the previous habit or conduct of elections in those cities, or howsoever they may conduct themselves in future, this election of 1876 will stand as a monument of what good faith, honest endeavor, legal forms and just authority may do for the protection of the electoral franchise."

This bill recognizes the authority and duty of the United States to appoint Supervisors to guard and scrutinize Congressional elections; but it denies to the Government of the United States all power to make its provisions effectual. The great body of the people want free and fair elections. They do not think that a free election means freedom from the wholesome restraints of law, or that the place of an election should be a sanctuary for lawlessness and crime.

On the day of an election, peace and good order are more necessary than on any other day of the year. On that day the humblest and feeblest citizens, the aged and infirm, should be and should have reason to feel that they are safe in the exercise of their most responsible duty, and their most sacred right as members of society, their duty and their right to vote.

Constitutional authority to regulate Congressional elections, which belongs to the Government of the United States, and which it is necessary to exert to secure the right to vote to every citizen possessing the requisite qualifications, ought to be enforced by appropriate legislation. So far from public opinion in any part of the country favoring any relaxation of the authority of the Government in the protection of elections from violence and corruption, I believe it demands greater vigor both in the enactment and in the execution of the laws framed for that purpose. Any oppression, any partisan partiality, which experience may have shown in the working of the existing laws may well engage the careful attention, both of Congress and of the Executive in their respective spheres of duty for the correction of these mischiefs. As no Congressional elections occur until after the regular session of Congress will have been held, there seems to be no public exigency that would preclude a seasonable consideration at this session of any administration of details that might improve the present methods designed for the protection of all citizens in a complete and equal exercise of the right and power of suffrage at such elections. But with my views, both of the constitutionality and of the value of the existing laws, I cannot approve any measure for their repeal, except in connection with enactment of other legislation, which may reasonably be expected to afford wiser and more efficient safeguards for free and honest Congressional elections.

(Signed) RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 29, 1879.

A Big Irishman.

The Emerald Isle has long been famous for producing giants. The most celebrated of these was the well-known O'Brien, whom we first hear of as a great raw youth crying in a public house because unable to pay the bill, having been left penniless through a quarrel with his exhibitor. A gentleman, taking compassion on him, paid his debt, and advised the young giant to set up on his own account. Acting on this recommendation, O'Brien started a public house in Bristol, long known by the sign of the "Giant's Castle." A memorial tablet in Trenchard Street Roman Catholic Chapel records his stature as having been eight feet three inches. He was very anxious that his remains should not fall into the hands of the anatomists, and gave directions for securing his grave against desecration from body-snatchers. It has, however, been disputed whether the giant's bones still rest in his grave, or form one of the curiosities of the Hunterian Museum, though we believe they still lie undisturbed in a deep-sunk grave. Poor O'Brien had to take his constitutionals under cover of darkness, to avoid being mobbed by the curious, and, like most big fellows, proved himself a simple and inoffensive man; though once he inadvertently terrified a watchman almost to death by lighting his pipe at a street lamp, the sudden appearance of which strange apparition threw the watchman into a fit. His colossal proportions once saved the giant from being robbed, the highwayman who stopped his carriage riding away in terror at the sight of O'Brien's huge face thrust through the window to see what was the matter.—Chambers' Journal.

PERSONALS.

Cardinal Newman is 85 years of age, and looks it.

Prince Alexander, of Bulgaria, is described as an effeminate youth of 22.

Senator Lamar, of Mississippi, is a graduate from Emory College, Georgia.

Phil Tieman, a well-known billiardist of the olden time, died in Cincinnati.

William H. Vanderbilt has paid $700 for a dozen and a half of dessert plates.

Mrs. Laura Fair is to lecture in New Orleans for the benefit of the poor of the city.

Senator Garland, of Arkansas, is a graduate of St. Mary's College, Bardstown, Ky.

Senator Edmunds will take his family to Europe after the adjournment of Congress.

Archbishop Purcell has been sued for $22,000 by the Lafayette Bank, of Cincinnati.

Mr. Ross has visited over 600 lost children, all of whom were believed to be Charley.

Senator Matt Carpenter will remain in Florida, studying his health, for a month or two.

Senators Hill, of Colorado, and Anthony, of Rhode Island, were educated at Brown University.

Widow Oliver has engaged a new lawyer to carry up and on her suit against Simon Cameron.

Senators Voorhees, of Indiana, and Booth, of California, graduated from Asbury (Ind.) University.

If Cardinal Newman outlives the present incumbent, it is believed that he will be the next Pope.

Mr. Charles H. Pulham, for many years city editor of the New York Times, has just died in New York city.

Mr. Winans, the American millionaire, is building in the Clyde a monster ship at a cost of nearly $5,000,000.

West Point has three graduates in the Senate—Burnside, of Rhode Island; Carpenter, of Wisconsin, and Maxey, of Texas.

The property of the late Hon. Asa Packer, of Pennsylvania coal-and-iron fame, is estimated at from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000.

Senator Kernan's eldest son has gone abroad to study for the priesthood at the same institution at which Gen. Sherman's son Thomas is a student.

Tennyson got $1,800 for his poem "The Defense of Lucknow," but Parole earns more money in one race than Tennyson could by writing poetry a month.

Ex-Senator Conover, of Florida, who wanted a foreign mission, has accepted the position of Inspector of Customs along the Florida coast at a salary of $4 a day.

Mr. James M. Sutherland, more familiarly known to the public as Senator Bob Hart, the minstrel, is giving gospel temperance lectures to large audiences in New York.

Old Harrison Davis, from Davis' Bend, Miss., who was over 70, fell sick at Lawrence, Kan., the other day. He was one of the searchers for the promised land. He refused medical aid, saying: "Why, bless you, children, de Lord has smiled on me, and I'll close dese ole eyes in de land ob promise," and, with a "Bress de Lamb," the light left his kindly old face and his days were ended in the happy land he had sought in Kansas.

Within an Ace of Death.

Col. Gilmor, in relating the story of a fight in which he figured, says, in his "Four Years in the Saddle:" "Turning half around in my saddle to call on my men, I received a sudden shock, and felt deadly sick, and at the same instant saw a man trail his gun and run off. I killed him before he got three steps. His ball passed through two coats and stuck in a pack of cards in my left side-pocket. They were quite new, the wrapper not even having been broken open. The suits were each distinct. The bullet passed through all, stopping at the last card, which was the ace of spades."

FARM NOTES.

THE crow destroys more grasshoppers than any other bird.

TO PREVENT lameness and keep your horse's feet in good condition, stuff them frequently with linseed meal mixed with soft soap.

A FARMER who has tried it speaks in the highest praise of gas tar for painting wagon wheels, stating that it tightens tires and spokes better than anything else that can be tried.

OIL-CAKE must not be fed to cows alone. For cows that are dry, feed two pounds of oil-cake with four to six pounds of corn-meal per day. Avoid sameness in diet. Corn-meal alone is likely to put the cow's system in a feverish condition.

"YEARS ago I was told by a young Scotchman that if I would feed my sows plenty of sulphur for several days previous to farrowing time, as well as occasionally afterward, I would have no trouble. In an experience of fifteen years I have found it to work like a charm."

THE following recipe for home-made guano is given: Collect a barrel of bones, crush them, mix with a barrel of oak or hickory ashes; moisten with soap suds; apply a quart or two as a special fertilizer on melons, squashes, early corn and cucumbers, allowing a gill to the hill.

THE best soil for beans is a mellow clay or sandy loam. Prepare the land as for corn, fitted in the nicest manner. Plant ten days or two weeks after planting corn. Marrow beans require one and one-eighth bushels seed per acre; mediums, three-fourths of a bushel; pea beans, one-half bushel; kidney or other large beans more, in proportion to size. A fair crop is twenty bushels per acre. —Cor. Country Gentleman.

A CORRESPONDENT recommends milk for fattening fowls, and says that it should be fed in connection with a grain diet, for one counteracts any possible deleterious influence of the other. If kept in a darkened place and fed sparingly on milk, with grain in proper proportions, you will soon have something very choice to offer up on your tables to your friends as well as to your family.

IT is often among the very best milkers and butter-makers that nervous animals occur, and we cannot afford to have their value thus impaired. No violence should be allowed among the cows at any time; but, if you have impatient help, or are quick-tempered yourself, let some person who does not get mad so easily milk the nervous cows. A cruel man ought never to have charge of any stock whatever.

THE Canada Farmer says: A few simple rules in the arrangement of flower beds will materially enhance the effect produced. Among these are:

1. Avoid placing rose-colored next to scarlet, orange or violet.
2. Do not place orange next to yellow, nor blue next to violet.
3. White relieves any color, but do not place it next to yellow.
4. Orange goes well with blue, and yellow with violet.
5. Rose-color and purple always go well together.

OLD hands need not be advised to take spring work easy at first. Go from one job to another, as jobs ripen. Do something else for a change in the afternoon. Heavy or difficult jobs had better be talked over beforehand, and tackled when everybody feels like it. Let teams be inured to hardship just so gradually, and by half-day or single-day spells. The difference between a fagged-out and brisk team is just that betwixt pleasure and pain. Farm games may be so played that while the team is laboring hardest men get a breathing spell, and vice versa. Keep the small jobs and repairs well up, and the big ones will take care of themselves.

PLANTING ROSES.—The beds having been prepared for their reception, the roses may be planted as soon as received, if the weather is favorable. Have the roots moist, and plant somewhat deeper than grown; if in dry weather, pour in a little water before filling up the hole around the roots, but do not let the surface become wet, as this causes it to bake, then press the soil down firmly around the plant. Protect for a few days from the hot sun, until the plant becomes established in its new home, when it should commence to grow at once. No manure or fertilizing material should ever be put in the hole, or near the roots, unless thoroughly rotted and well mixed with the soil.

SPEAKING of making apple trees bear fruit on alternate years or every year, the Rural New Yorker relates this: "Many years ago a friend of mine had a dozen apple trees that were bearing heavy crops of apples every other year. He wished fruit every year, so he took a long pole—the trees were large—and gave them a heavy beating on one side, or half of the tree, just as the fruit was about the size of hickory nuts, knocking off all fruit on the south side of the trees. The result was, as I saw for several years, that these trees bore heavy crops on one side one year, and the next year a heavy crop on the other side, so that for many years he had plenty of apples for home use every year. His trees stood in a rich soil that was annually cultivated—no grass sod to cover the roots."

Settlement of the Public Lands.

Several days since it was published that the Register of the Land Office at Fargo, D. T., had received in one week applications for 192,000 acres of land for settlement under the Timber-Culture act. Now comes the Register of the Land Office at Cruxtons, Minn., saying that during the same week he had received applications for 500,000 acres. Of the ninety-six Registers of the Land Office over half are reporting immense increases in the settlement of the public lands in the West. The General Land Office here is running behind, because of the increased business of the office, which, during the past two years, has more than trebled.—Washington telegram.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

CREAM color and black can be worn in slight mourning. Gray can only be considered slight mourning when it is either plain gray or worn in connection with black. Even with white it would hardly be mourning; with plum color it certainly would not be.

CARDS are never "sent in" when the persons called on are at home. The gentleman should give his name distinctly to the servant, who will announce him. If only the lady is at home, he should, on departure, leave his card in the hall for the master of the house.

PUT cauliflower to soak in salted water for an hour or more; look over carefully, remove the hard stalk and leaves; scald for five minutes; cut into pieces and put into a pie-dish; add a little milk, and season with pepper, salt and butter. Cover the whole with dry grated cheese and bake.

GOOD FOR FLIES.—It is said that if a few chips of quassia wood be soaked in sweetened water, the mixture will be poisonous to any fly who can be induced to drink it; but mosquito bars at the windows and eternal vigilance within are better remedies than any of those which leave dead insects about the house.

TAKE Concord grapes when fully ripe and stem without breaking. Allow a little more than a quarter of a pound of sugar to each pound of fruit; for each can of fruit make a sirup with about a quart of water, and allow the fruit just to boil in it. Put the grapes into cans before they crack open, and seal them tightly.

A LADY has found the following remedy for the prevention of bed-bugs: After cleaning the bedstead thoroughly, rub it over with hog's lard. The lard should be rubbed on with a woolen cloth. Bugs will not infest such a bedstead for a whole season. The reason for this is the antipathy of insects for grease of any kind.

HOUSEKEEPERS sometimes wish to give silver a little brightening without going through all the ceremonies of a formal cleaning, and this can be easily managed by the use of a silver cloth. Take two ounces of powdered hartshorn and boil it in a pint of water. Dip small squares of cloth in the liquid and hang them up to dry without wringing.

NECESSARY KNOWLEDGE.—The mistress of a household should undoubtedly have a practical knowledge of housework in all its branches. A knowledge of cookery will enable her to point out to inefficient cooks the cause of mistake and failure; and she should not only know how things should look and taste when sent to the table, but be able to judge of, and choose well, every kind of provision. It will not be easy for cooks to impose on a lady who knows exactly how much of every ingredient is requisite for each dish, and who is able to estimate the quantity of food required daily for her household. It may not, under all circumstances, be necessary for a lady to exercise her knowledge in these important matters; if she has a cook who has proved herself trustworthy she will do well to delegate large powers to her. But it is obvious that, to judge the skill and honesty of her cook, the lady must possess the knowledge here indicated.

Hair of the Presidents.

In the Patent Office, at Washington, there are many objects of interest connected with the Government and those who administered its affairs in times gone by. While examining some of these objects of curiosity, nothing struck us so forcibly as the samples of small locks of hair, taken from the heads of different chief magistrates, from Washington down to President Pierce, secured in a frame covered with glass. Here is, in fact, a part and parcel of what once constituted the living bodies of those illustrious individuals whose names are as familiar as household words, but who now live only in history and the remembrance of the past.

The hair of Washington is nearly a pure white, fine and smooth in its appearance.

That of John Adams is nearly the same in color, though, perhaps, a little coarser.

The hair of Jefferson is of a different character, being a mixture of white and auburn, or a sandy brown, and rather coarse. In his youth Mr. Jefferson's hair was remarkable for its bright color.

The hair of Madison is coarse, and of a mixed white and dark.

The hair of Monroe is a handsome dark auburn, smooth and free from any admixture whatever. He is the only President, excepting Pierce, whose hair had undergone no change in color.

The hair of John Quincy Adams is somewhat peculiar, being coarse, and of a yellowish gray in color.

The hair of Gen. Jackson is almost a perfect white, but coarse in its character, as might be supposed by those who have examined the portraits of the old hero.

The hair of Van Buren is white and smooth in appearance.

The hair of Gen. Harrison is a fine white, with a slight admixture of black.

The hair of John Tyler is a mixture of white and brown.

The hair of James K. Polk is almost a pure white.

The hair of Gen. Taylor is white, with a slight admixture of brown.

The hair of Millard Fillmore is, on the other hand, brown, with a slight admixture of white.

The hair of Franklin Pierce is a dark brown, of which he had a plentiful crop.

It is somewhat remarkable, however, that since Pierce's time no one has thought of preserving the hair of his successors. There are vacancies in the case, but there is no hair either of Buchanan, Lincoln, Johnson or Grant, for the inspection of futurity.

[From the New York Sun.]

The Republican programme for 1880 is fully revealed in the united and obstinate resistance of the leaders to the section of the Army bill as first passed, forbidding the use of troops at elections, and to the separate bill, where the objection raised by the fraudulent President to the inclusion of civil officers in the repeal was met by striking out that word, and by confining the operation of the proposed act to the army and navy specifically.

Instead of responding to this concession of the majority in Congress, made to relieve every pretext for opposition, the hostility of the Republicans became more bitter because their motives were now exposed, and the hypocrisy of the veto was unveiled. Like men in a violent storm of passion, they lost balance, and the wild utterances of Zach Chandler expressed the real feelings of the party for which he spoke.

The cooler and more sophistical Mr Edmunds sought to furnish reasons for a second veto, by misrepresenting the statutes, and with a full knowledge, too, that until 1865, in the midst of flagrant war, there had never been an enactment of any kind which in any way, or under any construction, permitted the presence of troops at elections. In framing the constitution, the fathers kept in view the example of England, which, for more than a hundred years before, had expressly prohibited the military from being at or near a polling-place.

The Republicans are desperate, and they mean to hold the Government by force of arms, if necessary. They are to-day in a minority of more than a million of votes throughout the Union, the great States of New York and Pennsylvania and Illinois and Ohio having been carried by them at the last elections only because their opponents were divided. The figures are instructive now, when the plans of the Presidential campaign are taking form and shape:

NEW YORK—1878.

Republican vote	391,118	Democratic vote	356,451
		National	71,189
		Prohibition	4,238
Total			431,878
Deduct Republican vote			391,118
Republican minority			40,760

PENNSYLVANIA—1878.

Republican vote	319,490	Democratic vote	297,137
		National	81,758
		Prohibition	3,759
Total			382,654
Deduct Republican vote			319,490
Republican minority			63,164

OHIO—1878.

Republican vote	274,120	Democratic vote	270,966
		National	38,332
		Prohibition	5,682
Total			314,980
Deduct Republican vote			274,120
Republican minority			40,860

ILLINOIS—1878.

Republican vote	215,283	Democratic vote	169,965
		National	65,673
		Prohibition	2,192
Total			237,830
Deducting Republican vote			215,283
Republican minority			22,547

These four States cast 107 electoral votes, much more than a fourth of all the colleges. Measured by the elections of last fall, the Republicans are in a minority of more than 167,000 in these States alone.

The Republican managers are fully aware of these facts, and they know that other States are in the same condition. Their policy is narrowed down to a small compass, and it may be expressed in the words: Divide and conquer. They propose to divide by raising an immense campaign fund from the pet banks, the officeholders, the syndicates and the great Government contractors, all representing special interests whose future success depends upon a continuation of Republican ascendency.

This money is to be applied mainly in keep up the National or Greenback organization separately in every State where a fusion with the Democrats would endanger the Republican ticket. The experiment was tried on a large scale in Indiana in 1876, under the direction of the late Senator Morton and of his henchman, James N. Tyner, now First Assistant Postmaster General. One Greenbacker withdrew as a candidate for Governor, but another was found ready to take his place. A million or two of cash will go far to remove the scruples of patriots who may be in market.

Having thus divided the opposition, according to the programme at least, the next step will be to conquer remaining difficulties by the use of the army at the polls. This element is essential to complete success, for without it the first part may fail, because of a latent belief among the managers that one cannot succeed without the other. The stalwarts have captured Hayes, and henceforth they will run him and overcome all resistance in his Cabinet, if any there be.

Hayes has been made to believe that the danger of impeachment is past, and that he is now in secure possession of an office to which he was not elected, and of what to him is far more valuable, $50,000 a year and a free living. He desires to reinstate himself in favor with his own party, the leaders of which recently discarded and denounced him. The humiliation of a surrender to Conkling, Chandler, Hamlin and their associates costs him nothing. He has no honorable pride to wound and no manhood to defend.

It is thus seen that the army at the polls, as it was used in 1870, in 1872, in 1874, and in 1876, consecutively and openly, is needed to carry out the plan of the Republicans for 1880. Allow the law of 1865 to stand, and vote appropriations for the present army, and what is there to prevent the fraudulent President from massing thousands of troops in this city and ships of war in the harbor, as Grant did in 1870, under that authority? A pretext can easily be invented, and a thousand will be found, if necessary, to excuse such interference. He may scatter the whole army among the great cities and supplement the troops with another army of Supervisors, Marshals, general deputies and special deputies at $5 a day. Let Congress, then, stand firm. Better disperse the army to the four winds than submit to the dictation of a fraudulent President and his party keepers. We want no standing armies to manage our elections.

IOWA DEMOCRACY.

Meeting of the State Convention—A Fine Body of Men—The Proceedings Harmonious, and a Strong Ticket Nominated—The Candidates and the Platform.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, Iowa, May 22.

The Democratic State Convention, held here yesterday, was beyond doubt the largest Democratic political gathering ever held in Iowa. Besides being largely attended, the personnel of the body was good—so much so that it was noticeable by everybody. Even the delegates themselves were congratulating each other on the improved membership of the body over former conventions.

Ed Campbell, Jr., Chairman of the State Central Committee, called the convention to order, and, on his motion, Hon. J. R. Hagerman, of Keokuk, law partner of Secretary of War McCrary, was made temporary Chairman. He made a speech eulogizing the Democrats in Congress for their patriotic position in demanding the repeal of the election laws, and forcing upon Hayes the responsibility of denying American people the right to go to the polls and deposit their ballots unintimidated by the presence of Federal bayonets and partisan Supervisors and unscrupulous United States Marshals and their deputies. His remarks were vehemently applauded.

Gen. Augustus C. Dodge, of Burlington, at one time a United States Senator from Iowa, was made permanent Chairman. He, too, insisted that the issue before the people was one against bayonet rule, centralized power and a corrupt ballot, which the Republican party is nursing and relying upon to override the people and perpetuate its own power.

Hon. H. H. Trimble, of Davis county, one of the ablest lawyers in Iowa, was nominated by acclamation for Governor. Col. Trimble not only fought in the Mexican war, but he made a brilliant record in the late unpleasantness between the sections. At the battle of Pea Ridge he received a rebel pea in his head which is there to this day. He is a strong man with the people, and will poll several thousand more votes than any other man that could have been named by the convention.

Capt. J. A. O. Yeoman, a gallant crippled soldier, was nominated for Lieutenant Governor amid yells and hurrahs that made some of the stalwart Republicans present feel and believe that the revolution had actually begun. Yeoman was ushered hastily to the platform, where he made a ten-minutes' speech that fairly brought the whole body of delegates to their feet, and created the wildest enthusiasm.

The remainder of the ticket was a mere formality and was made up in a hurry and a hurrah. Reuben Noble, of Clayton county, was nominated for Judge of the Supreme Court, and Irwin Baker was made the candidate for Superintendent. Ed. Campbell, Jr., was re-elected Chairman of the State Central Committee, and L. G. Kinne, of Tama county, was re-elected Secretary of the committee.

The following platform was adopted:

Resolved, That the Democratic party now, as in the past, insists that our liberties depend upon the strict construction and observance of the constitution of the United States and all its amendments.

Resolved, That the States and the General Government should be sternly restrained to their respective spheres and to the exercise only of the powers granted and reserved by the constitution.

Resolved, That the policy of the Republican party, by which it inflates the importance of the States when necessary to cover the theft of the Presidency, and in turn magnifies the functions of the General Government to cover the coercion of the States into indorsement of the partisan will of the fraudulent Executive, is a policy full of evil and fruitful of danger.

Resolved, That such policy is intended to array section against section, the States against the General Government, and it against the States in turn, for the purpose of destroying the freedom of both, and teaching the people to look to a strong government as shelter from the anarchy its advocates have planned.

Resolved, That evidences of these nefarious purposes are furnished by the present attitude of the Republican party, which is arrayed against a free ballot, on which depends all the liberties secured to us by the constitution.

Resolved, That we view with alarm the determination of the Republican party, through its fraudulent Executive, to deprive this republic of its army, as necessary to the defense of its frontier, and its protection from foreign and domestic enemies, by vetoing appropriations for the pay and support of our soldiers unless they can be used to force voters to record the mere will of the Executive.

Resolved, That we hail the Democratic Senators and Representatives in Congress as worthy the heroic lineage of American citizens in standing firmly for the American idea in government as against the despotic theory from which our Revolutionary fathers revolted, and we ask all lovers of liberty to join us and them in protest against the change in our form of government proposed by the Republican party, which will substitute the will of one man for that of the majority of all the people.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the substitution of United States treasury notes for national bank notes, and of the abolition of national banks as banks of issue; that the Government of the United States issue the money for the people; and, further, that we favor a reduction of the bonded debt of the United States as fast as practicable, and the application of the idle money in the treasury for that purpose.

Resolved, That we favor the free and unlimited coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains, and providing certificates for silver bullion which may be deposited in the United States treasury, the same to be a legal tender for all purposes.

Resolved, That we favor a tariff for revenue only.

Resolved, That we are in favor of economy in public expenditures, including a reduction of salaries, local and general, whenever they may be deemed excessive, and also a reduction in the number of officials.

Resolved, That the Democratic party of Iowa is desirous of promoting temperance, and, being opposed to free whisky, it is in favor of a judicious License law.

Resolved, That we favor holding all public servants to a strict accountability, and their prompt and severe punishment for all thefts of public moneys and maladministration of public office.

A Wasp's Nest.

"A wasp's nest has 15,000 cells," and the greatest of these "cells" is to sit down on the nest under the mistaken impression that all the wasps have gone to the seaside or somewhere on a visit. A single wasp, loafing in the back kitchen, will give the sitter a warm reception. And no doubt a married one would treat him in the same manner.—Exchange.

PEOPLE in England and out of it are beginning to show fears as to Lord Beaconsfield's foreign policy. His mind, though not particularly apt to fasten itself on details, seems always seeking something new and wonderful. He is always trying to find out something the public never heard of, so that people may say, "Here is a wonderful man, who, while we have thought of every-day matters, has been discovering something new."

THE average rate upon the funded debt will be only 4.4 on the 1st of August, after the completion of the refunding process, against the average rate of 6.4 in 1865. The improvement in the rate has been 2 per cent., and the decrease of the funded debt about $360,000,000. Decrease in the annual interest charge of the debt, $58,000,000.

ROCH, the general executioner of France, followed his many victims recently, at the age of 55. During the eight years that he presided over the guillotine he had cut off fifty-four heads. His salary was $1,600 a year, with the addition of $2.50 on working days.

THE NEW NORTHWEST.

How it Looks to an Englishman—Britons Advised to Pack Their Trunks and Emigrate at Once.

[From the London Times.]

Trade is reviving in the United States, while it is declining in England. Why should that be? An Englishman asking that question in America is generally answered to this effect:

"We are prospering because, unlike you, we are no longer manufacturing at a loss. Since 1873 we have closed a large proportion both of mills and foundries, and many of our mechanics have become farmers. Consequently less is made, but what is made sells well.

"While Great Britain persists in spinning more cotton and puddling more iron than her customers want, the price both of her cotton and her iron will continually fall. If the present stagnation of trade is indeed caused by over-production, entailing large stocks of unsalable goods being left on the manufacturers' hands, it would seem as if the present policy of adding to those stocks must result in perpetuating that stagnation. Better to make little and sell at a profit than make much and sell at a loss.

"English manufacturers and English workmen will do well to seek fresh employment for their capital. If they hold on, hoping against hope that, the era of bad trade once past, England will regain the monopoly of manufacturing for the world, they will be acting like the foolish ostrich who, burying her head in the sand, refuses to see what all around her can see.

"We have long since said that we will not take her manufactures, and now Germany, France, and Russia seem to be saying the same thing. If England chooses to lend out her capital to foreign countries, as she did prior to 1873, the countries so favored will no doubt be very glad to buy English iron with English gold. But, without the gold, foreign countries lack either the means or the inclination to buy the iron.

"Foreign protection has deprived Great Britain of some of the continental markets; American competition is beating her out of some of the neutral markets. Take Canada, for instance. In 1873 and 1878 the value of goods entered for consumption was respectively from:

	1873.	1878.
Great Britain	$68,522,776	$39,572,239
United States	47,735,068	51,332,069

"In the one case a decrease of $28,000,000, in the other an increase of $4,000,000.

"Unpatriotic Canadian ladies prefer American cotton to English shoddy, and Canadian lumberman will not buy English axes, because they can not chop. Nine out of every ten agricultural inventions are born in our workshops, and consequently nine out of every ten agricultural implements used in Canada are bought in the United States.

"England is burdened with a larger agricultural and a larger manufacturing population than she can well support. When the pastures of Dakota and the corn lands of Minnesota are fairly opened up, her farmers will be worse off than her mechanics. With beef selling next summer in London at 6d. a pound, and wheat at 30s. a quarter, how will her farmers pay their rents? Like the mechanics, they will soon be seeking work elsewhere."

"If the English trades unions were practicably managed and would place some of their starving members where they could earn a living, all classes would be benefited. The artisans remaining in the workshops would be benefited by the consequent rise in wages, while the employers would be compensated for that loss by the relief of the poor rates and the probable subsidence of bankrupt competition."

Such, sir, are some of the American arguments; and, if they be as sound as the American lands, every man out of work had better pack up his trunk and start at once for the Western States. In Minnesota, for instance, he will find a country, not exactly flowing with milk and honey, but rich beyond his most extravagant hopes.

In the vale of the Red river, though the soil is more fertile than in the tropics, the air is more exhilarating than champagne. The rotation of crops is an art unknown. For upward of forty years crops of wheat averaging twenty to twenty-five bushels to the acre have been gathered off the same fields. Manure is never used, for the natural soil is richer than manure. Nor does the land need clearing. No forests encumber the varied expanse of prairie and of lake. The settler may arrive in March, plow his land in April, and reap his harvest in July. The wheat is the highest price is Chicago, and, in two years' time, with ordinary good fortune, he should have replaced his original outlay.

Until this autumn, there being no cheap means of transportation, much of the grain could not be easily got to market.

But a railway has now been opened throughout the whole length of the valley, and young farmers from Ontario and the Eastern States are pouring in by hundreds. Land is selling freely for less than £1 an acre, and, while to every healthy laborer Minnesota offers good wages for hard work, to every farmer owning £300 or £400 she offers affluence, if not a fortune, and a certain future for his children. There, as elsewhere, the settler's life is not fitted for the weak or the sickly, but for the industrious and the robust it is a life full of promise.

In those life-giving Western States an energetic man may easily become in turn farmer, storekeeper, banker, or, if he will, Senator. He grows with the people, and the growth of the people is almost miraculous. Ten years since, the population of Minneapolis might have been counted by hundreds; to-day it numbers upwards of 40,000. Within three years all the available land in the Red River valley will probably be settled on and sold. So if any man thinks of going he had best delay no longer. Minnesota is no Castle of Indolence. Some hardships every emigrant must expect to undergo. His labor, for the first two years, will probably be more severe than in England. But, his ties to home once severed, he will never regret his choice. He will have exchanged despondency for hope; he will be working not only for bare life, but for prosperity in the future, and with hope of the future those troubles which might otherwise have seemed unendurable will appear as trifles unworthy of complaint.

THE bridge over the Muddy fork of Silver creek, on the J., M. & I. R. R., near New Albany, has a bloody history. The upright timbers covering the track are very low; so low, in fact, as to render it very dangerous for one standing upon a car to pass under the structure. Sixteen men have been killed at this bridge.

THE Catholic Total Abstinence Society of New Albany has resolved not to celebrate the Fourth of July by a picnic, for the reason that Bishop Chatard has prohibited dancing at all picnics of the church. The Bishop also prohibits beers or liquors at all picnics held by members of the Catholic Church.

THE sportsmen of Wabash have organized the North Lake and River Association of Northern Indiana, with Judge John U. Pettit as President. They have bought five acres of ground on the north side of Turkey lake, Kosciusko county, and will at once set about improving it, the improvements to embrace a club-house.

THE other night some unknown persons at Liberty attempted to blow up a saloon owned by a man named Fallons. An ale bottle was filled with powder and placed beneath the house with a fuse, and when it went off it knocked the foundation out and dug a hole big enough to bury an elephant, but, strange to say, did not hurt the house.

AT the late Grand Encampment of Odd Fellows, at Indianapolis, the Grand Secretary's report shows a better condition of the order than in 1878. Two encampments have been suspended, leaving 141 in existence. The resources of the encampment amount to $54,316.10; receipts, $9,610.94; relief and charity, $4,486.94; total expenses of the encampment, $8,390.92.

THE Grand Encampment of the Independent Champions of the Red Cross of the State, in session in Fort Wayne, elected the following officers for the ensuing year: Grand Commander, I. W. Coddington; Grand Captain of the Host, A. I. Ball; Grand Chaplain, Mason Long; Grand Mistress of Ceremonies, Miss Mary Pritchard; Grand Sentinel, A. A. Davis.

The Prince of Wales.

The curate of a South London church, whose pronunciation is more pedantic than proper, has been very justly snubbed for alluding to the heir apparent as though his name were written "Awlbert" Edward. One of his parishioners asked him the other day why he so significantly excluded the Prince of Wales in his prayers for the royal family. "Exclude him?" the curate asked, quite surprisedly. "What do you mean?" "Why," she said, "you always pray for all but Edward, Prince of Wales!"

AUBURN, INDIANA, JUNE 5, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY, EDITORS.

The Hartford City Telegram published a lengthy editorial last week, favoring Hon. Franklin Landers for governor.

A terrible cyclone passed over Kansas, the western part of Missouri, and southern Nebraska, on Friday evening of last week. The tornado destroyed a great amount of property, and killed a number of people. The storm was most severe in and around Irving, Kansas, where 16 houses were torn to pieces, eight persons killed and 25 wounded.

The Ft. Wayne Sentinel has been making constant improvements in its style and general make-up, since the recent change of hands, and it is now as fine a specimen of a first-class city daily as one can find in any city of equal population—or even larger. The change in its local and telegraphic news is quite marked, and the efforts of its present editors and proprietors cannot help but be appreciated.

General James Shields, late United States senator from Missouri, died suddenly on last Sunday evening. Gen. Shields has, during his life, represented three different states in the U. S. senate. He was in the Florida war, the Mexican war and the war between the states. He was also governor of Oregon territory at one time. He was a brave true man—a firm, consistent, unyielding democrat—and in all the relations of an eventful life bore himself with true, manly courage and dignity.

Last Monday being the day fixed by law for the appointments of county superintendent, the trustee of the several townships met at the county auditor's office, and organized by the election of Mr. Wm. Henderson, of Concord tp as president. All the trustees were present except Kutzner (democrat) of Union, and Greenwald (republican) of Stafford. The republican trustees having previously met in caucus and united upon Mr. W. H. McIntosh, presented his name for the position. The name of James A. Barnes was also presented. The trustees proceeded to vote by ballot, with the following result:

W. H. McIntosh	6
James A. Barnes	5

Mr. McIntosh was declared elected.

A case is now pending in the Cass county circuit court, at Logansport, in which Messrs. Nick Ensley, J. C. Somers, L. J. Hopkins, Hank Shull, G. C. Ralston, A. J. Ralston and Tom. C. Mays are defendants, and Geo. Hazzard is plaintiff. The defendants are charged with assault and battery with intent to kill, but the action is only brought for the purpose of putting the defendants to trouble and expense. The grounds upon which this action is brought, as we understand them, are as follows: Some months ago a warrant was placed in the hands of J. C. Somers, deputy sheriff of this county, for the arrest of Geo. Hazzard; the deputy, in company with the other defendants named, went to Logansport and found Hazzard in jail. In order to get possession of Hazzard, the Auburn parties were compelled to give bond for Hazzard's appearance at Logansport when demanded by that court. The bond was executed and Hazzard was turned over to the defendants in this case, who started to this place with the prisoner. On the way to the depot at Logansport, Hazzard pretended to become alarmed for his safety, and asked to be protected by the authorities at Logansport, whereupon the sheriff of Cass county again took charge of him and placed him in prison, promising to retain him, which he failed to do. Hazzard now brings this action to sustain his pretended scare. There is nothing in the case.

Hazzard's Story at Logansport.

We have no desire to bring Geo. Hazzard into notoriety again in this community, but in order to correct his statements as they appear in the Logansport Journal of last Friday, we condescend to mention his name in the COURIER. The Journal says, among other things, that, "in pursuance of an agreement made with the prosecuting attorney of DeKalb county, at Indianapolis, in the presence of Mr. Byfield, Edgar Henderson, Mrs. Gear and D. C. Justice, of this city, to the effect that he was to be allowed to go to Auburn and transact some private business at that place without arrest on trifling charges, he went to Waterloo last Saturday, and in the evening drove over to Auburn, four miles distant. He had been there but a few minutes when an affidavit was made, and he was arrested for provoking an assault a year or two ago. This was immediately followed by five other warrants for provoking assault, carrying concealed weapons and desecrating the Sabbath. He declined at that late hour to give bail, and the parties refusing to try the cases that night he was put in jail by sheriff. On Monday he was arrested on four other warrants on like charges, and refused trials on one pretext or another. On Tuesday, Mr. Byfield, one of his attorneys from Indianapolis, and Mr. Edgar Henderson arrived, and demonstrations were begun. A fellow by the name of Cool, and another named Gross, threatened Henderson that if he bailed Hazzard out of jail, they would shoot Hazzard and mob Henderson, and seven shot guns were stacked in the open court house yard, and several others in an adjoining building, and various demonstrations made, until the sheriff ordered the court house yard cleared. On Wednesday, the argument on the indictment for embezzlement came up before Judge McClellan, and the court quashed it. Hazzard then prepared to fight the thirteen arrests that had been made and took change of venue to Butler, and finally succeeded in beating every case in which he had been arrested before a justice of the peace. In the meantime some of the charges were revamped before the grand jury, who, in accordance with the general programme, indicted him again. He at once gave bail on the charge until the next term, and was discharged."

"Hazzard has been arrested forty-one times by the Auburn crowd, and now proposes to put them on the defensive. He vows that all the money he can raise shall be placed to "law account" for the benefit of those who have been pursuing him for the last year."

The facts are, that the only agreement that was ever made by any prosecuting attorney, was that made by Mr. Peterson who was deputy prosecutor at that time, which was, as stated by Mr. Peterson in court, that if Hazzard would come back to Auburn and pay the parties from whom he had stolen, that he (Peterson) would use his influence to settle all criminal prosecutions against Hazzard. As to Hazzard's recent visit to Auburn, we are reliably informed that he came to discharge his recognizance in the sum of $2,000, for a felony for embezzling the funds of the First National Bank. On his arrival he was arrested for forgery, on the affidavit of Mr. Nick Ensley, he was also charged with provoking an assault against Mr. Cool; his attorneys not being here he waived an examination and went to jail. On the following Monday morning Hazzard took a change of venue to Butler; rather than follow him to Butler, the deputy prosecutor dismissed the Cool case. The grand jury was convened and six idictments were returned against Hazzard—one for grand larceny, one for forgery and four for false pretenses. He gave bond in the sum of $6,000 for his appearance at the next term of court. All Hazzard's stories concerning the "thirteen arrests" "shot-guns" &c., are the merest bosh, and could only be concocted by a villainous cuss, who, being refused lodging at our hotels, begged to be allowed to sleep in the jail and board with the sheriff, when not under arrest, and after putting the sheriff and his estimable lady to as much trouble as possible, sneaked off without even returning thanks. We might continue to enumerate the rascalities and dirty tricks of Geo. Hazzard ad infinitum, but will only add that enough is known to make it interesting for him up to the date of his apprenticeship in the cigar business. Prosecutor Adams and his deputy, Mr. Moody, deserve credit for their efforts to secure George a permanent home—a home for the friendless.

A High Reputation.

For years the firm of Steele & Price have deservedly had a high reputation for the excellence of their Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder and Special Flavoring Extracts. They have now added a line of strictly Unique Perfumes, rivaling in excellence the perfumes of this or any other country.

Spencerville.

—Rev. Kelso has been on the sick list.

—Mrs. Jones has not been expected to live.

—The M. E. Sunday-school will give a grand concert soon; date not yet ascertained. The Lutherans will also give one as soon as practicable.

—The Spencerville Juvenile base ball club played a match game with the Juveniles of Pigeon Roost, on Saturday the 31st, inst. Spencerville boys were the victors.

—J. W. Cahill is about to erect a new store.

—Cheney brothers have purchased a new refrigerator.

—Mr. Wilson and family, of Tennessee, are late arrivals. They will visit at Spencerville.

—Abraham Johnson, Jr., go to the junction and return that coat.

—The Newvilians gave a grand fizzle of an opera at this place on the evening of the 29th. "The Star of the East" was palmed off as one of the Newvilians, but the hoax was exposed. It compares very unfavorably with Spencerville talent. The "boss" singer, of whom we have heard so much, and in whom we were so badly disappointed, attempted to sing too high, consequently made a ridiculous failure; the singing was loud and shrill; the instrumental music, although by the "Star of the East," was a decided failure. Although the amateurs failed to elicit any enthusiasm or a single encore, yet they awakened the sympathy of the audience as they were very badly frightened. However, the reception given to the Newvilians was superior in every respect to that given to the Spencerville silver cornet band, by the people of Newville.

SCRIBBLER.

A Great Historical Work.

The Pictorial History of the World, embracing full and authentic accounts of every nation of ancient and modern times, and including a history of the rise and fall of the Greek and Roman Empires, the growth of the nation of Modern Europe, the middle ages, the crusades, the feudal system, the reformation, the discovery and settlement of the new world, etc., etc., by James D. McCabe.

There has long been a great and universally-felt want of a history of the world suitable for general use. This want is now being supplied by the National Publishing Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., Chicago, Ill., St. Louis, Mo., It is the most valuable book that has been published in this country for many years. It contains a separate and admirably written history of every nation of ancient and modern times, and is full of valuable information concerning them, presented in popular style, and in a manner that will enable the reader to refer instantly to any subject upon which information is desired. The book is a complete treasury of history, and there is not a question that can be asked concerning any historical subject, but an answer to it can be found in this work. The author does not content himself with a dry statement of facts, but sketches the life and manners of the various nations of which he treats, in life-like colors, and presents to the reader the causes which led to the prosperity and decay of the great powers of the world. He shows us the various great men—the warriors, statesmen, poets, sages and orators—of ancient and modern times, and makes them familiar to the reader; he explains the secret motives of their actions, and points out the lessons which their lives teach.

The mechanical execution of the book deserves the highest praise. It contains 1260 large double-column pages, printed in the clearest and most beautiful style on paper of the very best quality. The book is embellished with over 650 fine engravings, illustrating the events recorded in the narrative, embracing battles and other historical scenes; portraits of the great men of ancient and modern times; and views of the principal cities of the world. These engravings are genuine works of art, and were made at a cost of over $25,000. The great number and high character of these engravings make this the most valuable art publication of the century. We cannot too highly praise the numerous and beautiful portraits of historical personages with which it abounds.

The price is so low that every one can afford to purchase a copy. It is sold by subscription only, and Mr. F. E. Barstow, who is the authorized agent for this section, is now canvassing for it.

TUTT'S PILLS CURE CONSTIPATION.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE PILES.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE FEVER AND AGUE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE BILIOUS COLIC.
TUTT'S PILLS Cure KIDNEY Complaint.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE TORPID LIVER.
TUTT'S PILLS IMPART APPETITE.

DR. TUTT has succeeded in combining in these pills the heretofore antagonistic qualities of a STRENGTHENING PURGATIVE, and a PURIFYING TONIC.

Their first apparent effect is to increase the appetite by causing the food to properly assimilate. Thus the system is nourished, and by their tonic action on the digestive organs, regular and healthy evacuations are produced.

The rapidity with which PERSONS TAKE ON FLESH while under the influence of these Pills, indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, melancholy, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system. Sold everywhere.

Price 25 cents.

NO MATTER HOW HIGH THE "TONE."

WHEN A TAILOR

No matter how high up his "tone" is, asks you $10 and $14 for a pair of "trousers," as he calls them, the wool of which is sorted by orphans and poor blind girls, and is kept some years in some old mill in Germany before he buys it on credit; when this noble tailor stands off and views you, enveloped in one of his $35 suits, gesticulating like a maniac, you may think here is a little humbug about it all, but it is not humbug; it is just twenty dollars out of your pocket into his'n. There is a place where you can get precisely the same suit for—well, you call on —Fort Wayne Sentinel.—Speaking of Judge Lowry, the Warsaw Indianian says that he "has won an enviable position as a jurist in northern Indiana, as such stands at the very head of the list, his experience on the bench for many years, being of decided advantage to him in this particular."

—A man in one of the eastern cities, during a recent sudden change in the weather, was overcome by the heat and sunstruck, being unable to get his ulster off quick enough and slide into a duster.

—Dan. Hickey, of the Saginaw road, can get outside of more provender, we are informed, and do it in a shorter space of period, than any man in America. He has an outstanding challenge of $10,000 for sixty days.

—A new walk from the court-house to the west gate is a decided improvement, and a petition has been circulated with a view to having one built to the north gate, also, which will be a decided-er improvement.

—At the walking-match Monday night, or just at its close, two of the boys allowed their little "danders" to rise and came near cleaning each other up; but the timely interference of the police prevented any loss of life.

—The Butler band, considering the short time it has been organized, made some very creditable music for the decoration day exercises last week, and a little steady practice will make it a first class band. It gets away with Auburn pretty badly, as it is.

—Certain young men and boys, who make a practice of bathing in Cedar creek near Rainier's addition, will be called upon by the proper authorities and be required to donate to the school fund, unless the practice is discontinued at once. Boys, can you take a hint?

—Leslie & Mahaffey, publishers of sheet music, and music books, will send to any address their complete catalogue, with a new and beautiful song, with piano or organ accompaniments, for a three-cent stamp. Address, Leslie & Mahaffey, Altoona, Pa.

—The peaceful dignity of our flourishing village has been badly muddled up for the past week, and, between bands of music, scared horses, prize-fights and walking-bees, the boys have had variety enough to last—well, until the "Glorious Fourth," anyway.

—Cook Ford's sorrel team ran away this morning, attached to the depot hack, and they ran as though they had a train to make and no time to linger. They went direct to the barn, and no damage was done. The bob-tail trotted while the other ran, and won the heat by two laps.

—The annual basket picnic of the Sunday-schools of Richland township will be held at McCague's grove, south of Sedan, Saturday, June 14, 1879. Able speakers are expected to address the schools. All are most cordially invited to attend and contribute to the interest of the meeting.

—Just mention something about cigars in the presence of Cook Ford, and see how mechanically and instinctively he will dive down into his pocket and forthwith set 'em up. This peculiar state of affairs is owing to the late advent into his household of eight pounds of feminine babyhood.

—George—everybody knows George—came into town last Friday with the usual result. He made an effort to Foster his strength and jump into a wagon, when starting for home, but the treacherous end-gate went back on him and the ground flew up against his new clothes and "decorated" them all over.

—Our young friend, Rob. McClellan, left for Elkhart county yesterday, where he will canvass for the sale of the "Perfect" grain and grass-seed separator and cleaner, manufactured by Ensley & Shilling, of this place. Rob. is a popular fellow here, and we have no doubt he will make a success there.

—Another shooting scrape occurred at South Bend, Monday of last week, in which one Ed. Gillen was seriously though it is thought not fatally, shot by a pauper named Owen McLewer. There was little or no provocation for the deed, and it was a case of premeditated murder—or, rather, attempt to murder. Hang him.

—Another man was taken in last week by the weather, but this time we dare not divulge the name; he started on a trip with a rather airy costume—pair of low-cut shoes and a long-tailed duster—and came back next day with a borrowed overcoat and the ague. We take back our last week's joke on Charlie Hoyt, the druggist.

—He was down near the Eel River depot, and he was about four-thirds full of family disturbance; a companion was with him, whom he had just invited to "go to hell;" at last accounts the companion hadn't gone, but was industriously engaged in wiping up the platform with the courteous gentleman who had extended the invitation.

—The changes in the time-tables have in no way affected the connections at the junction, as the trains on all three roads meet there twice a day, as usual. At 12:30 the Jackson goes north, the Baltimore & Ohio west, and the Eel River northeast; and at 3:20 the Jackson goes south, the Baltimore & Ohio east, and the Eel River southwest.

—A free book of nearly 100 large octavo pages for the sick. Full of valuable notes on scrofula; diseases of the breathing organs; diseases of men; diseases of women; aches and pains; heart troubles; and a great variety of chronic diseases, with evidence that in most cases that these diseases are curable. Sent for one stamp. Address

MURRAY HILL PUB. CO.,
No. 129 E. 28th St., N. Y. 11-6m.

—Owing to the pressure of other matters, we were unable to attend the exercises at the cemetery last Friday; but we have heard the oration delivered by Capt E. D. Hartman highly complimented on all sides. As he spoke merely from notes, not from manuscript, and as our short-hand reporter was absent that day, we are unable to reproduce the text of the oration.

—The Corunna cornet band boys did their work nobly last Friday, as the music they favored us with was most flatteringly spoken of by all who heard it. They bring the blush of shame to our face, when we are forced to admit that Auburn cannot even produce a little seven-up orchestra. The Corunna band deports itself well, and reflects credit on the little town that claims it.

—We have no hesitancy in stating that the Frolique Company, which played here Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, taking into consideration the fact that it consists of but four persons, is the best little troupe traveling. Those who attended were most agreeably surprised, and went away from the hall highly pleased with the entertainment.

—We are glad to report the strawberry festival given by the ladies of the M. E. church recently in Dr. Fords building, a success, yielding a net profit of $50.70, and the public have our thanks for their liberal patronage. A special vote of thanks to Drs. Ford & Spooner for special accommodations in rooms &c. By order of committee.

J. B. Caseboer.

—Me and my girl were to be seen on every corner, and in several other places, in the crowd of last Friday; and the capers of some of these rural youths and maidens would make a fence-post laugh till it lost its pedigree. Hand-squeezing and gum-sucking could be had at a discount anywhere, and the atmosphere was thick with love and 'lasses.

—We dropped into Mr. Berry's shop a few days ago and found him busily engaged on one of the finest specimens of work in wood that we have ever seen. It was a ballot box for Marks Lodge, 359 F. & A. M., of Ohio, and was ordered by Mr. Sherman Hollister, who intends to present it to the lodge, of which he is a member. As a specimen of in-laid work, it cannot be excelled. It is valued at $25.00.

—As a matter of economy we suggest that the commissioners purchase a team and carriage at the expense of the county, and then hire a man to take care of the team and drive them around in their tours of inspection.—Republican.

We suggest that they hire our friend Weamer "to take care of the team," and get the benefit of his experience in the "inspection" business free of charge.

Shatts, John Langly and Sarah Houser, Jeremiah Reed and Rosetta Stamets, Jacob Dick and Marcellea Baird, —— Moore and Joanna Elba McAnally.

—Last Monday evening, just before dusk, two of our well-known sports (whom for convenience we will call Tom Somers and Joe Beugnot) had a somewhat lively scrimmage down on Seventh street. Joe wanted to pulverize somebody and Tom wanted to be pulverized, so they dropped into each other; they wholly ignored the rules of the prize ring and banged away in a very promiscuous style for several minutes, rough and tumble, when Dr. Spooner "chipped in" and separated them. Both are still alive.

—Ensley's Avenue, between Auburn and Auburn junction, is being graded by the county board.—Waterloo Press.

Not exactly, Charley; the town of Auburn has made an appropriation for the same grade, though it is outside of the town, and should be paid for out of the county treasury, the same as similar grades on other public highways. Don't get jealous, for you say in the same issue of the Press, "We understand it is the intention of the county board to put in a new bridge at the Center street crossing of Cedar Creek." We can assure you that Auburn has no objection to Waterloo having a new bridge.

—Just received at the COURIER office, the finest line of calling cards ever brought to DeKalb County. We invite the ladies to call and see them.

Caught At Last.

It has been rumored for several months, by those who knew him best, that something "crooked" was going on in the affairs of our townsman, William H. Dills, though it could not be ascertained, by the most diligent and persistent inquiry, just exactly what the nature of his complaint was. On decoration day, however, last Friday, May 30, he committed himself, and by dint of untiring exertions we are enabled to place the facts in this singular case before our readers, and they are substantially as follows: Married, at the residence of his brother, J. W. Dills, at Spencerville, this county, by Rev. T. E. Lancaster, Wm. H. Dills and Julia May Brandon, both of Auburn. The COURIER wishes them all the bliss the matrimonial yoke can bestow, and trusts that Mrs. Dills may never find occasion to put her Brand-on her liege lord and master.

Why is it

That Auburn, a town of 2,600 inhabitants and the county seat of DeKalb county, cannot support a band? All the little county towns around us can boast of some kind of a band, one or two of which are competent to furnish music on any occasion, and when Auburn is celebrating some national holiday, or otherwise trying to get up a little stir, she is compelled to fall back on the surrounding villages in order to make a success of it! In many other details, of a more important character, our enterprising town takes the lead, it is true; but still, it is a reflection on the place to have it known that she is dependent on the adjoining smaller towns for the successful consummation of ANY project, however trivial. A good band exerts its own peculiar influence anywhere, for there are people in all places who are fond of good music, and it has a tendency to impress strangers more favorably. There is an abundance of material here, and there is no reason why it should not be used to advantage. Let us organize a good cornet band, by all means, and let the people and business men assist in sustaining it.

Those Walkists.

As we announced in last week's COURIER, the walking match took place at Ensley's hall, beginning Friday evening at seven o'clock and winding up Saturday night at about nine. There were but two contestants, Byron Rainier and Charlie Cook, Rob. McClellan having gracefully (and wisely) withdrawn. But little excitement was manifested before the contest began, but it got up to fever heat before the conclusion, and a great many people went up to see the boys get their work in. Both were in good trim, and they stuck to the track nobly, Rainier pulling off at 5 p. m., Saturday, having made 58 miles, and Cook taking his final lap at about 8:30, the score showing 71 miles credited to him, thus winning the race and the first prize.

Immediately after the first match Pete Eldridge and Toby Rush sailed into the arena and "bucked" against each other for three hours. Pete made 16 miles even, or an average of 5⅓ miles per hour, and Toby Rushed around to the tune of 16 miles and 20 laps. A purse was made up in the crowd, and the boys netted the magnificent sum of $2.20 each.

Another race was hatched up for Monday evening, and the racers were Elza Shaffer, "Shad" Rhodenbaugh and Clyde Moore. The latter got a stomach full when the contest was about half over, and went to his little bed, though he did some good work while he could stand the pressure; this left the fun between the first-named pair, and it was fun, too, the difference in their length being something less than three yards. The short boy was too much for the long one, and Elza lugged off first money, scoring 16 miles and 13 laps in three hours, against his competitor's 15 miles and 3 laps.

The two Charlies were then pitted against each other—Cook and Groscop—who walked (?) two miles, and it was in this race that the excitement ran high, as there was "lug money" up on the result. At one time a general rumpus was imminent, as the friends of one party claimed that t'other fellow was running; but it all terminated in gas, and the heat was given to Groscop, who, according to the score, had defeated his adversary by the sealy majority of 3 laps.

Thus ends the strife between the Auburnites, and now give us a rest;—take your little garlands of glory and go to—roost on the pinnacle of fame.

—Yesterday, at about one o'clock, a well-known farmer of this county named George Simons, living five miles west of here, while engaged in conversation in Upmeyer's store, was prostrated with an attack of heart disease, and we learn that he had but just recovered from a previous and similar attack an hour or so. In both cases he was attended by Dr. Ford, who administered the proper medicine at once. He has been afflicted thus for a number of years, and the doctor says his riding in on horseback yesterday was the immediate cause of the trouble and a very imprudent act. Mr. Simons was an exceptional man, physically, before the war, but is now in an exceedingly feeble condition, his disease having been superinduced by severe exposure in the army.

Why is it.

That cheap, adulterated baking powders are warranted equal to Dr. Price's when it is known that Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is the purest and healthiest made? It is because the adulterated kinds are bought for less and give a better profit.

At it Again.

GARRETT, June 2, 1879.

EDITORS COURIER:—Hoping we may not worry your patience with these continued articles, we herewith submit another, in reply to some additional remarks in last week's Herald; we feel justifiable in defending the reputation of our town, and the corporation which gave it birth and perpetuated its prosperity. The Herald has made false charges against the railroad company and town, with no other intention than to injure the reputation of each, which statements have been readily quoted by other papers in the county as facts, while by the better class of citizens in Garrett they have been branded as base, lying accusations, for which we hold the editor of the Herald responsible. In reply to my communication of last week the Herald says:

> "And behold Baalam's ass has again opened his mouth, in Garrett, and speaketh forth in the Auburn COURIER."
>
> "The wear and tear of the B. & O. employe's mind, in writing for the papers, is too great for $1.30 per day."

This editor is known as the "three-line editor," as three lines is about the limit of his abilities. In reply to the first, I will admit that this favored son of literature is too well versed in "assology" for us to attempt to enter into a controversy with him on the subject—but if he was as well posted upon topics pertaining to the condition and working of the railroad, and the general welfare of the town, as he is about the "ass," and dog fights, his paper would be of more benefit to the town and reflect a ray more brilliant to his credit. Now as to "three lines" No. 2. I would advise him to consult the time-clerk in regard to our wages, that he may get one correct idea which he has our permission to publish, as we do not feel ashamed of the amount of our earnings; and we will venture to say that the wear and tear of our mind, in defending our home, will stand it as long on the wages we receive from the B. & O. for our labor, as his mind will stand the wear and tear of defaming the same on the amount he receives for trying to "edit" a paper of about 60 copies circulation, at $1.50 per annum; total, $90 per year. Don't you think it will require a strong mind to stand it? Here is another clipping from the Herald of last week: "You are unable to distinguish a Sunday-school teacher from a prize-fighter, unless you have a superior knowledge of physiognomy." This is another gross insult thrown direct into the faces of our Sunday-school teachers by our Sunday-school superintendent. Our Sunday-school teachers are young ladies of refined culture who have volunteered their services to give moral instruction to the young minds of our town, and then for our Sunday-school superintendent to compare them to prize fighters is more than a civilized community ought to stand. This is the man who is trying to criticise the officials of the B. & O. railroad company and injure our town, while he is depending on each of them for a living. Last week there was half a column in the Herald devoted to a dog-fight which took place on our streets, and from the description given, we should judge the "editor" is well posted on the rules and science of the pugilistic arena, and either seconded one of the dogs or had charge of the "pool pot." This controversy waxeth hot, and is likely to continue for some time to come. Copies of the Herald for sale at the postoffice for five cents each, proceeds to be devoted to charitable purposes.

JOHN REED'S THOUGHTS.

There's a mist on the meadow below; the herring-frogs chirp and cry;
It's chill when the sun is down, and the sod is not yet dry:
The world is a lonely place, it seems, and I don't know why.

I see, as I lean on the fence, how wearily Dan
With the feel of the spring in his bones, like a weak and elderly man;
I've had it a many a time, but we must work when we can.

But day after day to toil, and ever from sun to sun,
Though up to the season's front and nothing be left undone,
Is ending at 12 like a clock, and beginning again at 1.

The frogs make a sorrowful noise, and yet it's the time they mate;
There's something comes with the spring, a lightness or else a weight;
There's something comes with the spring, and it seems to me it's fate:

It's the hankering after a life that you never have learned to know!
It's the discontent with a life that is always thus and so;
It's the wondering what we are and where we are going to go.

My life is lucky enough, I fancy, to most men's eyes,
For the more a family grows, the oftener some one dies,
And it's now run on so long, it couldn't be otherwise.

And sister Jane and myself, we have learned to claim and yield;
She rules in the house at will, and I in the barn and field;
So, nigh upon thirty years!—as if written and signed and sealed.

I couldn't change if I would; I've lost the how and the when;
One day my time will be up, and Jane be the mistress then,
For single women are tough and live down the single men.

She kept me so to herself, she was always the stronger hand,
And my lot showed well enough when I looked around in the land;
But I'm tired and sore at heart, and I don't quite understand.

I wonder how it had been if I'd taken what others need.
The plague, they say, of a wife, the care of a younger breed?
If Edith Pleasanton now were near me as Edith Reed?

Suppose that a son well grown were there in the place of Dan,
And I felt myself in him, as I was when my work began?
I should feel no older, sure, and certainly more a man!

A daughter, besides, in the house; nay, let there be two or three!
We never can overdo the luck that can never be,
And what has come to the most might also have come to me.

I've thought, when a neighbor's wife or his child was carried away,
That to have no loss was a gain; but now—I can hardly say;
He seems to possess them still under the ridges of clay.

And share and share in a life is, somehow, a different thing
From property held by deed, and the riches that oft take wing.
I feel so close in the breast!—I think it must be the spring.

I'm drying up like a brook when the woods have been cleared around;
You're sure it must always run, you are used to the sight and sound,
But it shrinks till there's only left a stony rut in the ground.

There's nothing to do but to take the days as they come and go,
And not to worry with thoughts that nobody likes to show,
For people so seldom talk of the things they want to know.

There's times when the way is plain, and everything nearly right,
And then of a sudden you stand like a man with a clouded sight:
A bush seems often a beast in the dusk of a falling night.

I must move: my joints are stiff, the weather is breeding rain.
And Dan is hurrying on with his plow-team up the lane.
I'll go to the village store; I'd rather not talk with Jane.

A WOLF ADVENTURE.

In European Russia, not far from the sixth parallel of latitude, and some twelve miles from Nikolsk, lived a young peasant girl by the name of Catharina Daroskoi. Catharina was a lovely girl—the fairest in all that section—and had many admirers among the rude Russian peasantry, and many had sought to win the affections of the bright-eyed Catharina; but to Ruric Petroski she had given her heart and hand, and they were to be married Christmas.

Our story opens in the month of October. Stern winter, in that high northern latitude, had already bound up nature in his icy fetters. A white mantle of snow covered the earth, and hither and thither the sleighs by day merrily traversed the thinly-settled region, while by night the wolves alone roamed over the wide wastes, ravenously seeking what they might devour, and woe betide the beast caught without the fold. Catharina's father had prepared for the winter. His stock was all housed, and fuel and provisions laid in. His family consisted of himself, wife and three children—Catharina, 18; Christine, 12; and Rudolph, 10.

Ruric Petroski, Catharina's betrothed, lived but a few miles distant, and was, as might be expected, a frequent visitor.

Catharina had an uncle, who, with his family, resided about eight miles from her father's house. It was an easy stretch in the smooth-running sleigh, with the powerful black horse, so gentle yet so strong and enduring, and Catharina often drove over to her Uncle Rudolph's in an hour's time.

On the morning of the 12th of October, Catharina concluded to pay her uncle a visit, and Christine and Rudolph were to accompany her. They wrapped themselves up warmly in furs and blankets, and the sleigh was brought out by their father, and, soon after sunrise, they started, Catharina's father telling her to be sure to come back that night, as he wished to go to Nikolsk upon business on the morrow.

Catharina told him that they would return without fail, and away they went, merrily singing a lively song as they rapidly glided along over the crisply-frozen snow.

In an hour's time they were all ensconced at Uncle Rudolph's, close to the blazing pine logs in the capacious chimney, and the black horse was snugly stabled.

The day passed away pleasantly. The sun was not much more than an hour high when the black horse and sleigh were brought out for the visitors' return. Uncle Rudolph urged them to stay all night, as a heavy cloud was rising in the east, and he was fearful that a storm of snow would catch them.

"That's a small matter," replied Catharina. "We can go home before sundown, even if it was to commence snowing now, and we must go, as father has business at Nikolsk to-morrow, and will want the horse and sleigh."

"I would have felt easier," said Uncle Rudolph, "as you must go, had you started earlier; for, if night catches you, the wolves, you know, are so ravenously hungry now that they would be sure to attack you."

"No danger of night or the wolves either catching us," replied Catharina, gayly, as she jumped into the sleigh.

Christine and Rudolph, Jr., got in after her, and Uncle Rudolph wrapped the blankets warmly about them. They gave him and the family, who had come to see them off, a cheerful good-by, and away they sped on their return.

Several miles were traversed, when Catharina became aware that the cloud which had threatened them when they started had now overspread the whole heavens. In a few minutes more the snow began coming down rapidly, and the fall kept increasing until it was almost blinding.

Another mile was traversed, when Catherina, with some alarm, noticed that the beaten track by which they had come was entirely obscured. Landmarks were so few and far between, that, with the blinding snow driving in her face, she was fearful that she might not be enabled to keep to the proper route; and, to add to her fears, the horse seemed disposed (so she thought) to oblique to the right, as if to avoid the snow that came whirling and beating in his face. Catharina drew the left rein tightly, and forced him to face the driving storm. Now, unfortunately, the wind had changed, and Catherina knew it not. The instinct of the horse was correct, and she was wrong, as she soon discovered to her dismay. The sleigh run into a deep gully and capsized, casting its occupants into a huge snow-drift. The gentle horse stopped, obedient to the reins, and Catharina and her youthful companions gathered themselves up, worse scared than hurt, Rudolph and Christine both crying in much alarm. Catharina comforted them as much as she was able, and they set to work to right the sleigh.

This was a task of some difficulty, and occupied time—precious time. When at last they succeeded in getting the sleigh upon its runners, it was about half full of snow, and this they had to cast out as best they could. Finally, they all got into the sleigh once more, and Catharina looked around her. She recognized the locality, but was startled to discover that that they had come at least two miles out of their way, so that they were now fully six miles from home. She headed the horse in the right direction, and, giving him the reins, they started forward once more.

Their progress was slow, as the way they were now traversing was uneven, and the snow was drifted up in many places, so that it was difficult to get through; and Catharina, in much alarm, began to see that night was approaching, and unless they soon struck the regular track, and hurried forward very rapidly indeed, it would overtake them before they reached home. She now wished that she had taken her uncle's advice, and remained until the morrow. She lashed the horse, and he exerted himself to the utmost; yet so deep was the snow in many places that several times Catharina thought that they would be compelled to get out before the sleigh could pass through the drift.

At last they reached the regular route, as Catharina knew by the actions of the horse. He bounded forward with more freedom, and gave a joyful whinny, expressive of relief. But, alas! Catharina saw that night was closing around them; and she knew, by the clump of fir trees in the distance, that her home was yet full four miles away.

The snow was not falling so rapidly, and Catharina hoped that she would be able to gain home ere daylight entirely departed and she did not apprehend much danger from the wolves until then.

On they sped, and another mile was traversed when suddenly Catharina's heart sank within her in dread, for she heard the distant howl of a wolf; and knew that not many minutes would elapse before it would be on her track, with many more at its heels. The horse heard the howl of its enemy as well as she, and increased his speed to the utmost.

Again the howl broke on the terrified Catharina's ear, and this time it was answered by others. Soon it grew nearer, and Catharina wildly urged the horse forward, while Christine and Rudolph clung to her with cries of terror. Nearer and nearer approached the howling pack. Catharina looked behind, and saw a horse running for life, closely followed by a long string of wolves, their dark bodies plainly to be seen outlined on the white bosom of the snow. Some horse had escaped from his owner's care, and was now about to pay his life as a penalty for the act.

Oh, how ardently Catharina hoped that the horse might take some other course, and lead the yelling pack away from them! But no; on he came directly toward them, making better speed in his terror than it was possible for their freighted animal to make. The fierce wolves were just behind him. At last they spring upon him. Some fasten on his side, some on his neck, and he is pulled to the earth within 200 yards of the terrified occupants of the sleigh.

They have reached and passed the clump of fir trees, and Catharina knows that it is only a mile and a half to her father's house. Hope springs up once more, as she sees the horse pulled down behind them, for she trusts that the ravenous beasus will be satisfied for a time with their prey. But, to her consternation, she sees that the body of the horse is soon covered with the snarling and fighting brutes, and that numbers more, without ever halting, rush on after them.

A few seconds more and they are frightfully near. Catharina breathes a prayer to God for mercy, and hugs her brother and sister closer in her arms. To complete the terror of the situation, one shaft breaks, and the sleigh is jerked from side to side by the furious bounds of the terrified horse, desperately striving to escape its insatiate pursuers. But, alas! by this accident his speed is materially checked, and in a moment more the savage and bloodthirsty wolves are at the side of the sleigh.

Catharina gives herself up for lost. She sees the gleaming of the fierce brutes' wild, yellowish eyes, and hears their long white tusks grinding and snapping, one against another, as they thirst for her blood. A fearful resolve comes over her. She will arise and spring from the sleigh, and, perhaps, by giving herself as a sacrifice, Christine and Rudolph may be saved. Some of the wolves are already nearly in front, and will soon spring in. She grasps the back posts of the sleigh, and tries to raise herself up to carry out her fearful resolution, but Christine clasps her so tight, in her wild terror, that she cannot arise. One of the wolves springs at her, and she strikes wildly at it. Its tusks are fastened in her sleeve, and part of it is torn away.

Just at this critical moment she hears a wild shout in front of her, and at a glance discovers some one in a sleigh close upon them. She beholds a flash, and hears the roar of a gun, and sees the wolves drop back in alarm. In another instant she recognizes her lover, Ruric Petroski, as they dash by each other, and with a glad cry of relief she feels that they are saved from the most horrible of deaths.

Ruric, who thus so opportunely appeared on the scene, had come late in the evening to see his betrothed Catharina, and, of course, had not found her at home. As the sun declined, and the shades of night began to gather, Ruric and Catharina's parents became alarmed for the safety of the absent ones, fearing just what had really happened.

Ruric determined to go in quest of them. Knowing the dangerous nature of the wolves, pressed as they were now with hunger, he felt satisfied that his trusty double-barreled gun would not be sufficient to keep them at bay; so he placed in the bottom of the sleigh a tin vessel, and in it a bunch of tow, well sprinkled with powder. He also hurriedly prepared some pine torches, the ends finely split, and dipped in a resinous compound, so that they might be easily ignited. Being provided with a flint and steel, he knew that he could have a blaze in an instant, and he knew that the wolves would keep at a respectful distance from it.

Thus prepared, he started out, and met Catharina and her companions in the very nick of time, as we have recorded. As soon as he fired at the wolves, he wheeled his sleigh and followed closely after the others. The wolves, that had only been startled for an instant, quickly recovered, and bounded forward again. Ruric immediately struck a shower of sparks from his flint into the powder and tow, which instantly ignited with a flash. He quickly lighted from the blaze a couple of pine torches, and, driving up by the side of Catharina's sleigh, he gave her one of them; and, thus defended from their fierce pursuers, they soon arrived safely at home, to the great joy and relief of all parties.

Civil Rights for the Indians.

Probably no judicial decision affecting the rights of Indians has been made in this country of so much importance to that race as that rendered a few days ago by the United States District Court at Omaha. If undisturbed by the courts above, as probably will be the case, the effect of this decision must be to give a new status to the rights of the Indian, and to point to a new method of adjusting some of the difficulties which have existed between the white and native races ever since their joint occupancy of this country.

The case of the Ponca Indians in the Federal Court at Omaha was one brought upon a writ of habeas corpus to determine by what authority the United States military commanders held these Indians in custody, or intended to convey them forcibly to certain reservations in the Indian Territory. The gist of the decision of the court, which was very broad and explicit in construction, was that an Indian is a person within the meaning of the law in this country, and entitled to relief in the civil courts when unlawfully deprived of liberty; that no rightful authority exists for sending law-abiding Indians to new reservations without their consent, and the prisoners in question must, therefore, be released from custody by the military authorities; and that Indians have the inalienable right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness so long as they obey the laws and do not trespass on forbidden ground. Immediately following this decision of the Federal Court comes one of the Supreme Court of Dakota Territory, regarding the title to certain mining property in the Black Hills region, which declares that no title to land can be acquired until the country is ceded to the Government by its Indian owners. From these two decisions, which supplement and reinforce each other, the logical and legal corollary is inevitable that those who venture upon the Indian reservations are trespassers and may be repelled by force; and that the military, who are relied upon to quell any outbreak of the Indians, may take means to prevent such outbreaks by forcibly preventing unlawful invasions of the Indians' country by white adventurers.—Chicago Journal.

A Stage Robbery.

A well-known actor of San Francisco was recently traveling in Nevada, when the coach was halted by "road agents," and the passengers were all plundered. While our hero was standing with his hands in the air, and a masked highwayman was benevolently relieving his almost-destitute pockets, he was recognized by another of the gang, who had probably witnessed his artistic performance of the heavy villain in Virginia City. "Hello, old Let-us-dissemble," said the jolly knight of the double-barreled shot-gun, "don't be alarmed; this is only a stage robbery."

SOME TYPICAL OCCURRENCES.

Two PUPILS in a Sunday-school at Nodaway, Mo., quarreled in church, and went out together to a field near by, where one killed the other.

FORTY years ago the tomato was known as the "Jerusalem apple," etc., and was cultivated as an ornamental plant and the fruit regarded as poisonous. Now the fruit is as generally used, and regarded as healthful as any that grows. Its size and appearance has changed almost as much as the opinion of its merits.

ELIAS HEMPTON was so particular in buying a revolver in a Buffalo store that the clerk inquired for what purpose he wanted it. "I am going to shoot my father-in-law and brother-in-law," he replied. The clerk thought he was joking, but he wasn't, for before night he had lodged a bullet in each of those relatives.

A FISHERMAN fell into the water at Little Falls, Minn., and, on getting out, hung all his clothes over a fire to dry. They were ignited and entirely consumed, leaving their owner naked and three miles from home. Seeing a woman approaching, he submerged himself to the neck in the stream, and bargained with her to lend him some of her skirts.

A BEAR carried off a sheep from the yard of James N. Hall, at Rumford, Me., and dragged it into a swamp near by. Miss Lizzie Hall, a daughter of Mr. H., and Miss Hattie Lovejoy took their male relatives' guns and started into the swamp on a little hunt. They were rewarded with a sight of and a shot at bruin, but the beast fled to the neighboring mountain. The young ladies could not pursue him, but several men followed his trail—the bear leaving blood on the snow—and caught him after a three hours' run. He weighed 310 pounds.

A GLITTERING ball-room dress made of strands of spun glass has been offered to any San Francisco belle who will buy and wear it. Prof. Theodore Greiner has done the spinning by blowing glass into long strands, and washing them in a solution of water and beet-root sugar, which has a toughening effect. The weaving was done on an old-fashioned hand-loom, the warp being nineteen feet long and the woof four feet, a number of colors being worked in, so as to produce a bright glass cloth. The dress is en panier, with loop sleeves and square neck, ornamented with box-pleating, and bound in blue. With the new dress there is a set of beautiful blonde glass curls of a natural hue upon the head of the model, reaching to the waist.

YOUNG ladies who correspond with rejected lovers would do well to take a hint from the following curious case: Mlle. Felicie Maxy, who lives on the farm of Pentecote, on the Belgian frontier, was on the point of being married, when she received a letter from an old suitor asking her to reconsider the matter, and send him an immediate reply. A postage stamp was gallantly inclosed to defray the cost of transmission. The answer duly written, Mlle. Maxy applied the stamp to her fair lips; but hardly had she done so when she felt a sharp pain in her tongue, and in less than no time that interesting member became horribly elongated and inflamed and covered with noisome sores. The disconsolate one, Alfred Camin by name, a farmer at Pichon, in the Nord, has been arrested; but he declares that he used no noxious drug, but simply moistened a corner of the stamp with his own lips. Such is the state of the case as it stands; but the tale carries its own moral.

THE recent matrimonial adventure of a young New York miss who went to Georgia in answer to the advertisement of "a well-to-do planter," but found a broken-down, lazy-bones bachelor in waiting, leads the Dallas Herald to speak of a more successful affair of the kind which culminated in that Texas city the other day. A lady of Dallas advertised in a literary paper that "a Southern widow, not over 32 years of age, of good family and well off in property, desires to correspond with a middle-aged gentleman with a view to matrimony." A contractor of Watertown, N. Y., answered the advertisement, and several letters passed. On his arrival at Dallas the New Yorker found the lady what she had represented herself to be. She was not only the owner of a rich farm, but what pleased him most was that "she was the possessor of a fine physique and of a more handsome face than the photograph had indicated." The New Yorker, as an evidence of good faith, deposited $2,000 in a Dallas bank to her credit, and they were married.

AN ugly sea-monster was lately killed on the North Carolina coast by Capt. Chadwick, of Wilmington, and considerable doubt hangs about the question as to what it really is. Some say it is a turtle, some call it a devil-fish, while the Captain himself is of the belief that it is "Old Nick" himself, and that hereafter sinners need have no fear of punishment in the infernal regions. The Wilmington (N. C.) Sun tells us that Capt. Chadwick sighted the "thing" about eight miles off Western bar, and immediately steered toward it. When within a short distance of it he fired at it with his rifle, the ball passing through the neck and killing it. It required six men, with their utmost strength, to pull it over the rail, and it is estimated that it weighed 600 or 700 pounds. The animal was seven feet long by three and a half feet wide. On the back was a hard black shell, like a turtle's, with three ridges running lengthwise. The head was as large as a water-bucket, and in the mouth, extending down into the throat, were rows of soft teeth. The tail was not more than eighteen inches long, and projected in three prongs. The fins and feet were like a turtle, with the exception that there were no claws. The monster has been seen off the coast for the last twenty years, but he has never met anyone who was bold enough to attack him until the gallant Capt. Chadwick hove down on him and put an end to his career.

THIS touching story of "babes in the woods" comes to us from Oroville, Butte county, Cal.: At Berry creek, in that county, the mountains still hold their primeval forest trees and the valleys their wide stretches of woodland. In the early part of April William McCallan missed his two sons, one aged 6 years and the other 8. The boys had been sent toward evening to take home the cows. Much alarmed, the parents next morning at day-break informed the neighbors and started with organized parties to scour the mountain sides, drag the bed of the creek and sweep through the timber in the lowland. A day passed and no boys. Their shoes had been found near the cow pasture, but no other traces were met with. All through the second night and the following day the hunt was continued. At the end of fifty-one hours from the time they had been missed, Joseph Lynch and William Moore found the elder one, Johnnie, sleeping on a sand bed on Middle fork, some ten miles from home. Johnnie said that Willie was dead. "How do you know?" asked Mr. Lynch. "Because his arms are stiff and so are his legs, and the flies are in his eyes, and he won't brush them off like I do." Willie's body was found under an oak tree near at hand. Johnnie had covered his face with leaves, and put a nosegay of wild flowers in his hand. Johnnie said that they had just walked and walked all day and slept at night. Once he told Willie he would certainly get something for him to eat, but, when he returned to Willie, his arms were stiff and he wouldn't cry any more, though he pinched him hard.

The New Northern Pacific Railroad Bill.

The following are the leading provisions of the bill which has been introduced at the present session of Congress for ten years' extension of time to the Northern Pacific. It is claimed by its friends that there is a good prospect of its becoming a law:

1. That the company shall, within one year of the enactment of this bill, commence work on the main line, at or near Umatilla, Ore., complete not less than 200 miles of its road eastwardly every year thereafter, and shall construct a total of at least 100 miles of the main line within two years from same date, and not less than 100 miles of the main line each year thereafter, including the 25 miles per annum expressly designated.

2. The main line between Portland and Umatilla shall be constructed on the south side of the Columbia.

3. That, with the exception of the land heretofore earned by the company, all agricultural lands within its grant shall be open to purchase from the company, by actual settlers, in tracts of 160 acres each, at the price of $2.50 per acre.

The extension of time and continuance of all former rights and franchises are also made conditional upon the requirements that said company shall complete its road around the cascade of Columbia river within two years, and around the Dalles of Columbia within three years, from the enactment of this bill, and that in the use of these portage railroads the company shall make no discrimination or excessive charges against any person or corporation. All lands heretofore withdrawn from the branch line are to be restored to the public domain, except for a distance of twenty miles north of the portion now completed, from Tacoma to Wilkeson, Washington Territory.

The bill embodies the provisions of the House bill last year, protecting the rights of homestead and pre-emption settlements made prior to the receipt of orders of withdrawal at local land offices, and, in conclusion, authority is reserved for Congress to amend or repeal this act at any time (having due regard for the rights of the company), and to provide by law against discrimination and excessive charges.

London Statistics.

The annual summary of births, deaths, and causes of death in the large cities of England for 1878 furnishes some interesting statistics with reference to London. Its population exceeds 3,500,000, and, if the suburbs are included, 4,500,000. It almost equals that of Paris, Berlin, and Vienna, and with its suburbs it equals the population of the capitals of France, Prussia, Austria, and Russia. The area of the city is 122 square miles, and the density of population 29,392 people to the square mile; the proximity of the population 11.04 yar's from each other. With the above density, the mortality should be 35.2 per 1,000, but from 1874 to 1878 it has been reduced as low as 22.8. The registered deaths are 83,895, and, the births being 129,184, they exceed the former by 45,489. As to the causes of death, the report says:

The causes of death in inner London include 18,220 by zymotic diseases, 15,500 by constitutional diseases, 37,825 by local diseases, 8,695 by developmental diseases, 3,310 by violent deaths. Small-pox was fatal to 1,416 persons, who at various ages died of that disease in London, whereas only 17 died in 19 country towns. Measles was less fatal than usual, and scarlet fever was much less fatal than usual. Whooping-cough was more than usually fatal; the excess of deaths was 1,665. Scurvy and purpura were more than usually prevalent. Of alcoholism 202 persons died, which number is above the average. There was an excessive number of deaths from bronchitis. The deaths from ovarian dropsy were 60, whereas the annual number of deaths in the previous ten years was 33. The deaths from childbirth were 255; 2,916 persons died from accident or negligence, 78 by homicide, 315 by suicide, and 1 was executed. The number of persons killed in the streets of London was 237—how is not stated in three cases; 17 were killed by horses, 12 by carriages, 14 by omnibuses, 10 by tram-cars, 34 by cabs, 73 by vans and wagons, 11 by drays, 63 by carts.

THE writer of a letter in the London Times points out that an ounce of bread wasted daily in each household in England and Wales means about 25,000,000 quarter loaves, the product of 30,000 acres of wheat in a year; while an ounce a week of meat wasted amounts to some 300,000 sheep.

OUR CHOIR.

There's Jane Sophia
And Ann Maria,
With Obadiah
And Jedekiah,
In our choir.

And Jane Sophia soprano sings,
So high you'd think her voice had wings
To soar above all earthly things,
When she leads off on Sunday;
While Ann Maria's alto choice
Rings out in such harmonious voice
That sinners in the church rejoice
And wish she'd sing till Monday.

Then Obadiah's tenor high
Is unsurpassed beneath the sky—
Just hear him sing "Sweet By-and-By,"
And you will sit in wonder;
While Jedekiah's bass profound
Goes down so low it jars the ground
And wakes the echoes miles around
Like distant rolling thunder.

Talk not to me of Patti's fame,
Or Nicolini's tenor taste,
Or Cary's alto—but a name—
Or Whitney's pond'rous basso!
They sing no more like Jane Sophia
And Ann Maria, Obadiah
And Jedekiah, in our choir,
Than cats sing like Tomasso!

'TIS EVER THUS.

We stood beside the garden gate:
Her hand I gently pressed,
And, blushing sweet, she laid her head
Upon my Marseilles vest.
"Wilt thou be mine?" I whispered soft,
"O, darling, answer yes,
Give sweet consent, and we will seal
The compact with a kiss.
O, let me have your answer, love,
In tones soft as a lute."
She raised her head and answered thus:
"The old man's coming, scoot!"
The love I felt was far outweighed
By fear of being booted:
No single moment I delayed,
But dropped her hand and scooted.

A BRACE of young swells jumped on board an open car on Indiana avenue, the other evening, one of them seating himself beside a rustic-looking old gentleman, the other taking the seat opposite. Number one winked at his companion, and, adjusting his quizzing glass, turned to the old gentleman and said, "Aw! you aw fwom the countwa, I peweeive." "Yes, sir; but, although your eyes look weak and my sight is very good, I must say you can see more at the first glance than I can." "You don't say so! Pway how is that?" "Why, at the first glance I took you for a gentleman." Swell rode half a block further.—Chicago Journal.

Amusements for Children.

On rainy days the active child resents his confinement within doors, and is more than usually troublesome. I know of nothing which will afford him surer amusement than the making of scrap-books. Provide the little ones with a pair of blunt-pointed scissors, and let them cut out and trim neatly the pictures from papers you do not care to preserve, circulars of farm machinery or anything they fancy, and then, armed with a cup of boiled starch and an old tooth brush (if you have one), let them exercise their ingenuity in filling the book with their collections. Quite small children find enchantment in this kind of work. A large picture may be put in the center of the page, and the space around it filled with small ones or short pieces of prose or poetry. I have seen very pretty ornaments for these juvenile scrap-books cut out of the illustrated books for children, which had become badly tattered with use so that the pictures were all that were worth preserving. When two pages are full the book should be left open until dry before going on. This amusement need not make much litter about a house, and the little workers can easily learn to pick up their scattering scraps after themselves, and wash their starch-cup and brush after using them, so that they will be ready for the next rainy day.

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

The Lady's Yes.

BY ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

"Yes," I answered you last night;
"No," this morning, sir, I say;
Colors seen by candle-light
Will not look the same by day.

When the viols played their best,
Lamps above and laughs below,
Love me sounded like a jest,
Fit for yes or fit for no.

Yet the sin is on us both;
Time to dance is not to woo;
Wooing light makes fickle troth,
Scorn of me recoils on you.

Learn to win a lady's faith
Nobly, as the thing is high,
Bravely, as for life and death,
With a loyal gravity.

Lead her from the festive boards,
Point her to the starry skies;
Guard her by your truthful words
Pure from courtship's flatteries.

By your truth she shall be true,
Ever true, as wives of yore;
And her yes, once said to you,
Shall be Yes for evermore.

The Christian Girls of Damascus.

To a Christian and thoroughbred Englishman not even the licentiousness which generally accompanies it can compensate for the oppressiveness of that horrible outward decorum which turns the cities and the palaces of Asia into deserts and jails. So, I say, when you see and hear them, those romping girls of Bethlehem will gladden your very soul. Distant at first, and then nearer and nearer, the timid flock will gather around you, with their large burning eyes gravely fixed against yours, so that they can see into your brain; and if you imagine evil against them, they will know of your ill-thought before it is yet well born, and will fly and be gone in a moment. But presently, if you will only look virtuous enough to prevent alarm, and vicious enough to avoid looking silly, the blithe maidens will draw nearer and nearer to you; and soon there will be one—the bravest of the sisters—who will venture right up to your side and touch the hem of your coat in playful defiance of the danger; and then the rest will follow the daring of their youthful leader and gather close round you, and hold a shrill controversy on the wondrous formation you call a hat, and the cunning of the hands that clothed you with cloth so fine; and then, growing more profound in their researches, they will pass from the study of your mere dress to a serious contemplation of your stately height, and your nut-brown hair, and the ruddy glow of your English cheeks.—Kinglake's "Eothen."

Mill Girls.

I was greatly interested in learning about the amusements or diversions of the mill people. My first step was to ask a great many of the young women what they did in the evening, after working hours were over. The French Canadian girls, who are Catholics, nearly all replied, "We stay at home. We have to sew, and mend our clothes, and wash them. We do not know anybody, and so we have no place to go in the evening." At times the answer was, "My mother" or "my sister will not let me go out." Most of the other young women said, "Oh, we go out with our fellers, and with some of the other girls." "And where do you go?" "Oh, along the streets, down town; to the postoffice or the candy store, if the boys will shout." "If they will shout—what is that?" "Oh, don't you know? Why, that means if they will treat—if they will buy some candy for us." And do you drink something, too?" To this the younger women always answered, "No, we don't drink anything unless it's soda water, sometimes, in warm weather." But they usually pointed to some older companion, and said, "She drinks—she drinks beer." Then the woman thus spoken of would laugh, and toss her head, and say, "Ain't you goin' to shout?" And when I met the same group in the street in the evening, the question would be repeated, with a smile of recognition.

I do not think these girls and younger women have usually any habitual amusement, except this walking out with their friends which I have just mentioned. Once or twice during the winter many of them go to a ball. To go more frequently would be regarded by their own class as an extravagance, as an indication of unsteadiness and a tendency to dissipation. I found many young people in the mills who "belonged," as they said, to the Methodist church, and some who were Baptists. Probably there were, among the operatives, members of other religious societies, but I did not happen to meet them.—June Atlantic.

Courtesy Exemplified.

"While at Providence, R. I.," says a writer in the Springfield Republican, "I met Mrs. Mary A. Livermore at the house of a friend. At table the conversation fell upon the subject of politeness. The hostess told of a friend of hers, a little antique in her manners, for whom a reception was given by one of the Beacon-street aristocracy of Boston. At dinner the guest poured out her tea in her saucer to cool it—a method of refrigeration which was quite au fait thirty years ago. The guests looked surprised, and some were inclined to smile at her simplicity and ignorance of high-toned propriety, but the lady of the house poured some tea into her saucer and drank it therefrom. This was considered a hint to all, and the guest was immediately placed at her ease.

Mrs. Livermore said: "I was once the recipient of a very marked politeness of a similar sort. When I was in London my husband and I received a verbal invitation from Lady Vilas, whom I had met once or twice pleasantly, to come to her house next evening and meet a few frinds of hers. We accepted and went. But I was deceived by the informality of the invitation and supposed it was merely to meet half a dozen neighbors or friends. So we went out riding in the afternoon, stopping there on the way back to the hotel. Judge of my amazement to find the house illuminated and a very large and brilliant party assembled in full dress in my honor. There I was in a plain carriage dress, bonnet, and black gloves!"

"What in the world did you do?" inquired a young girl.

"Why, I went right into the house and to the ladies' dressing-room, whence I sent a note to the hostess saying that I had misapprehended her invitation and was not in appropriate costume. She ran up and reassured me by telling me they had come to see me, and didn't care for the dress, and carried me right down with her. All in full dress and the ladies without hats, and hair elaborately dressed; I with brown dress, bare hands, bonnet on. I soon recovered the self-possession which the faux pas somewhat disturbed, and was greeted with splendid cordiality. In a few minutes Mr. Livermore edged around behind me and whispered, 'Didn't you think, Mary, that all these ladies had on white kids when you came in?' I looked around and they were all barehanded! Moreover, I observed that a half-dozen had bonnets on. The half-dozen rapidly increased, till we were in a majority; and I soon discovered that no lady who arrived after I did had removed her hat. Now, that is what I call politeness!"

Flirtation in Italy.

Long before we reached the top of the hill we were obliged to help pony, who was literally fagged; and we cut anything but a dashing figure as we approached the Roman gate, outside of which some charming young ladies of Tivoli's elite were promenading. To see two strangers literally propelling a horse and gig into a city—the one pulling the beast by the bridle, the other pushing the trap—would excite the laughter of staider souls than those lively girls. They laughed heartily at us, and one of them suggested that the tall signore ought to carry the whole turnout on his shoulders to the nearest hostelry. Then there was more laughter, whereat we both stopped deliberately and surveyed our tormentors, who scampered immediately. * * * At a table near us sat a portly individual of the better class. He had a pleasant face, full of good humor and rosy with good living. He readily accepted our invitation to join us in a bottle. While discussing this he proposed in a deprecatory manner, as if he were taking a great liberty, to introduce us to a select circle of his friends who gave a modest entertainment that evening. The idea was delightful, and we went through the mediæval streets lighted by quaint oil lamps into a moldy court and up some murderous stairs. Then we stood in a well-lighted room. The quiet elegance of the place and the people there confounded me. But it was too late to retreat. I was already bowing to a young lady to whom our new acquaintance had introduced me—none other than she who had joked at our expense in the morning when we helped pony up the hill—daughter of the Prefect of Tivoli, ætas seventeen, member of the Philodramatic Circle of Tiber, who have a quiet dance every Sunday evening and give a dramatic performance once a month, of which Liszt was an honorary member and who played on the piano there, over which his picture hangs. All this I learned while waiting for the music to begin, and then we both sailed around the room in the ecstacy of the waltz as if we had been old friends. Shade of Cupid! But we flirted and remained tributary to terpsichore until the cathedral clock struck one of Monday morning. While sipping a glass of punch, which was served out to each, I had leisure to take a few notes. A dozen or more as handsome young fellows as you'd wish to see, affable, elegant in manner and garb; say twenty ladies ranging from forty down to seventeen, lithe, graceful, lovely creatures, every mother's daughter of them, refined in speech, yet unsophisticated. And these people took into their own select circle two dusty strangers from remote America! I could not help expressing my surprise to my first partner, who danced so well and had such eyes that it was impossible to leave her. Said she: "Those girls you saw outside the gate this morning arranged it all, and I was one of them." I had been noticing a lady in particular who sat in a corner watching the dancers wistfully as if she wished very much to join in the fun. I asked her if she danced and if I might have the pleasure, etc. Certainly. We had made the round of the room but once, when somebody clapped hands and the music ceased, whereat my partner turned around and said testily to some one: "Thou ugly assassin! Because thou canst not dance thou canst not see me dance." Then she said to me: "I speak not to you, but to that lout, my husband." Hum! I sought the prefect's offspring. Just as I had gotten on my overcoat in the ante-room, and was about to move away, a voice whispered in my ear: "Never mind, we will be revenged another time." I turned quickly and saw the departing figure of the "ugly assassin's" wife.—Corres. San Francisco Chronicle.

Fashion Notes.

NEWEST white silk stockings are wrought like lace on the instep instead of having lace inserted.

NEW silk bows for the throat are without lace, but are made up of materials of the dress and its trimmings.

FOR light mourning are very dressy bonnets of black chip, trimmed with black China crape edged with black Breton lace. The crape is twined around the crown, and held by jet stars. A wing is stuck in the back quite low down.

THE large Marie Antoinette bonnets are pointed in the middle of the front, and one of the flaring sides is filled in quite low down with flowers. This is a fanciful shape that should be worn only by very young, fresh faces.

SOME of the dressiest bonnets to be worn with various costumes, are small close shapes of Tuscan straw, or else ecru chip, trimmed with loops of cream-colored satin ribon and a wide Breton lace barbe that forms a bow on the crown, and also strings; inside the brim is shirred satin, and the flowers on top are either chrysanthemums or roses.

NEW bouquet holders are rings and brooches that support a fan-shaped ornament made up entirely of Rhine crystals; some of these have a serpent of the stones twined around them. The ring holds the corsage bouquet, and the pin fastens it to the dress. It is worn near the waist line on the left side. Large bunches of natural flowers form such bouquets, and it is the caprice of the moment to show the bunch of long stems at the end.

SIMPLE fabrics are chosen for bridesmaids' dresses to be worn at June weddings. The fancy is to make these of soft India muslin, or else the soft twilled foulard silk known as Surrah silk, and the lace garniture is either Breton or Valenciennes. These dresses are made up more youthfully than the wedding dress, and carry out the prevailing style, with its bouffant paniers and shirred basques and aprons. Imported Surrah dresses for bridesmaids at a recent wedding had the short turned-back fronts of the over dress formed of diagonal rows of Breton insertion and Surah silk, while the back was bunched up voluminously, and held by large clusters of loops of satin ribbon. In this instance the wedding was conducted in English fashion, and the bridesmaids wore Gainsborough hats of white silk, with Prince of Wales red satin shirring and piping. Instead of bonnets, however, short veils of tulle arranged on the back of the head in Spanish style are now generally worn by bridemaids. To use some deep color for garniture is a fancy for bridesmaids; thus at a Grace church wedding lately the four bridesmaids wore clusters of deep-red currents and green leaves for garniture. When there are six or eight bridesmaids it is customary to have two with pale blue, two with green, and the others may have dark red or else Marshal Neil yellow. Worth uses what he calls opal tints in sashes and trimmings on bridesmaids' dresses. For instance, he uses white grenadine with brocaded satin stripes in for the basque and train, while the front and sides of plain square-meshed grenadine have a panier scarf or sash of green brocaded ribbon shot with pink and white, like an opal, draped across the front and about the hips. To continue the opal effect, pale-green silk knife pleatings are placed under white grenadine pleatings to trim the sides and end of the train.—Harper's Bazar.

He Heard too Much.

Lewis Gaylord Clark, the editor of the Knickerbocker Magazine, used to tell the following story with great delight:

Some two miles up the river from St. Johnsbury, Vt., is a primitive sort of a little village called "The Centre." Here, not long since, the rustic youth of the vicinity congregated for a dance, "and dance they did," said our informant, "with an unction unknown to our city belles and beaux." One interesting man, having imbibed too freely, became "fatigued" in the course of the evening, and wisely concluded to retire for a short rest.

A door ajar near the dancing-hall revealed invitingly a glimpse of a comfortable bed, of which he took possession with the prospect of an undisturbed "snooze."

It happened, howbeit, that this was the "ladies withdrawing room," and no sooner had he closed his eyes than a pair of blooming damsels came in and began adjusting their disordered ringlets, the dim light of the tallow candle not disclosing the tenant of the bed. The girls had tongues (like the rest of their "seck,") which ran in this wise:

"What a nice dance we're having! Have you heard anybody saw anything about me, Jane?"

"Law, yes, Sally. Jim Brown says he never say you look so handsome as you do to night. Have you heard anybody saying anything about me?"

"About you! Why, sartin. I heard Joe Flint tell Sam Jones that you were the prettiest dressed girl in the room."

Whereupon the dear things chuckled, and "fixed up" a little more, and made off toward the ball-room. They had hardly reached the door when our half-conscious friend raised himself on his elbow, and quite intelligibly, though slowly inquired:

"Have you heard aryborry say anythin' 'bout me, gals?"

"Phancy their pheelinks" at this juncture.

Varnishing Chicken-Legs.

Being constantly brought in contact, not only with the poultry but also with the poultry-buyers, Chapellier, the ragman, noticed a singular feature in the trade—that in cases where the latter did not sell the birds straight off, they were always obliged to reduce their price a quarter, or perhaps a third, for every day that they were unsold, though they might appear perfectly fresh to the uninitiated. But the cooks and the restaurant-keepers were not to be taken in by the appearances, and Chapellier found that an unfailing symptom of freshness, or rather want of it, lay in the appearance of the feet, which were black and brilliant at the time of killing, but acquired a gray tinge, more and more pronounced, as time went on. Turkeys feet showed this peculiarity the most, and it set Chapellier thinking, the result of his cogitation being that he invented a paste which, when rubbed on the legs, brought back the original black gloss, and completely erased the tell-tale date of death. Having tried it with success, he went round to the poulterers, who willing promised them a small royalty for initiating him also, and as he was shrewd enough to keep his own secret, he soon found that the profession of "painter of poultry-legs," apart from its questionable morals, was exceedingly lucrative. But Chapellier was ambitious, and finding the work increase beyond his power of personally supervising it, he sold his secret to a friend for 1,000 francs, and with this little capital he set off to find pastures new. (It may be mentioned that his successor retired, after many years practice, with a good fortune, which does not say very much for the freshness of defunct Paris poultry, or the conscience of the purveyors.)

Texas Night-Dew.

A peculiarity of the climate of Galveston in winter, and until late in the spring, is the dropping of what is called the "night dew." During the whole night, commencing at 11 o'clock and lasting until near sunrise, a sound as of gentle rainfall is heard. Though the moon and stars may be shining clearly, and not a cloud to be seen, it is the same—the eaves of the houses are dropping water; you hear the constant fall upon the tin roof overhead—on the porch beyond your windows. In the morning you are surprised to see the evidence, seemingly, of a heavy shower just before day. The streets look as though they had been heavily sprinkled to lay the dust. This phenomenon does not occur in hot weather, unless a cold norther sweeps down from Denver and the Rockys.

Insect Powder.

The insect powders of commerce are the powdered flowers of different species of Pyrethrum. Those of Pyrethrum carneum and roseum were introduced some thirty years ago under the name of Persian insect powder, and subsequently those of Pyrethrum cinerariæ folium, a native of Dalmatia, Austria, as Dalmatian insect powder. Both the Persian and Dalmatian powders are good insecticides, but the latter is much the more energetic in its action, and hence commands a higher price; indeed, it is so much preferred that it is gradually driving the so-called Persian powder out of the market. The fact of the flowers of P. roseum being less active than those of P. cinerariæ folium, has been accounted for on the ground that the single flowers are much more powerful than the double ones, and that the double flowers occur in P. roseum in much larger proportion than in the other species. The flowers, either whole or powdered, preserve their activity for a long period.

Insect powders have not attracted general attention as insecticides until within the last three or four years, during which time they have been introduced in various forms in packages and boxes, accompanied by suitable blowers or insect guns for the purpose of properly distributing the powder, and recommended for the destruction of flies, cockroaches, fleas, bugs, etc. Sometimes these prepared articles have been artificially colored so as to disguise their source, but all have owed their activity solely to the presence of the powdered flowers of one or the other of these Pyrethrums.

House flies are very sensitive to the effects of these powders. A few puffs of the dust from an insect gun, blown into the air of a room with the doors closed, the discharges directed towards those parts where flies are congregated, will stupefy and kill them within a very short time. The powder is somewhat pungent and to breathe an atmosphere charged with it will frequently cause a slight sneezing, but beyond this the operator need not anticipate any annoyance. Frequently during the past summer, when flies have been troublesome, we have pretty thoroughly charged the air in our dining-room and kitchen at night, closing the doors, and in the morning found all, or nearly all, the flies lying dead on the floors. A few minutes after its use they begin to drop on their backs, and after using the powder, few, if any, will escape. By some this energetic action has been attributed to the presence of a volatile oil in the flowers, by other and later investigators to a peculiar crystalline principle believed to be an alkaloid; but this point does not as yet seem to be fully settled.

More recently we have been experimenting with this powder on the green Aphis which troubles our green-house plants. The usual plan of smoking tobacco is an unpleasant remedy, and is also very injurious to many plants of delicate constitution, whereas the insect powder used to any extent is perfectly harmless to plant-life. After freely charging the air of a green-house with the powder, blowing it in fine clouds of dust among the plants, the tiny tormentors who are busily engaged in sucking the life out of the leaves and tender shoots, soon manifest symptoms of uneasiness and begin to drop from the plants to the ground, and in the course of an hour or two the larger portion of the enemy's forces will be found lying sprawling on the earth in the pots or on the shelves and floor of the house, where, probably partly from the stupefying effects of the powder, and partly from their natural inability to find their way to any given point, they fail to reach the plants again, and hence perish. By applying the powder freely in the evening and giving the plants a thorough syringing in the morning, they may in the worst cases be almost freed from aphides by a single application; it is better, however, to repeat its use the next evening, so as to make sure work.

This matter is well worthy the attention of all those who indulge in window gardening, or who grow plants in small conservatories attached to dwellings, since if this proves an efficient and economical substitute for tobacco smoke, it will save much annoyance and some loss. Success will necessarily depend on the quality of the material used, but after the experiments we have tried we feel confident that with good Dalmatian powder there need be no failure.—Canadian Entomologist.

Fishing for Swallows.

One of the customers of this curious coffee-seller I must speak of, since I noted his bundle and inquired the cause of his wearing a feather in his sombrero. Seeing at a glance that I was a stranger, he became, perhaps, more polite and communicative than he otherwise would be. The exquisite taste of the Parisian ladies serves admirably to display their charms. Their toilettes are delightful, and whatever the fashion may be, they appropriate it with inimitable art. I might dwell at length on the ways and means outside of the brigand avenues of Worth and his companions of modiste pillage, to show how this toilette art is produced and perfected. All the excellences in custom can be obtained in this city, minus the ridiculously extravagant charges of these Mantalina highwaymen. Let me speak of this wayfarer by the coffee stand and his calling in life: "Yes, sir; I wear this feather because it is the symbol of my trade, and this bundle, too, contains feathers that you speak of as giving an odor. And, sir, I am proud of my calling. Do you know that the martyr King Louis XVI. delighted in slaughtering swallows, and killed as many as 200 in a single day? But I kill them not. I only tear off their wings!" "What, tear them off the live bird?" I remarked in horror. "Yes, sir; that is the only way to preserve their luster in the hats of the fair and fashionable ones." "But how do you catch the live swallows?" "Fish for them, sir!" I began to be incredulous, but the pale coffee-sipper at once relieved my doubts, and tells me that he sets a series of fine silk threads pendant from poles in the quarries of Arcueil and Gentilly, and to the ends of these threads are attached flies, fluttering in the air. The swallows in their rapid flight overlook the artificial nature of these snares and swallow the bait, then they are speedily caught and divested at once of their wings. Sometimes when the weather is warm and stormy and the swallow flies low as many as three hundred are caught per day in this way and cruelly mutilated. This explains what I have more than once noticed in the suburbs of Paris, the writhing body of a wingless bird. I could not help suggesting to this tearer of wings that he might at once relieve the poor birds of their agonized pain by killing them outright, after plucking their pinions.—Correspondence Baltimore Sun.

The American School System.

There is probably nothing more vicious than the existing school system of the United States. It crowds and kills in the name of education. To make the matter still worse, it fixes the "school age" upon principles in conflict with common sense, and there invites disease and death. A sweeping reform is demanded, and we are glad to believe it is coming. We notice that a Providence medical committee has made careful examination of the health of school children in that city. They state that children are admitted too young; that the vitiated air of the school-room causes consumption; that epidemic diseases are caught there, and that the premature development of the brain causes nervous diseases; that the young minds are crammed with much unintelligible matter, and that the method is too artificial; that the present system forms habits of indolence and that the discomforts arising from sedentary confinement are often the occasion for punishment, hatred for schools and truancy. The committee holds that children should not be admitted in the schools under the age of 7. At whatever age they are admitted the hours of confinement and intellectual effort should be greatly shortened. The children in primary schools should not be confined to their seats more than twenty minutes at a time, at the end of which they should enjoy an equal period of recreation, either in the open air or in an airy room, and mental and physical exercise should thus alternate throughout the session. These changes, it is believed, would vastly improve the health of both scholar and teacher, call back the truant, and make the school in general agreeable rather than irksome.

If such facts do not make parents open their eyes to the fact that school houses are prisons, then, indeed, they are deaf to the pleadings of mercy. To torture children in school-rooms in the name of education is the climax of cruelty.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

Sharper than a Lawyer.

A wag of a lawyer, says the Iowa State Register I was sitting in his office the other day deeply engaged in unraveling some knotty question, when a gentleman entered and inquired, "Is this Mr. Z?" The student of Blackstone, raising his eyes from the legal book before him, replied: "If you owe me then Z is my name; if you have a claim to present I am not the man. If you called simply for a social chat, you can call me any name."

"I propose to present you with some business in your line. I have a note of twenty-five dollars I want you to collect," and handing the lawyer a note, departed to call the next day. As soon as he was gone the lawyer ascertained that it was one of his own promised to pay.

The next day his client appeared and inquired, "Well, what success?"

"All right; I have collected the money. Here it is less my fees," handing him fifteen dollars.

"Good!" said the client. "I have made two dollars and a half by this operation."

"How so?" said the lawyer.

"Well," replied the client. "I tried all over the city to sell your note for twelve dollars and a half, but couldn't do it."

An Indiana Wedding at the Brook's Side.

James Scarlett wooed and won a Miss Gibbons, of Orangeville, but her father refused to allow them to wed. Procuring the necessary license, they made arrangements to be married quietly in the church, and met there with the minister last Friday evening a week ago, but, just as the interesting ceremony commenced, in stepped that "cruel parent" and put a stop to further proceedings. Matters rested quietly until the Monday afternoon following, when the young lady went to a neighbor's, and directly afterward, in company with that neighbor's daughter, took a bucket and went down to the head of Lost river, where everybody in Orangeville gets water, where, strange to tell, she found her intended husband, accompanied by Squire Lem Ross, and other parties, who just happened to be there, and there, under the bluff, the determined couple were made man and wife, and, mounting a couple of horses hitched conveniently near, they left for the country. While all this was going on the old man was at home at work in the garden, and, of course, wasn't a bit mad when he heard of it, only he "allowed if he'd been thar somebody would a' got hurt, so they would."—*Paoli (Ind.) Printers and Printing.

Many of those that condescend to illuminate this dark world with the fire of their genius through the columns of a newspaper, little think of the lot of the printer, who sits up at midnight to correct their grammar, fralty in orthography and worse in punctuation. We have seen the arguments of counsellors, in high repute scholars, sent to the printer in their own handwriting, with many words—especially technical and foreign terms—abbreviated, misspelled and few or no points, and these few, if any, certainly misplaced. We have seen the sermons of eminent divines sent to the press minus points or capitals to designate the divisions of the sentences; also the letters of political and scientific correspondents. Suppose all these had been so printed—the printer would have been subjected to scorn and contempt. No one would would have believed that such gross and palpable faults rested with the ignorance or carelessness of the author; and no one but the practical printer knows how many hours the compositor and the proof-reader are compelled to spend in reducing to readable condition manuscript that often the authors themselves might find it puzzling to read.

A CHILD'S POEM.

Dainty little violet!
Curtsied to bed,
Shut her tiny peepers
And bowed her little head.

Dainty little violet!
Close to the sky above;
Everybody loves her
As all she was a dove.

Dainty little violet!
With her upturned face,
Looking up to heaven,
Waiting for her grace.

Dainty little violet!
Nodded to a bee,
"Now who, pray, are you, sir,
Buzzing so at me?"

A MINISTER at a colored wedding, who wished to be humorous, said: "On such occasions it is customary to kiss the bride, but in this case we will omit it." To which malignant remark the bridegroom pertinently replied: "On such occasions it is customary to pay the minister $10, but in this case we will omit it."

A PRETTILY-DRESSED little girl fell on a muddy street crossing the other day, and a gentleman hastened to her assistance. After cleaning off her clothes, he asked her if he shouldn't escort her home. "No, thir," answered the dignified little damsel, "if you please, we ain't been introduced."—Boston Courier.

"FACT is," said Smith, "I intended ty return your book a month ago; but Brown saw it on my table, and he begged so hard that I lent it to him. Just as soon as he returns it, I'll bring it home." "I see," said Robinson, more in sorrow than in anger, "this is a case of book-keeping by double fentry."—Boston Transcript.

AN ambitious young clerk in a wholesale grocery establishment resolves to enter the civil service, and so presents himself before the examiners. One of the questions is, "What is coffee and where does it come from?" "O, come vow, you know," says the candidate; "I can't give away the boss,—allow me to plead privilege. That's a professional secret."

As some lady visitors were going through a penitentiary under the escort of a superintendent, they came to a room in which three women were sewing. "Dear me!" one of the visitors whispered, "what vicious-looking creatures! Pray, what are they here for?" "Because they have no other home; this is our sitting room, and they are my wife and two daughters," blandly answered the superintendent.

A PATRIOTIC Hibernian, after listening for some time to a recitation of Irish bulls, amid general laughter, cried indignantly: "Faith, Mr. A., an' do ye know what I think?" "Why, indeed, what do you think, Mr. D.?" "Shure, sir, and do ye know that I think, indade, that not more than on-half of these lies that they tell 'bout the Irish are true." This was unanimously pronounced the best bull of the lot.

A PROMINENT attorney residing in Syracuse, while fishing a day or two since, pointed out to his companion a signboard, remarking "The fellow that put up that sign is a liar." "Why?" asked his companion. "Because that sign reads, 'No fishing in this brook,' and I caught the best trout in my basket directly under that board."—Rochester Union.

SOME years ago a body of Yale students attended a circus at New Haven, and fairly demoralized the clown by indulging in an exasperating "haw, haw, haw," whenever the audience had finished laughing at a joke. The other day about 300 students attempted a similar experiment, but the clown neatly turned the laugh on them by saying: "I see I have friends here." After that the boys cheered all his good jokes, and joined with him in singing "My Mary Ann," while he beat time for them good naturedly.

"CAN'T YOU TAKE IT FOR ME?"

The Last Joke Perpetrated by Poor Artemus Ward.

[Cincinnati Enquirer.]

Admiral De Rohan, a brother of the late Admiral Dahlgren, who has a distinguished career in the service of many nations, told me this curious story the other night:

"I was at Radford's Hotel, Southampton, England, one night in 1866, when the landlady came to me and said: 'Admiral, there is an American up stairs very sick, and I'm afraid he's going to die. Can't you go and see him?' 'Madame,' I replied, here is my supper all hot, and a friend to take it with me; I can't see all the Americans who want to come to Southampton to die. Who is he.' 'Oh sir,' she added. 'he is a writer, Mr. Browne; he is Hartemus Ward, the comic writer.'

"I had never known Ward, but I went up stairs, and there I found Mr. Hingston, Ward's business agent. Sitting in the room by a window, and reading a book absently, as if he had no idea of an impending death, was a young man about 16 years old. 'That person,' said Hingston to me, 'is a great favorite of Charley Browne's, and I am sure he means to leave his money to him. Steps ought to be taken to secure the young man in his rights before poor Artemus dies, for he is fast going.'

"I stepped up to the bedside," said Admiral De Rohan, "and there I saw the long, thin, aquiline nose and the remarkably clear blue eyes of Artemus Ward for the first time. His face was thin and bleached, and he was a mere string of bones from head to foot. I leaned over him and reached my hand under the cover and took his hand Said I: 'Browne, I am one of your countrymen, and have come to see if I can do anything for you.' He made a movement with his lips as if to speak, could not articulate; yet that pair of blue eyes, without any fear in them, followed me around intelligently. I saw that he had but a few hours to live. 'What doctor have you here?' I asked. Hingston told me, and I said: 'That is not the best doctor in Southampton; I will send my doctor down, and see if anything can be done.' The doctor came, but shook his head in a moment. 'He is past help,' said the doctor; 'the best I can do for him is to take care of his brain, which is still alive, and I will give him some sedative that his closing moments may be as easy as possible.' That sedative was to be administered at certain intervals, and Dr. Hingston, being very tired, asked me if I would sit up with Artemus Ward and give him his dose every two hours or so. I had given him one or two doses, and when I came to the third said. 'Now, Browne, here is your medicine, which the doctor has left for you It is time to take it like a man.' There was a little catch in his crescentshaped nose, and, without any tremor or fear, his pair of blue eyes rolled up to my face, and he then made the words with his lips just audibly: 'Can't you take it for me?' I suppose that was the last joke he ever made, and traces of a smile accompanied it.

He died some time afterward. I telegraphed to Charles Francis Adams, American minister, Portland place, London: Artemus Ward, the distinguished American humorist, is dying at Radford's Hotel, Southampton, England. He has a ward, aged about 16 years, who is to receive his property. Can you send some one down to receive his testament?

"I never got any dispatch whatever, nor and word or letter in response to mine from that day to this. Mr. Adams was then writing his thirty-ninth or fortieth letter to Earl Russell against the expediency of recognizing the Southern Confederacy when he might have spared all his ink by calling or his passport like a man."

Horrors of a Prairie Fire.

[St. Louis Globe-Democrat.]

Another terrible prairie fire is reported from Bittle Creek, Lincoln county Kansas, which destroyed everything in its path, and resulted in the death of three persons. It appears that about four o'clock in the afternoon Mr. Montgomery, one of the well-to do farmers of that county, and his son, a boy of about twelve, were in the field at work, when they discovered a fire coming from the west. They stopped their work to keep the fire from the hedge, when the wind suddenly changed to the north, blowing very hard and cold and bearing before it a second fire, which came with the fleetness of a horse. There were two fields near on either side, and seeing their danger, the boy started to one field and the father to another. The boy was caught in the flames and fell to the ground instantly. A neighbor, Isaac Pfaff, who was passing near on a mule, galloped up to Mr. Montgomery and induced him to mount the mule behind him and ride to the field. Mr. Montgomery mounted, but seeing his boy fall lost all presence of mind and threw his arms around Mr. Pfaff, catching the bridle-reins and held the mule still while they were both enveloped in the flames. Both men dropped to the ground and the fire passed over them. The mule ran a short distance and fell dead.

The two men arose to their feet, and the wind and fire took their clothing from them as they walked to the nearest field, about one hundred yards distant. Mr. Pfaff's feet were so badly burned that his boots fell from him as he walked. A Mr. Manning came to them from the nearest house with a couple of quilts which he wrapped about the two men, and carried them to the house. He then carried in the dead boy. Both men were perfectly rational, and conversed freely with those around them up to within a few hours of their death. Mr. Montgomery lived about two hours, and Mr. Pfaff lived till about eleven o'clock that night, Mr. Montgomery leaves a wife and seven children, most of whom are grown. Mr. Pfaff leaves a wife and one child.

—Willis & Co. have a fine line of baby carriages that they are selling a little cheaper than any other house in the county.

"The Woods is Full of 'Em."

[Indianapolis News.]

This expression is in frequent use in this state, both in conversation and composition, and yet its origin is probably known only to one in a thousand of those who use it. A gentleman who claims to know gave a reporter for the News, Saturday, the following as the manner in which it was first used:

In the neighborhood of Washington, Wayne county, lived a well-known character named Bill Dean. He was what is generally termed a "smart Aleck," always endeavoring to perpetrate a joke at somebody's expense. One day, while riding to Richmond, every foot of which he knew, he espied an old gentleman named Cheezum, accoutered for a hunt, earnestly looking up a tree. Approaching him Dean asked:

"Can you tell me the way to Richmond?"

"There was two of 'em run this tree." was the response of the old gentleman, who was somewhat deaf.

"I didn't ask you anything about squirrels. How far is it to Richmond?"

"One of 'em just went in the hole, didn't you see him?" the old man said earnestly.

Out of patience, Dean yelled out: "You must be a d——d old fool?"

"Yes," Cheezum responded, still gazing upward, "the woods is full of 'em."

Too Much Sleep.

The effects of too much sleep are not less signal than those arising from its privation. The whole nervous system becomes blunted, so that the muscular energy is enfeebled and the sensations and moral and intellectual manifestations are obtunded. All the bad effects of inaction become developed. The functions are exerted with less energy, the digestion is torpid, the exertions are diminished, while in some instances, the secretion of fat accumulates to an inordinate extent. The memory is impaired, the powers of imagination are dormant, and the mind falls into a kind of hebetude, chiefly because the functions of the intellect are not sufficiently exerted when sleep is too prolonged or too often repeated. To sleep much is not necessarily to be a good sleeper. Generally they are the poorest sleepers who remain longest in bed—i. e., they awaken less refreshed than if the time of arising were earlier by an hour or two. While it is true that children and young people require more sleep than their elders, yet it should be the care of the parents that over indulgence be not permitted. Where the habit is for children to lie in bed until 8 or 9 in the morning, the last two hours, at least, do not bring sound, dreemless sleep where the hour for retiring is 8 or 9 p. m., but are spent in dozing, and, in fact, such excess cannot fail to insure the harmful results described by the authority quoted. What is called laziness among children is, in many cases, disease, and is largely due to this as well as other causes mentioned that undermine the foundations of health.—Golden Rule.

WORM SPECIFIC

OR

VERMIFUGE.

SYMPTOMS OF WORMS.

THE countenance is pale and leaden-colored, with occasional flushes, or a circumscribed spot on one or both cheeks; the eyes become dull; the pupils dilate; an azure semicircle runs along the lower eye-lid; the nose is irritated, swells, and sometimes bleeds; a swelling of the upper lip; occasional headache, with humming or throbbing of the ears; an unusual secretion of saliva; slimy or furred tongue; breath very foul, particularly in the morning; appetite variable, sometimes voracious, with a gnawing sensation of the stomach, at others, entirely gone; fleeting pains in the stomach; occasional nausea and vomiting; violent pains throughout the abdomen; bowels irregular, at times costive; stools slimy, not unfrequently tinged with blood; belly swollen and hard; urine turbid; respiration occasionally difficult, and accompanied by hiccough; cough sometimes dry and convulsive; uneasy and disturbed sleep, with grinding of the teeth; temper variable, but generally irritable, &c.

Whenever the above symptoms
are found to exist,
DR. C. McLANE'S VERMIFUGE
will certainly effect a cure.

IT DOES NOT CONTAIN MERCURY in any form; it is an innocent preparation, not capable of doing the slightest injury to the most tender infant.

The genuine DR. McLANE'S VERMIFUGE bears the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS. on the wrapper. —:o:—

DR. C. McLANE'S

WHY THE MULE ESCAPED.

During the storm yesterday seven cows, two young horses and eleven sheep were struck by lightning and killed in a pasture-field near Aberdeen, Miss. A mule in the same field was uninjured.—Daily Paper.

A mule was grazing in a field,
With calm and solemn mien,
'Mid daisies pied and violets blue,
A beauteous summer scene.

To westward in the somber blue
A cloud began to rise,
And soon a storm was raging—
There was tumult in the skies.

Full vividly the lightnings flashed
And shot athwart the sky,
While the thunder- drum of heaven
Rattled most majestically.

The rains they beat upon the earth
In torrents most intense,
And seemed to say unto the mule,
"'Tis better you go hence."

The mule he budged him not an inch,
But kept a stiffened lip,
And, raising of his tail aloft,
Said, "Storm King, crack your whip!"

Not heaven's loud artillery,
Nor the wild and lurid sky,
Could make that long-eared Ajax
Withdraw his proud deli.

The lightning danced a gallopade,
And seemed to say, "Thou fool!"
And then shot out vindictively
And struck that cussed mule.

! ! ! ! ! !

And this was years and years ago,
Since when it's been a rule
Of lightning and the elements
To fight shy of the mule.

EUFAULA CREEK NATION, I. T.
May 29th, 1879.

EDS. COURIER:—A few words from the Indian Territory may be interesting to some of the many readers of your valuable paper. I reached Viniti, Cherokee Nation, Saturday morning at three. A little time brought forth daylight; the first object I saw was a sentinel patroling the street at sunrise. I heard the sound of the bugle, which recalled days gone by when war was raging between the north and south. Troops are placed here and elsewhere in the territory to prevent white immigration. Cullequa, the capital of the Cherokee nation, is located about forty miles southeast, where a council is in session at this time. It is said all white people must leave the territory by Aug. 1. There I saw many Cherokee and Delawares. I remained over Sunday, on Monday I took the train for Muscogee, 64 miles south of that place, I procured a team and drove to Fort Gibson, eight miles east of Muscogee, here you can travel many miles without seeing a single habitation. From Muscogee I came here. Thirty-five miles south of this place, the Sac, Fox, Creek and Choctaw Indians are in council, where I saw the tall fierce looking Sac and Fox warriors with painted faces, feathered hats &c. The Sac and Fox tribes occupy a territory one hundred miles west, but came to attend the council, which is a secret council, another man and myself tried to be admitted but were refused, don't know why, for I never should have revealed any of the proceedings, all would have been a profound secret with me, and a good reason why. I never should have told anything that transpired. I am stopping at an Indian hotel, and a more clever family I never met. I go north to-night again to Muscogee, then I go to Fort Smith overland, a distance of seventy-five miles. The law prohibiting the sale of liquor is rigidly enforced, so all is order, presume it is well. Such a law is strictly enforced, knowing the effect that liquor produces upon the copper colored people. Indian Territory is truly the most beautiful country that man has ever seen. The Sac and Fox tribes are uncivilized, while the Delaware, Cherokee & Creek nations are fully civilized, and more clever and honest people do not exist. I made the acquaintance of many of them and they are ever ready to extend the hand of friendship to the pale-face, so long as he deals honestly with them. Though I have been in the territory less than a week, it seems almost like leaving home to go elsewhere, would love to travel over the entire civilized portion of the territory. Forty or fifty took dinner at this house. I talked with such as speak english, they are well pleased with the action of the government in prohibiting white settlers from occupying their territory. In traveling over a portion of the territory a picture of real romance presents itself to the traveler. Weather is very warm, corn is growing finely, seen corn fully three feet tall; see plenty of new potatoes and ripe cherries. For want of spare time I close, should like to give a more thorough account of my trip had I time to do so.

I remain respectfully,
E. KUHLMAN.

How a Bucks County Man Raises Young Pigeons for Market.

[Newton (Pa.) Enterprise.]

His name is Benjamin Yates and he lives at Buckmanville. He makes a business of raising young pigeons or "squabs" for the New York market. He has about 100 pairs of pigeons, and during the past ten weeks he has received over $90 for squabs sold. They occupy but a small space, and all about his premises is neatness and order. Their nests are in small, low rooms over a wagon-house or stable. Each pair of pigeons has a box, open in front, and containing two nests divided by a partition. The pigeons live in pairs, one male and one female mating and living together until death doth them part. If by any accident there should be an odd one it is at once mated or killed, for one unmated pigeon will cause trouble and confusion in the community. The nest is made up and fixed by the pair, and the female lays two eggs and commences sitting. When fairly under way she hands the business over to her mate, fixes up her companion nest and lays two more eggs. Thus the business is going on constantly. Every egg hatches, there are always two squabs in a nest, and a pair of squabs hatched to a pair of parent pigeons every month. These boxes are close together on all sides of the little rooms where the pigeons are kept. There are doors communicating with the outside air, which are all opened and shut at one time by drop gates, controlled by a rope. A person can go into the house without disturbing the pigeons. Some are sitting, some are laying, and in many nests are the pairs of squabs in all stages of infancy, from the featherless biped, just out of the egg, to the lazy-looking fellow almost as large as his parents. Mr. Yates sends his squabs to New York and gets three dollars a dozen for them. He feeds his flock on corn and wheat, and has a very simple and complete arrangement to have a supply of clean food before them at all times, and as they get all they want to eat, they never leave his premises except to take a circle through the air and return to the roof of their home. How are the young ones fed from the time they break out of the egg until they are large enough to eat? By "pigeon milk" secreted in the glands of the mother pigeon, and fed to the young one through the bill. Our readers can look up natural history and find out all about this curious provision nature has made. Mr. Yates is also engaged in breeding rabits for market, which are also very prolific, but he thinks of giving them up and devoting his attention more fully to pigeons and bees. The success of Mr. Yates is no doubt due to the systematic care exercised, attending closely to the wants of his birds; and in having everything neat, clean and in good order about them.

Strange Marriage to a Negro the Result of a Diseased Mind.

[Beaver (Pa.) Argus.]

On application to the court of this county on Saturday evening one week ago, by two of the immediate relatives of the young woman of this place (Annie Mason) who married a negro a few days previous, three commissioners were appointed to inquire into the mental condition of the unfortunate girl. Notice of the appointment of these commissioners was served upon her by the sheriff of the county during the same evening, and her appearance before them on the following Tuesday afternoon was ordered. Instead, however, of meeting them at the time designated, herself and alleged husband left for Ohio and have not yet returned. The commissioners heard the testimony of some eight or ten witnesses, after which they had no hesitation in deciding that she was now and had been for some time partially insane or afflicted with what is known in medical science as nymphomania. In this connection it might not be out of place to state that much of the Pittsburg Leader's account of this unfortunate affair was untrue, and the rest of it highly colored. For instance, that paper represented the wayward girl as having been chastised by one of her brothers on the day previous to her marriage. Nothing of this kind took place then, nor had she been chastised by any member of the family for years. On the contrary, her parents and brothers treated her with marked kindness, sought in every way to make her home pleasant and her life happy. She had all the educational facilities that any one could ask, was provided with the best of clothing, and permitted to perform only such labor as she wished to do. To flee from such surroundings and cast her lot where she has, indicates beyond the shadow of a doubt, a diseased mind.

REVISION OF THE BIBLE.

The Nature of the Results That are Expected.

[Philadelphia Bulletin.]

A good many persons are aware that a revision is now being made of the common or so called King James' translation of the Bible into the English-language, but probably few are familiar with the character and conditions of the undertaking and of the nature of the result that are expected. A little volume, just issued by the Sunday-school Union, supplies a quantity of interesting information upon the subject. The task of revision has been intrusted to an English committee and an American committee both of which are composed of eminent scholars, representing nearly if not quite all of the leading Protestant denominations. The scheme was organized in England, in 1870, by the appointment of the English committee which is divided into two companies, one of which considers the Old Testament and the other the New Testament. The American committee was organized in 1871, upon the invitation of the British committee, and it began its duties in October, 1872. The British committee includes 52 active members and the American committee 27. Among the latter are such men as Professor Charles P. Krauth, of the University of Pennsylvania; Rev. Dr. G. Emlen Hare, of this city; ex-president Woolsey, of New Haven; Professor W. H. Green, of Princeton; Professor Howard Osgood, of Rochester; Professor Calvin H. Stone, of Hartford; Professor Ezra Abbott, of Howard University, and Dr. Howard Crosby, of New York. The British and American committees are parts of one organization, and they work together. The English committee holds regular meetings in the deanery of Westminister, London. The American committee meets in New York City once a month. The Hebrew text used is the Masoretic, which has few variations, and the Greek text is taken from the oldest and best of the available versions.

The work of revision is done, not by small sub-committees, but by the whole of the Old Testament committee in each country goes over the text, and the two New Testament committees do likewise with the new. Each company goes twice over the portion to be revised, the second time in such a manner as to dispose of all disputed questions. The first time a simple majority may approve a translation; upon the second time a two-thirds vote is required for approval. The English and American companies exchange between themselves confidential copies of the results of their work, and then each revises the translations of the other with a view to harmonizing them. The agreement is to change the text of the present version as little as may be possible consistently with accuracy; to express all alterations, so far as practicable, in the language of the present version; to revise the headings of the chapters, the italics, the paragraphing and the punctuation; and to seek the opinion of the best scholars outside of the committees, when there is an important point under dispute. That there will be no disposition to treat the old version in a very radical spirit, may be inferred from the alleged fact that thus far only one new word has been placed in the New Testament. The proceedings of the two committees are to a great extent confidential, but it is known that the two New Testament committees have concluded the first and a part of the second revision, and that the Old Testament committee have about one-third more of their task to do. When the entire work is completed it will be printed and submitted to the world, and the religious denominations will have an opportunity to decide whether they will accept it or not.

That it will be received by many with a disfavor born of affection for the old version is nearly certain; but it is likely that educated people as a rule will be disposed to accept it. The King James version, after all, is nothing more than the product of precisely such a revision as this. It contains the best things that distinguished its predecessors, with such new translations of value as could be supplied by the eminent English scholars who undertook the task at the command of the English king. But our scholarship, our collections of manuscript, our acquaintance with the ancient languages, and our information obtained from a multitude of sources which were not available 350 years ago, give to learned men of the present day an advantage so great over those of King James' time, that passages which were obscure then are clear now, and points which were disputable are now settled by common consent. There has never been a time when a nearly absolute correct translation was within so easy reach as at present; and if the Scriptures have the importance which Christians attribute to them; if they are a divine revelation to man upon which modern civilization rests, it would seem to be a matter of high importance that the people should have a chance to know always what the sacred writers said, and not what certain learned but poorly equipped translators think they said. The number of corrections in the text will run far up into the tens of thousands, but most of those will involve no serious change of the sense, and it is believed that what Christian people regard as the vitally important matters in the Bible will rarely or never be touched at all. The simple and beautiful language of the King James' version will be retained throughout the work, and it is doubtful if any but the critical and careful reader will be able to detect the change without comparison.

Slavery in Massachusetts.

An interesting paper was read recently before a meeting of the Connecticut Valley Historical Society, at Springfield, Massachusetts, in relation to slavery in the early days of that commonwealth. The people then were not very far different from those of latter times, as a specimen reference will show. We quote from the address: "A case tried in Worchester in 1806, in which the town of Winchendon sued the town of Hatfield for the support of a negro pauper, developed in a remarkable degree the chattel principle of slavery. The name of the negro was Edom London. In 1757 Edom was the slave of one Samuel Bond. Bond sold him to Wm. Williams, of Weston. In 1760, after Williams' death, Edom was set off in the distribution of his estate to his daughter, who was the wife of Oliver Partridge, of Hatfield. There he lived with Partridge as a slave until 1767. Partridge then sold him to John Ingersoll, of Westfield. There he remained three years when Ingersoll sold him to John McCluster, of Longmeadow. He stayed in Longmeadow a few weeks, and then was sold by McCluster to Joshua Holcomb, of Simsbury, Connecticut, where he lived about four years. Holcomb then sold him to Wm. Bond, of Lincoln, Mass. Bond kept him a short time and sold him to one Cowden, of Fitchburg. Cowden sold him to Stimson, of Winchendon. This was just at the beginning of the American Revolution, and Edom, feeling perhaps stirring within him that spirit of freedom which the orators of that day so often aroused by their eloquence, ran away from Stimson the very next day and enlisted as a soldier in the American army at Cambridge for eight months' service. Before his term of service expired, Stimson sold him to one Sawyer. (Think of this selling a soldier fighting the battles of his country for liberty!) Sawyer sold him to Goodridge, of Winchendon, in July, 1776 (perhaps on the glorious Fourth). He stayed in Winchendon about five weeks. Then he enlisted for three years in the service of our country, and served his full term of enlistment. His master, Goodridge, received his bounty money and part of his wages. Thus this man, after having been the slave of eleven different masters, and been sold from one to another until the list grew to be almost as long as a Scotch pedigree, and having served for years in the armies of his country, at last drifts into a poor-house and lives and dies a pauper, and two towns go to law to get rid of the burden of his support."

As to how slavery came to be abolished in Massachusetts there is difference of opinion. Legislation did not make it; legislation did not destroy it; and the courts had no authority to pronounce it illegal. The address thinks "it withered and fell before the spirit of liberty, which inhered in the people." John Adams seemed to have a different opinion. At the same meeting of the said society the address was supplemented by the reading of an unpublished letter from John Adams to Dr. Belknap, in which Mr. Adams said the real cause of the emancipation "was the multiplication of laboring white people, who would not allow the labor by which they could gain a subsistence to be done by slaves. The scoffs and jeers of the white people led the negroes to be so idle and dissipated that slavery was abolished as a matter of economy." The white laboring people of that day were moved by like impulses that move the opponents of Chinese immigration to-day. As the struggle for existence grows more difficult by increasing number, that impulse against Chinese cheap labor will strengthen among white laborers, and also among native colored laborers. The spirit of liberty does not exactly fit this Chinese case in the estimation of those whose occupations come in conflict with those of almond-eyed foreigners.

STRANGE IMPOSTURE IN INDIANA.

A Highly Respected Physician Has Two Wives and is Found Out.

[From the Sullivan Democrat.]

For the past twenty-five years Dr. John H. Baldridge has resided in Jackson township, enjoyed a good practice as a physician, was a prominent member of the Presbyterian Church, and one of the leading citizens in the northern part of the county. A short time ago he packed his valise and left, on the exposure of certain facts which he could not longer conceal. Recent revelations make known that, in his younger days he was living in peace with a faithful wife in Ohio; that when she was confined to her bed a young and attractive girl was employed to work about the house and nurse the sick wife; that Dr. Baldridge and the girl became too intimate for peaceful relations to exist between the husband and wife, and that he finally ran away with the girl, leaving his wife, and come to this county, where he located and passed her off as his wife. Some ten or twelve years ago the real wife became needy and wrote to the doctor for assistance. The result of the correspondence was that a fear of her exposures led him to agree to provide for her, with the stipulation that she should remove to this county, bury the secret in her own breast, and pass herself off as the widow of his brother. This arrangement was carried out—the wife coming into the household where her place had been assumed by her former hired servant, and there the two women continued to live in peace, so far as the outside world knows. Something over nine years ago Mr. T. F. Curry, a well-known citizen of that vicinity, having lost his wife, paid his addresses to the putative widow, was accepted, and finally married her, although she was the wife of Dr. Baldridge, never having been divorced. Mr. Curry died about a year ago, and probably never knew anything as to the facts.

There were no childern of this marriage, although Mr. Curry had several children by his former wife. Dr. Baldridge raised a large family of children by both women, those born to him in lawful wedlock being raised by the woman he brought with him to Indiana. When the story became known to a few, the guilty ones were in constant fear, and we learn that the presence of the sheriff in Farmersburg one day was what frightened the doctor into flight. His putative wife left soon after, but we learn that she returned a few days ago. During his long residence in this county, the doctor bought and sold many hundred acres of land, and all the deeds he made were signed by the woman he represented to be his wife. An attorney can readily see the complications arising, especially if the children of Mr. Curry propose to dispossess their stepmother of her interest in the Curry estate, and she is led to assert her rights as the lawful wife of Dr. Baldridge.

Newville.

[Last Week]

—On Friday last we visited the neighboring village of Hicksville, Ohio, where we found a large number of people assembled for the purpose of visiting the show and seeing the sights, and they did see them; some of them would not look well on paper, neither did they on the streets. One thing that we saw in Hicksville that we think was no credit to those that did it, was the taking off of the pump-handles and locking the pumps so that people could not get a drink of nature's beverage, but were compelled to buy the swill that was for sale on the corners. But in justice we will say that Hon. A. P. Edgerton's and a few others were not locked and the gate was open.

—Abner Denman has traded his property in this place for a farm in Henry county, Ohio, and is going to leave us as soon as Mrs. Denman's school is closed. We are sorry to lose them, as they are good citizens; and we will also lose an excellent shoemaker, who is the only one we have; this will be a good opportunity for some one to take advantage of, as we will need a shoemaker very much. Wilmington Township.

[Last Week.]

—Wheat-fields in this vicinity look promising, and the farmers are consequently in good spirits.

—Crows have been quite troublesome and a number of our farmers have had to replant their corn.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

IT is stated in a dispatch from Island Pond, Vt., that there have been eleven deaths so far of the children who drank from the poisoned brook. Edward Moore lost two, John Aldrich five, Fred Simpson one, L. Wilson one, Mr. Park one, John Cole one. Others cannot live. Potato-tops, poisoned by paris green, which were thrown into the brook, are regarded as the cause of the poisoning rather than the carcasses of dead animals. Terrible distress prevails in the town, and work is suspended. Twenty-seven children were poisoned by drinking from the brook. The bodies of the children soon decompose, and are quickly buried.

THE mystery of the Manhattan (N. Y.) Bank robbery of October last, by which money and securities worth about $3,000,000 were secured by the burglars, has at last been revealed by the confession of the night watchman, who was one of the gang implicated in the affair. The plot of the cracksmen was formed three years before its successful execution, but was postponed from time to time, as unexpected obstacles were encountered. After the robbery and division of the swag, each member of the gang was assessed $600, which was sent to Washington to defeat the bill introduced in Congress to duplicate the stolen bonds, as, if passed, it would be almost impossible to negotiate the originals. Three members of the band who took part in this extraordinary robbery have been arrested, and the New York police are on the track of the others.

CHARLES ROCHE, of New York city, 19 years old, has been sent to the State Reformatory, charged with bigamy. When 16 he married Mary Husher, and before he was 18 married Charlotte Gillespie.... James Orton Woodruff, the projector of the "Woodruff Scientific Expedition," which collapsed a few weeks ago, died at New York, last week, of brain fever.

IN the Pennsylvania House of Representatives, last week, resolutions were offered for the expulsion of Representatives Petroff, Smith, and Reinberger, the three members accused by the Riot Bribery Committee of having corruptly solicited members to vote for the $4,000,000 bill. In each case a majority vote was recorded in favor of expulsion, but, as it requires two-thirds of the members to expel, the accused members escaped the penalty which the investigating committee proposed to inflict.

TWO MEN were instantly killed, two fatally injured, and three seriously wounded, by the explosion of a boiler in a brick-yard at Freedom, Pa., last week.... Peter, alias "Peachy," Swingler (colored), who murdered John Anderson (colored) on the night of Dec. 17 last, was hanged at Chambersburg, Pa., on the 5th inst.

A TELEGRAM from Island Pond, Vt., says that "a medical examination and investigation of the poisoning cases at Newark, Vt., to-day resulted in showing that diphtheria was the cause of the terrible mortality, aggravated by poisoned water. Diphtheria in a mild form had been in the vicinity, and four cases were known to exist, so that water poisoned by barnyard drainage and putrid carcasses of dead animals was just the thing to feed the disease into the development of the terrible disaster. Eleven deaths have occurred. The others will recover."

THE WEST.

A PARTY of Indians recently made a raid on the Salmon river, and killed two settlers, Hugh Johnson and Pascall Dawson.... Cincinnati is greatly agitated over the cold-blooded assassination of Mr. Villie Black, wholesale tobacconist and respected citizen. He was shot down at his desk by a discharged negro employe, without any apparent provocation.

A FIRE broke out at Silver Reef, Utah, the other night, consuming all the business houses on the west side of Main street, and some twenty residences. The loss is estimated at $500,000.... A correspondent of a Chicago paper at Milwaukee states, on the authority of a personal friend of Senator Matt H. Carpenter, that the latter smokes twenty cigars a day, and that he is slowly but surely dying from the effects of the excessive use of tobacco.

THEATRICAL managers are perfectly willing to give the people "Pinafore" as long as they want and are willing to pay for it. It is to be continued at McVicker's Theater, in Chicago, for another week, with the best caste the opera has received in that city. Some enthusiasts are said not to be satisfied without they hear it at least three times a week; and the hurdy-gurdy grinders will soon have the airs adapted to the hand-organ.

GEN. JAMES SHIELDS, the old veteran of two wars, died suddenly at Ottumwa, Iowa, on Sunday evening, June 1, where he had been visiting relatives while engaged in the duties of his lecture course. The news of his death will carry sadness with it throughout the entire country, which had come to regard the brave old soldier with feelings of kindly admiration and respect.... Crop items: Omaha (Neb.) dispatch—"Reports from all parts of the State are to the effect that the recent heavy rains did no damage, but that crops are everywhere looking splendid. The outlook for Nebraska this year was never better." Fond du Lac (Wis.) dispatch—"A heavy frost this morning destroyed, in some localities, corn, beans, and other tender plants. No apples were left to be injured, the previous cold weather having destroyed nearly all the buds and sets."

C. T. PIERCE is now prosecuting the weary task of walking from Cresco, Iowa, to Dunkirk, N. Y., a distance of 1,000 miles, in 1,000 hours.... A large building on the corner of Pearl and Elm streets, Cincinnati, was burned last week, involving a loss of $100,000. A few hours after the fire, while workmen were clearing away the rubbish, the walls fell with a crash, burying several men beneath the ruins. Six of them were killed and three or four wounded.... The tailors and sewing girls of Cincinnati are on a strike. The strikers number about 3,000, and refuse to do more work unless their compensation is raised 25 per cent.

THREE renegade Cheyennes, who shot and killed private Bader and wounded Signal Sergt. Kennedy, while en route to Fort Keogh, Mont., and who were turned over to the civil authorities at Miles City, Mont., to answer the charge of murder, were sentenced, the other day, to be hanged on the 7th of next July. The same evening two of them committed suicide by hanging in the cells of the guard-house at Fort Keogh.

THE SOUTH.

AT New Orleans, last week, Judge Whitaker sentenced John Herbert, Clerk of the Criminal District Court, to pay a fine of $50, or take two months in the parish prison on conviction of carrying concealed weapons.

AT New Orleans, last week, Ross Stewart, a prominent colored politician and a member of the Legislature from Tensas parish, stabbed and seriously wounded William Ward, colored, formerly of Grant parish. Stewart charges Ward with being instrumental in securing evidence for Judge Spofford in the contest against Senator Kellogg. Stewart, after stabbing, ran into the Custom House, where the police were refused admittance by a night-watchman.

IT is reported from Nashville that a revenue officer and six men were ambushed and killed by moonshiners in the mountains of East Tennessee.... A Waco (Texas) dispatch reports the killing of two colored men by a mob, who first hung them and then riddled them with shot. They were charged with the murder of a fellow negro, having assassinated him while asleep in bed.

THE report, heretofore mentioned, that a Deputy Marshal and six men had been murdered by moonshiners in East Tennessee was without foundation. The revenue posse was fired upon by the crooks, but no one was hurt.

Statement of Financial Operations for Fourteen Years.—Numerous inquiries having been made as to the financial operations of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury has published the following statement showing the changes in the public debt, the annual interest charge, etc.:

Reduction of the Interest-Bearing Debt.

Total interest-bearing debt at the highest point, Aug. 31, 1865	$2,381,530,294
Total interest-bearing debt when the present refunding operations shall have been completed (Aug. 1, 1879)	1,797,643,750
Reduction on interest-bearing debt from the highest point	583,886,544
Annual interest charge, highest point, Aug. 31, 1865	150,977,697
Annual interest charge when the present refunding operations are completed (Aug. 1, 1879)	83,773,778
Reduction in annual interest charge	67,203,919

Reduction of the Total Debt.

Debt less cash in treasury, highest point, Aug. 31, 1865	$2,756,431,571
Debt less cash in treasury, June 1, 1879	2,027,182,468
Reduction of total debt	729,249,103
Reduction of debt since March 1, 1877	61,598,674

Bonds Refunded Since March 1, 1877.

Loan of 1858, 5 per cent.	$ 260,000
Ten-forties of 1864, 5 per cent.	194,556,300
Annual interest charge	9,741,315
Five-twenties of 1865, 6 per cent.	100,496,050
Consols of 1865, 6 per cent.	202,663,100
Consols of 1867, 6 per cent.	310,622,750
Consols of 1868, 6 per cent.	37,473,800
Annual interest charge	39,071,742
Total amount of loans	846,022,000
Total annual interest charge	48,813,057

In place of the above bonds there will be issued when the present refunding operations are completed, which will be not later than Aug. 1, 1879, bonds as follows:

Funded loan of 1891, 4½ per cent.	$135,000,000
Annual interest charge	6,075,000
Funded loan of 1907, including refunding certificates, 4 per cent.	711,022,000
Annual interest charge	28,440,880
Total amount	846,022,000
Total annual interest charge	34,515,880
Making an annual saving hereafter in the interest charge on account of refunding operations since March 1, 1877, of	14,297,177

Bonds have been sold for resumption purposes since March 1, 1877, the interest on which represents an annual cost of coin reserve as follows:

Funded loan of 1881, 4½ per cent.	$65,000,000
Annual interest charge	2,925,000
Funded loan of 1907, 4 per cent.	25,000,000
Annual interest charge	1,000,000
Total amount	90,000,000
Total annual interest charge	3,925,000
Making the net annual saving in interest through the refunding and resumption operations since March 1, 1877, of	10,372,177

In addition to the above bonds, there were issued in 1878, to replace coin used in payment of the Halifax award, 4 per cent. bonds of 1907, amounting to $5,500,000.

[NOTE.—In preparing this memorandum the maximum limit of the issue of 4 per cent. bonds and certificates is stated when the refunding transactions are completed and the full returns received. The amount may be somewhat smaller, making the interest charge correspondingly less.]

Refunding Certificates.—The Secretary of the Treasury has given notice that the $10 refunding certificates will now be received at the department for conversion into 4 per cent. bonds. Refunding certificates forwarded for conversion, and 4 per cent. bonds issued therefor, must be transmitted without risk or expense to the Government. Packages should be marked "refunding certificates," and addressed to the Treasurer of the United States, and applications should specify the denominations of the bonds desired; also whether coupon or registered, and for the latter the full name and postoffice address of the person should be given.

WASHINGTON.

EX-CONGRESSMAN E. C. INGERSOLL, a brother of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, died suddenly at Washington, a few days ago.

THE resignation of Judge Dillon, of the Eighth judicial circuit of the United States, has been received, and of course accepted, by the President. In his letter of resignation the Judge mentions his acceptance of a college professorship, with a better salary, as his reason for retiring from the bench. It seems to be an understood thing that Secretary McCrary will secure the place thus vacated.

NATHANIEL NILES, of New Jersey; George B. Smith, of Iowa; Daniel Chadwick, of Connecticut; Ralph B. Buckland, of Ohio, and Charles C. Housel, of Nebraska, have been appointed a Board of Government Directors of the Union Pacific railroad. Niles is the only new member.

THE Signal Bureau will make an inquiry into the origin, movement and effects of the recent tornado in Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri.

GENERAL.

OFFICIAL advices from Washington Territory indicate that only a few locusts had been hatched. From other points of the Northwest there are no reports of these pests appearing in numbers.

AMONG the passengers by the steamship Scythia were Mr. Kasson, United States Minister to Vienna; Mr. Stoughton, Minister to Russia; and the Duke of Argyll, who comes to visit his son, the Governor General of Canada.

BURNED: Pardee Hall, one of the Lafayette College buildings, at Easton, Pa., loss $225,000; the variety establishment of S. Barnum & Sons, Buffalo, N. Y., loss $250,000, insurance $200,000.

POLITICAL.

THE Greenbackers of Maine held their State Convention at Portland last week. Joseph H. Smith, of Oldtown, was unanimously nominated for Governor on the first ballot.

THE National State Convention of Ohio met at Columbus, June 4, and nominated the following ticket: For Governor, Gen. A. Saunders Piatt, of Logan; Lieutenant Governor, Hugo Preyor, of Stark; Auditor, Andrew Roy, of Jackson; Treasurer, Charles Jenkins, of Mahoning; Supreme Judge, A. M. Jackson, of Cuyahoga; Attorney General, James C. Crogan, of Hocking; Member of the Board of Public Works, George W. Piatt, of Hamilton.

THE Ohio Democratic Convention also met at Columbus on the 4th, and nominated the following ticket for State officers: For Governor, Thomas Ewing, of Fairfield; Lieutenant Governor, A. V. Rice, of Putnam; Treasurer, Anthony Howells, of Stark; Auditor, Charles Reemelin, of Hamilton; Judge of Supreme Court, W. J. Gilmore, of Preble; Attorney General, Isaiah Pillars, of Allen; Member of Board of Public Works, Patrick O'Marah, of Cuyahoga.

EX-SENATOR CONOVER, of Florida, has been appointed, by the President, Collector of Internal Revenue for that State.

FOREIGN.

ADVICES from Zululand report a terrible battle at a point between Thringpost and Sanhawalla. A powerful Zulu chief, named Matcona, with all of his people, numbering some thousands, had resolved to surrender to the British. He was joined by Dabalmanzi, Cetywayo's brother, who commanded the Zulus at Ginghovoo, and the remnant of that army, its chiefs having kept away from Cetywayo since their defeat through fear. When nearing Thringpost, they were unexpectedly intercepted by a powerful force, supposed to be commanded by Cetywayo, coming from the northward. A fearful conflict ensued, resulting in great slaughter of the Zulus who wished to surrender, and they were dispersed and driven back.... A dispatch from Simla says the treaty of peace between Great Britain and Afghanistan was ratified on the 30th of May. A salute of thirty-one guns was fired in honor of the event.... Mr. Lorillard's horse gallantly won the Epsom gold cup, making the fourth victory he has achieved over the English racers.

A CABLE dispatch says that numerous fresh fissures have opened at Mount Ætna. The flood of lava is now very extensive, and streaming toward the river Alcantare, devastating the village of Abio. A long continuance of the eruption is probable.... The reports from all parts of England are that the grain crops are backward, and in many districts thin and poor, and that vegetation is later than has been remembered for many years.

A Rome dispatch of the 3d inst. says: Mount Ætna is ejecting enormous volumes of ashes. The destruction of property is immense. The Commune of Majo has been obliterated, and Casello is threatened. Many large and valuable estates have been destroyed.... Four revolutionists were hanged at Kieff, in Russia, on the 2d inst.... Late Panama advices say the sessions of the House have been characterized by the most disgraceful disorder. People in the galleries openly expressed their contempt and hatred of certain members whose hostility against the Executive has been most marked, and those members increased the disorder by making most impassioned attacks against the President of the republic. The populace replied with volleys of stones, and members used their revolvers in turn. Things got to such a pass that a battalion of soldiers marched into the Parliament House, cleared the galleries and escorted the members home.

A PARIS dispatch states that M. De Lesseps has already commenced the formation of a company to construct the tide-level interoceanic canal from Colon to Panama, across the Isthmus of Darien, the route selected by the International Congress. A first subscription of 4,000,000,000 francs will be opened simultaneously all over the world about September next. It is to be an essentially popular loan without Government aid or guarantee.

ENGLISH and Scotch farmers complain of the coldness of the spring, which has an unfavorable effect on crops. In Scotland, particularly, the outlook is reported to be discouraging, while in England the chance of a fair harvest is admitted to depend on a speedy improvement in the weather..... Baron Lionel Nathan de Rothschild, chief partner in the banking firm of Rothschild & Co., is dead.... The Spanish Government is preparing a bill for the abolition of slavery in Cuba and other colonies, and will soon submit it to the Cortes.... The steamer A. E. Nordenskjold has sailed from Malta for Behring's straits, by way of the Suez canal, in quest of the steamer Vega, containing the Swedish Arctic explorer, Prof. Nordenskjold, and party.

THE Amoor river and the tributaries in Eastern Asia have overflowed, and it is thought a famine will ensue.... The famine in India is a very serious matter. Official reports received in London represent great and increasing distress.

TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-EIGHT additional French Communists have received amnesty.... A St. Petersburg dispatch says it is stated in official circles there that England has joined Germany in the protest against the arbitrary manner in which the Khedive's decree of April 22 dealt with the creditors of the Egyptian Government. Although solicited by Germany to join in the protest, Russia holds aloof.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

Neither branch of Congress was in session on the 31st ult. The two advisory committees of the House and Senate Democratic caucuses held a joint meeting and reached substantially a unanimous agreement as to the course of action that should be adopted by the dominant party in Congress with regard to the appropriation bills. It was decided to recommend the passage of the Army Appropriation bill, with the proviso that none of the money shall be used in the payment of expenses incurred should the troops be used for police purposes at the polls. It was also determined to pass the other bills, omitting any provision for the payment of Supervisors or Deputy Marshals of Elections. The committee also agreed to recommend the passage of a separate bill containing the principles vetoed by the President relative to the method of drawing juries and the abolition of the juror's test oath.

The Senate, on the 2d inst., passed the bill making appropriations for the construction, etc., of certain works on the Great Kanawha and Kentucky rivers; also the bill to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned ordnance for railing around the monument to Col. Robert L. McCook, of the Ninth Ohio volunteers, at Cincinnati. There was a sharp partisan debate between Messrs. Thurman and Wallace on one side, and Messrs. Edmunds and Blaine on the other, regarding the conduct of the committee on alleged frauds in the late election, of which Mr. Wallace is Chairman, in publishing in pamphlet form a portion of the testimony, and sending it out for publication. Mr. Edmunds charged the committee with partisan unfairness. Mr. Thurman defended the action of the committee, and said they had only followed Republican precedent.——In the House, a few bills were introduced, among others one by Mr. Springer, prohibiting any soldier stationed within two miles of any place where a special or general election of Representative in Congress is being held from leaving his barracks for any purpose except that of relieving guard or casting his vote on the day of election. The bill for the appointment of a Mississippi River Commission, and appropriating $175,000 to meet its expenses, was passed. Columbus Upson, successor to the late Gustav Schleicher, was sworn in as Representative from the State of Texas, taking the modified oath. Mr. Wright, Chairman of the Labor Committee, moved to suspend the rules and adopt a resolution appropriating $3,000 for the expenses of that committee. Agreed to. A resolution was passed appropriating $20,000 to provide for representation of the United States at the International Exhibition to be held at Sidney and Melbourne, Australia, in 1879-'80.——The Republican Senators held a caucus for the purpose of taking action concerning Mr. Bayard's bill to repeal sections 820 and 821 Revised Statutes. The first of these sections prescribes the jurors' test oath. There was a practical unanimity of opinion in the caucus that this section should be repealed. The other section authorizes Judges of the United States courts to exercise their own discretion in regard to challenges of persons drawn as jurors who have participated in the Rebellion. The opinion of the caucus was that this section had never been abused, and is not likely to be, and, therefore, it should stand.

The Senate, on the 3d inst., passed the House bill establishing post routes, and the House bill extending the time for the payment of pre emptors on public lands in Minnesota and Dakota. In executive session of the Senate all the pending nominations, some 300 in number, appointments and promotions in the army, were confirmed en masse. The nomination of Secretary McCrary as Judge Dillon's successor was sent in by the President, and was referred in the usual course.——In the House, Mr. Cox made a speech in favor of the repeal of the jurors' test oath. No business was transacted whatever, the Republicans continuing their tactics to prevent consideration of the bill relative to the removal of cases from State to Federal courts.——The Democratic members of the House and Senate met in joint caucus in the afternoon to receive the report of the Joint Advisory Committee in regard to the appropriation bills. After several hours had been devoted to its consideration it was adopted with substantial unanimity. The appropriation bills, prepared in accordance with this plan, are to be reported without delay.

In the Senate, on the 4th inst., Mr. Bayard, from the Judiciary Committee, reported, with an amendment, the Senate bill repealing sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes (which prescribe the jurors' test oath, etc.). Ordered printed and placed on the calendar.——In the House, the Senate amendments to the House Grasshopper bill (extending the time of payment by pre-emptors) were agreed to, and the bill passed. A resolution was adopted directing an investigation into the affairs of the Ocean National Bank of New York and the German National Bank of Chicago. The report of the Committee for the Investigation of Expenditures in the State Department, in so far as it relates to George F. Seward, Minister to China, was referred to the Judiciary Committee for action. The House voted an appropriation of $9,235 to the widow of the late Representative Rush Clark, of Iowa, and $10,000 to the widow of the late Representative Gustav Schleicher, of Texas.

The bill reported by Mr. Bayard from the Judiciary Committee relating to juries and the repeal of sections 801, 820, and 821 of the Revised Statutes, was taken up by the Senate, on the 5th inst., and Messrs. Hampton and Bayard delivered speeches in support of the bill. Mr. Edmunds moved to amend the bill by adding the following: "That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as a grand or petit juror in any court of the United States or any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or examination of jurors who shall exclude or fail to examine any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined not more than $5,000." After a long and sharp debate, in which Messrs. Edmunds, Conkling, Blaine, Thurman and Hill were the chief participants, the amendment was voted down. Other amendments offered by the Republicans were also rejected. When the main question was reached a postponement was agreed to, at the request of Mr. Edmunds.——In the House, much time was consumed in consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Printing. A bill for the election of a Congressional Printer was reported but not admitted, the point of order being raised that it was not such a bill as the committee was privileged to report at any time. The bill to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious or contagious diseases among domestic animals, was discussed without action.——With a special message, the President sent to both houses of Congress the proceedings and report of the board of officers convened for the re-examination of the Fitz-John Porter case. The President says: "I have given to this report such an examination as satisfies me that I ought to lay the proceedings and conclusions of the board before Congress. I am without the power, in the absence of legislation, to act upon the recommendation of the report, further than submitting the same to * * * Congress, and for such action as in your wisdom shall seem expedient and just."

BUSINESS NOTES.

ST. JOSEPH, Mo., is making rapid progress in manufacturing industries.

THE strawberry crop of New Jersey this year promises to be unusually large.

ONLY five of the seventeen blast furnaces on the Upper Peninsula, Michigan, are in blast.

TITUSVILLE, Pa., is to have a new boomery for the manufacture of iron by the Eames process.

THE increase of cotton export at the port of New York this year is 38 per cent. over that of the same period last year.

TAKING into account the increased acreage in both winter and spring wheat, it is not improbable that the Kansas crop will reach the aggregate of last year, viz: over 32,000,000 bushels.

A DAKOTA journal says the business outlook in that section is most cheering. Farmers are full of encouragement, and a greater acreage than ever before will be harvested the coming year.

A MINNESOTA paper says: The most encouraging crop reports come in from all parts of the State. All accounts agree that the crops never looked better at this season than at present, and, unless something detrimental occurs, this year's will be the biggest crop which the State has ever produced."

Women's Work in Austria.

Women in Austria perform the duties of bricklayers, laborers, and may be seen carrying hods of mortar and baskets of bricks up high ladders. More than this, they actually supply the place of navvies, and dig and wheel barrows of "ballast" almost as nimbly as their lords. They chop wood, they carry water, they offer to black your boots in the street, and perform many other little offices, which, according to our notions, scarcely come under the denomination of "woman's work."

WAHPETON.

Sketch of a Flourishing Dakota Town—Its Surroundings and Advantages.

(Wahpeton (D. T.) Cor. of the Pioneer Press.)

This town is 217 miles from St. Paul, at the terminus of the main line of the St. Paul and Pacific railway, opposite and a little south of Breckinridge; the river bank being some fifteen or twenty feet higher than that on the Minnesota side. The entire county is high, arable prairie, beautifully drained by a series of streams and dry coolies, notably the Wild Rice, Antelope and Cheyenne rivers, with lateral creeks and coolies running into them. These streams are wooded, the Cheyenne notably so, the timber being of great extent and of very large growth. This county being at the head of the celebrated Red river valley, is, of course, the highest part of the valley, and best drained. The Wild Rice river is formed by a series of large, never-failing and never-freezing springs, thus making this county particularly valuable for agricultural purposes, as you have here good spring water, plenty of timber, and an abundance of rich, arable, open prairie land. The greatest advantage to the prospective settler is in the fact that only the northern part of the county is within railroad limits, and all of the land south and most of the town of Wahpeton, both odd and even sections, is Government land, and open to homestead, pre-emption, and tree-claim entry. It is quite largely settled now, principally by Americans and Germans, and is to-day receiving a larger emigration than any other part of the Red river valley, yet there is plenty of good Government land left there yet. It is fifty miles by rail nearer St. Paul than Fargo, and 105 miles near St. Paul than Crookston. The St. Paul and Pacific sell land explorer's tickets for Breckinridge (opposite Wahpeton), for about $6. Parties who think of going there to look at the land should get off at Breckinridge, and walk over to Wahpeton, a quarter of a mile. At Wahpeton there is a good opening for a general store, drug store, hardware store, boot and shoe store, and many other branches of trade not represented. There is a good church and new school house in process of erection. Deeded land quite near town can be bought in large or small quantities at from $3 to $5 per acre on long time at 7 per cent. interest. Adams & French, the Iowa agricultural machine men, and Mr. B. Magoffin, of St. Paul, are opening up large farms in this county near town, and matters both in town and country are "booming." The Hastings and Dakota division of the Milwaukee and St. Paul railroad, now built to Montevideo, will, without doubt, be extended north and west up through Richland county, and next year the St. Paul and Pacific will extend their lines west through the county, and land which can now be bought for $5 an acre will then readily bring from $10 to $15 per acre, simply a repetition of what has already occurred in Cass and Grand Forks counties. For new settlers, there is no county in the Red river valley presenting so many advantages as Richland, the only part of the valley where wood, water and prairie are combined, and Government land left anywhere near the railroad. Mr. J. Q. Burbank, the County Treasurer, will take pleasure in finding locations for new settlers and furnishing them with advice and assistance. Yours, "SISSETON."

NORTHERN PACIFIC BONDS.

Why the First Mortgage Seven-Thirty Bonds Should be Surrendered Immediately.

In answer to correspondent's inquiry, the New York Tribune of Saturday gives the following interesting information:

All outstanding Northern Pacific first mortgage 7-30 bonds should be surrendered immediately to the company, in exchange for its preferred stock. These bonds now outstanding have no value whatever as a mortgage security, as the mortgage was duly foreclosed in 1875, and the whole property and franchises of the company were sold under the plan of reorganization, which was agreed to by the bondholders assembled in meeting and confirmed by the United States Court. The time within which bondholders should be permitted to surrender their bonds and receive in exchange the preferred stock of the reorganized company was left to the discretion of the bondholders' purchasing committee. That committee has now fixed as a limit for the exchange of bonds for preferred stock, June 30, 1879, after which date the bonds outstanding will legally have no value whatever. It would, therefore, be simply suicidal for any holder of the old bonds to delay the exchange beyond the date named above. Every $1,000 bond with the corresponding coupons representing unpaid interest from July 1, 1873, will entitle the holder to $1,400 (that is, fourteen shares) of the preferred stock of the new organization, and that preferred stock is now selling in the market at twenty-eight cents on the dollar, that is $28 per share. The new company represented by this preferred stock is said to be entirely free from debt, has no interest burden to meet, and is earning a net revenue of over a half million dollars a year. The office of the company is No. 28 Fifth avenue, New York, by addressing which full information in regard to the transfer can no doubt be had. We have answered our correspondent's inquiry thus fully because there are probably many other Tribune readers to whom the information will be of value.

Sore Throat from Kissing Dogs.

The Medical News, of New York, calls attention to the disgusting habit which some people have of kissing dogs and cats. A correspondent has the following remarks to make of the habit: "The report of the epidemic at Darmstadt being concluded, allow me to make a remark as to its possible cause, one which I have not observed taken notice of in the correspondence on this singular outbreak of the disease. It is well known that women and children are in the habit of kissing pet cats and dogs, especially when these favorites are ill, with discharge from the nose, cough and sore throat, and even use their pocket handkerchiefs to wipe away the secretion. I have seen this done frequently. It is a common saying, 'There, the cat has got a cold; it will go through the house;' and, as this remark has been repeatedly fulfilled, it shows how careful people should be in avoiding contact with such a mode of contagion. I do not affirm that this was the way in which the disease was contracted either within or without the palace walls, but I feel sure the habit of kissing pets is a source of danger that should be widely known and prevented."

USE OF TROOPS.

Able Speech of Mr. McDonald, of Indiana.

Delivered in the Senate of the United States.

It has been sought, Mr. President, by the Republican party in and out of Congress, to stamp upon the controversy that has arisen over the effort that has been made to repeal the Federal election laws a sectional character, and to use it as a means of securing a solid North against what the Republican leaders are pleased to style a solid South. No effort has been made to defend these laws on any ground of principle, but the ablest champions of the Republican party have been employed in the endeavor to utilize sectional hate and to excite the fears and prejudices of the people of the Northern States against the people of the Southern States, while it is perfectly manifest that the North as a section is more interested in their repeal than the South. If the South has become solid it is because the maladministration of the Republican party in the Southern States has made it so; and in the nature of things it will continue to oppose with united front any party that shall seek to maintain political power in that section by attempting to govern it by placing ignorance over intelligence and subordinating civilization to barbarism. Withdraw the outside pressure that has encircled that section since the day that reconstruction began, and in a short time we shall have a divided South as well as a divided North, and political parties separated by geographical lines will soon be unknown to our politics.

Again, the advocates of these measures falsely charge that their repeal is a reactionary movement in favor of ultra State rights and would endanger the proper authority and power of the General Government. If by ultra State rights is meant the right of secession or nullification, it is not true that it is now or never was a Democratic doctrine, as it certainly ever was the principle of the Federal constitution. From the days of Thomas Jefferson to the present time the Democratic party as a party has ever maintained that the Federal Government, within the powers delegated to it by the Federal constitution, was supreme. They have only claimed what the constitution itself declares, that the powers not therein delegated to it nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States respectively and to the people: and the invasion of these reserved powers by the Federal Government is an unwarranted usurpation, as the nullification of the Federal authority by the State or by the people is an unauthorized rebellion. The Democratic party is no more chargeable with the views held by Mr. Calhoun and his followers than is the Republican party chargeable with like sentiments expressed in the Hartford Convention.

My objections to these laws, Mr. President, are, first, that they are in violation of the spirit, if not the letter of the constitution, by seeking to interfere with or control the primary right of the States over the people's Representatives; second, that they surround the election-polls in the States with the political emissaries of the administration, with power, if need be, to call to their assistance the military arm of the Government, under the pretense of keeping the peace at the polls; and, third, that this election machinery has been used, and if suffered to remain in force will be used again, for the mere purpose of securing party triumphs, and that this use is more to be feared throughout the Northern States than in any section of the Union. Take the election of 1878 as an illustration. In the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Ohio, it is safe to say that by the aid of these laws the Republican party was enabled to change the political complexion of at least ten Congressional districts. Without this aid the House of Representatives of the present Congress would have a Democratic majority of at least twenty, and by its use it is in the power of the administration to control the elections of members of Congress in every close or doubtful district in the United States. In the city of Philadelphia during the last election there was employed an army of Federal officers numbering 773 Deputy Marshals and 1,332 Supervisors of Election, at a cost to the people of $41,170, a force that was wholly unnecessary for any purposes of a free and fair election, as was shown by the testimony of the Marshal of that district in his examination before a committee of this body. The following is his testimony on that point:

By Mr. Hoar:

Question. I suppose you have had large experience in the city of Philadelphia. Are you a native of that city?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was born in that city.

Q. And lived there all your days?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In your judgment, would those elections have been safe from disorder and fraud without the precautions which you have described?

A. I believe they would.

Q. Without the precautions you have described? Suppose there had been no supervision or guarding by the Deputy Marshals, do you think there would have been danger of disorder or fraud in the elections?

A. In some localities there would, in others there would not. I think, as far as the appointment of Supervisors and United States Marshals for the city of Philadelphia is concerned, the city could do without them very well. She could protect herself without the law, as far as Philadelphia is concerned.

In the city of New York a still larger force at a still greater cost was employed, as has been repeatedly shown in this debate. In the city of Cincinnati two Congressional districts were controlled by Federal emissaries, and the people cheated out of their choice. In the State of Massachusetts more money was paid out by the public treasury to control the elections than in all the States lately in rebellion. Will her Senators in this Chamber say that this was necessary to secure a free and fair election of members of Congress? If not, for what purpose was this Federal machinery brought into play in that State? I suppose there can be but one answer to that question It was to prevent the people of Massachusetts from selecting for their Governor a certain person, well known to the history of this country, who made himself obnoxious to the political leaders of that State.

Gen. Butler is no personal or political favorite of mine, yet he is a man of great ability and is a citizen of Massachusetts. The people of that State had the right to choose him for their Governor, but the leaders of the Republican party did not think so and consequently foreign aid was called in to control the popular will. Deputy Marshals were appointed; United States Supervisors were appointed, and the people were taxed to defray the expenses incurred in defeating them of their choice. All this was done under the false pretense of providing for a free and fair election. The effect, therefore, of these laws, as already demonstrated by their practical working, is to interfere in State elections as well as to place it in the power of the Federal administration to subordinate the popular branch of the Federal Congress to the control of the executive department of the Government, and to aid in his purpose the Executive is vested with almost unlimited control over the military power of the country, with direct authority to station troops at the polls under pretense of keeping the peace.

The President of the United States is "Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy of the United States." It a fundamental principle of free government that the military should be held in strict subordination to civil authority. It was one of the specific grounds of complaint by the colonies against the King of Great Britain "that he had affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power." The principle of making the military strictly subordinate to the civil power was scrupulously guarded by the fathers of the republic. There are three classes of cases in which a use of the military is not only proper, but often indispensable; they are, first, to repel invasion; second, to enforce the laws of the United States; third, to aid a State in suppressing insurrection against its authority, or to put down domestic violence.

The power of the Executive to use the army as its military commander to repel invasion has never been restricted, but has been left to his discretion. An armed invasion by a public enemy is war, and must be met at once by military power, and every President has been authorized to use it and vested with the power to decide on its necessity. But not so in the other two cases. The President is not a magistrate with authority to issue processes and precepts; there is another department of the Government clothed with that power—the judicial department, and, while it is made his duty to take care "that the laws be faithfully executed," it is not right to clothe him with the authority to decide upon the question of their execution; and, therefore, in the earlier statutes regulating this duty it was expressly provided that, when the laws of the United States were opposed in any State by a combination too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the Marshals, the President, upon receiving official information of that fact from an Associate Justice—that is, one of the Supreme Judges—or the District Judge of proper district, was authorized to call in the aid of the military power to suppress such combinations and to cause the laws to be executed. So, when in any State there should be an insurrection against the Government thereof, it was lawful for the President, on the application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive when the Legislature could not be convened, to use the military force of the United States to suppress such insurrection. And, during the nullification excitement of 1832-'33, when it was thought necessary to clothe the President with what was regarded extraordinary powers to meet the exigency of the case, the statutes were carefully drawn to guard against the exercise of any arbitrary power on his part by requiring him to be officially informed by the authorities of the State, or by the proper Federal Judge, of the existence of the facts creating the necessity for military aid, and the duration of the authority conferred was expressly limited in the act. The act of July 29, 1861, still upon our statute-books, was the first broad departure from these principles and vested in the President dictatorial powers. It is as follows:

Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all of the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed.

It will be seen that the power to judge of the exigency is vested in the President, and not in the courts nor in the State authorities. As President he decides and as Commander-in-Chief of the army he executes, so that the judicial and civil as well as military authority in the premises is vested in the one department of government—the executive. It may be said that this act was passed during flagrant war and as a war measure. This may have justified its passage; it may have also justified the continuance of this power during the war; but it forms no justification for vesting such powers perpetually in the one department of government, the head of which is also the military chief of the country. During the war this great power was not only exercised by the President, but by military commanders in various localities, as shown by numerous military orders issued in loyal as well as disloyal sections of the country, and was frequently leveled at persons whose only offense consisted in their opposition to the political measures of the administration. Under it, or in misuse of it, elections were interfered with and the military used to control them in the interest of the Republican party. I have heard it said in this Chamber that the military had never been used to control elections in this country. In my State, in 1864, a regiment of Massachusetts volunteers stationed at Indianapolis were permitted to leave their encampment on the day of election, and, with arms in their hands, suffered to surround the polls and not only exclude citizens from voting but were permitted to vote themselves, a privilege that they used most freely. This was done in my own view, and I saw these non-resident armed men insult and drive from the polls citizens of the State as loyal as themselves. Similar scenes were enacted in other parts of the State, as I have good reason to know.

These and other like abuses induced the passage of the act of 1865, by which it was made "unlawful for any military or naval officer of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military or naval service of the United States, to order, bring, or keep or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election was held in any State of the United States of America, unless it shall be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States." So read the bill as introduced by its author, Senator Powell, of Kentucky, but, by the Republican majority in the Senate, it was amended by adding these important words, "or to keep the peace at the polls." The Republican party, then as now, were unwilling to give up the power of exercising, through their President, military supervision over the elections. In 1871 an act was passed entitled "An act to enforce the provisions of the Fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, and for other purposes."

The third section of this act has been changed by the revisers and carried into the Revised Statutes as a general law. It is section 5,299, and is the third section under the title "Insurrection." As revised it confers upon the President the most absolute power in the use of the military in suppressing insurrections in the States and in enforcing the laws of the United States, making him the sole judge of the exigency and relieving him from any control on the part of any other department of the Government or from any State or local authority, so that, instead of returning to constitutional and regular methods of civil government when the war was over, the Republican party has added to the powers of the President even beyond what was thought necessary during the most urgent necessities of the civil war, so that we now have upon the statute-books laws that not only authorize and permit an unwarrantable interference in popular elections, but, what is more dangerous still, powers slumbering there capable of being exerted in establishing a military dictatorship.

The purpose of the bill I have had the honor to introduce is to aid in securing such just reforms as will relieve the country from the danger or apprehensions of danger of the exercise of arbitrary power by the President in the use of the military arm of the Government, and to place that arm under control of proper civil authority without crippling the President in any proper use of it, and, by repealing all Federal laws relating to the manner of holding elections for members of Congress, to remit to the people and the States once more the right to free elections under their own laws. These objects the Democratic party has endeavored to accomplish by the various measures which it has sought to pass into the forms of law and which have been so strenuously opposed by the Republican party in this and the last sessions of Congress. No more important question has ever engaged the attention of the people of this country in the time of peace. It involves no less an issue than this: Are our people, after passing through a civil war which taxed their energies to the utmost, and in which, for war purposes, they clothed their Executive with a most absolute power, capable, when the war is over, of re-establishing the civil administration of the Government by applying once more the checks and balances so necessary to secure popular rights; or will they, for the benefits and advantages that parties may derive from the exercise of such arbitrary power, suffer it to remain as a permanent part of our political system?

Our people have shown themselves equal to many emergencies and vindicated their capacity for self-government, and for maintaining the guarantees of civil liberty on many occasions, and in my opinion they will do so now. The Republican party, in its opposition to these necessary reforms, has made itself the champion of arbitrary power and of Federal interference in the elections, and in the end will be beaten. It is not a mere contest between the Democratic party on the one hand and the Republican party on the other, nor is it a controversy between the North and the South; it is a contest between the Republican party in its effort to retain the control of the Government and the people in their endeavor to re-establish the principles of a just, representative republic. Every man in this country whose political future is not bound up in the success of the Republican party is in favor of these reforms, and in the contest to secure them the Democratic party is but the mouth-piece and organ of the people, and no blunders or mistakes which it can make in its efforts to secure these reforms can cause their ultimate defeat.

I know it is a favorite saying among Republican leaders that they have been enabled to maintain power heretofore on account of the mistakes made by the Democratic party, but this is very far from being true, although from time to time they may have profited by such mistakes. I ask my Republican friends to look back over the past. At the close of the war their party was in power in all the Northern States, and they held the Southern States as conquered provinces and molded them in their reconstruction policy as the potter molds the clay in his hands. The people felt grateful to the Republican party because under its auspices the Rebellion had been put down and the territorial integrity of the country preserved. It is true that, on every battle-field, the Democrats of the Northern States stood side by side with Republicans in support of the Union. In my own State the roll of the living and the dead will show a Democrat of the rank and file for every Republican, and, among the most honored of the Democrats of Indiana, are to be found the names of Manson, Love, Gray, Slack, Shaw, Williams, and a host of others; yet the Democratic party, because it insisted upon being true to its principles in opposing such political measures of the Republican party as it is believed to be wrong, was charged with disloyalty.

Fourteen years have passed away. How stands the case now? This arrogant and imperious Republican party is in a minority in both branches of Congress, is in a minority in every State in the Union but four, and holds the executive power of this Government by commission of a political crime and against a popular majority of over 250,000 votes, and has no hope in the future except in its bad effort to array one section of the country against another. It requires no prophet to foretell its downfall, for it has been "weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Terrible Cyclone.

A tornado marked by terrible death and destruction recently swept over a wide stretch of country, beginning in Western Missouri and extending over a portion of Northern Kansas and Southern Nebraska. The town of Irving, Kan., was nearly destroyed. At that point the storm took on the character of a cyclone, and leveled everything in its path. About forty buildings were destroyed, fifteen persons killed, and over forty wounded, many beyond hope of recovery. In the neighborhood of Frankfort, Kan., four or five farm-houses were blown over and several persons injured, and in the town several houses were destroyed. At Beatty, Kan., a number of houses were demolished. At Centralia, Kan., several houses were unroofed, and one house and barn blown down, trees uprooted, fences laid flat, and great damage done to crops. At Dennison Mills, Neb., a Catholic church was blown down, several houses damaged, and one lady severely injured. At Manhattan, Kan., a store in which fifteen people had taken refuge from the storm was blown down, and a woman and child killed. Near Lee's Summit, Mo., the house of Mr. Warren was totally destroyed. Two members of the family were killed and others severely wounded. The house of Alexander Scroggs was unroofed. His wife's skull was fractured. The houses of Dr. Dunnington and Mr. Underwood were destroyed, but their families escaped unharmed. The residence of Mr. Hutchins was torn to pieces, and the family badly hurt. A son of J. H. Warden was carried through the air a distance of 100 yards and when consciousness returned he found himself in a small stream. While going through the air he saw his small brother still higher than himself, and it is supposed that he must have been thrown still further, but when found after the disaster he was returning to the house, which was nothing but a mass of debris. In falling he was impaled on a stick of broken furniture that penetrated to the depth of two and one-half inches into his thigh, inflicting a painful but not dangerous wound. The house of Mr. Harris, near Blue Springs, was demolished. Mr. Harris, his wife and little girl were killed, and three other children mortally wounded. Mr. Harris was lifted high up into the air, carried about 200 feet in the course the storm moved, and then dashed to the earth, while his wife and child were carried about the same distance in an opposite direction. One of the other children was found in a pool, fifty yards from the house, with a large bunch of wet straw and grass wrapped so tightly around his head and shoulders that it could only be removed with great difficulty. The child was but slightly injured, his escape being attributed to the mysterious bandage around him. At this point the storm-cloud burst, but came together again almost instantly with a terrific crash, bounded from the earth, came down again near the dwelling of Mr. Gore, which it passed through, leaving its side walls standing. At Delphos, Kan., five persons were killed in one house. Fifteen dead bodies were brought in from two square miles of territory. One man was taken up in his wagon, thrown to the ground again, and instantly killed. A woman and child were thrown against a wire fence and killed. The track of the tornado throughout its entire length and breadth was marked by death and destruction. Buildings were swept away as if they had been made of paper, trees uprooted, grain cribs, fences and crops destroyed, and horses and cattle killed. The storm in all its phases lasted about two hours. It was intensely dark, and the force of the wind was perfectly resistless. When a house was struck it was totally demolished. The people could give no intelligible account further than that there was a crash and then everything flew into the air as soon as possible. Everything that the central portion came in contact with was either destroyed or scattered promiscuously. Large trees were uprooted, roots, dirt and all, and were carried hundreds of feet. As an evidence of its terrible force it laid a stone fence level with the ground, and in some cases throwing stones of one and a half cubic feet a distance of 200 feet. The persons who were caught by it were in nearly all cases stripped of their clothing, and were so completely besmeared with mud that other persons were unable to recognize them until they spoke.

Anti-Tramp Legislation.

The New York Legislature has followed the example of that of Pennsylvania, and passed a Tramp law which imposes not less than a year's imprisonment on "all transient persons who rove about from place to place." The act is so drawn as to put the burden of proof on the accused person, and under it any stroller can be required to show that he is not a tramp. Trespass, kindling a fire on the highway or on any premises without consent, carrying firearms, or threatening to do any injury to any one, are made punishable by this law with two years' imprisonment in the case of tramps, while any resident of a town where an offense is committed is empowered to make arrests. The last provisions render the law more stringent than that in Pennsylvania and in no small degree make it self-enforcing.—Springfield Republican.

The California Constitutional Convention was in session 157 days, and cost several hundred thousand dollars. The session was to have been limited to 100 days, but it was impossible to complete the work within that time, and $150,000 more than was apportioned for the purpose was consumed for the pay of the members and the convention's running expenses.

A NEW ELDORADO.

A Sketch of Leadville, the Newest Product of the Mining Fever.

[From the Atlantic Monthly.]

California gulch, in which or on which, the new town of Leadville is growing up, lies at right angles to the Arkansas valley, and about twelve miles from the headwaters of the Arkansas river. It was a wild gulch, its sides growing thick with spruce forests, and a little snow-fed creek making its way down among them. But the waters of the creek held gold, and men soon found it out, cut down the spruce forests, and began placer mining all along the sides of the gulch. They are torn up and riddled to-day as if an earthquake had shaken them violently. All this while, in the stony mountains at the head of the gulch, lay stores untold of solid silver, of which the miners lower down, working for gold sands by the handful, never so much as dreamed. It is the old story of treasure biding the time of the man who knows its secret. One day, a man who knew one stone from another picked up a bit of mineral and handed it slyly and significantly to his comrade, saying nothing. The comrade, experienced in the ways of mines, took it, saying nothing, and pocketed it. The gulch was full of men; there were those working by their side to whom one word might be a hint. Later, alone, the two comrades conversed with each other on the subject of this bit of stone. They took cautious and secret rambles over the mountain side. They said not one word to anybody for two years, but quietly possessed themselves largely of lands. To-day in one mine which these two men own, you may see, it is said $6,000,000 worth of silver; not infer it, trust, hope, believe it, from the "dip," or "bearing," or "vein," as is usually the case in silver mines, but see it; the walls of the galleries are it! The miners simply chop the walls down, foot by foot, and wheel out the ore in barrows.

And the whole range is believed to be full of the precious metal. It is the western slope of the mountains lying back of Fair Play, on whose eastern slopes many profitable mines have been worked for years. It is odd that miners did not at once think if one side of a mountain were made of silver the other was likely to be. But they did not; and so the Leadville silver bided its time.

The town is a marvel. In six months a tract of dense spruce forest has been converted into a bustling village. To be sure the upturned roots and the freshly-hacked stumps of many of the spruce trees are still in the streets of the town; fallen spruce trees, too, on which you can sit down to rest, and here and there clumps of superb tall ones standing, which afford a most grateful protection from Colorado's hot May sun—the sun which made that mud I spoke of at the top of Weston's pass. Great spaces of scorched sage brush are to be seen, its gray stalks looking as twisted as if they had been wrung out wet and thrown down to dry. Great spaces covered with chips, also; nobody had time to pick up his chips, and they are handy to burn; the houses are all log cabins, or else plain, unpainted board shanties. Some of the cabins seem to burrow in the ground; others are set up on posts, like roofed bedsteads. Tents, wigwams of boughs, wigwams of bare poles, with a blackened spot in front, where somebody slept last night, but will never sleep again; cabins wedged in between stumps; cabins built on stumps; cabins with chimneys made of flower pots or bits of stovepipe—I am not sure but out of old hats; cabins half roofed; cabins with sail-cloth roofs; cabins with no roof at all—this represents the architecture of the Leadville homes. The Leadville places of business are another thing; there is one compact, straight street, running east and west, in the center of this medley of sage brush, spruce stumps, cabins and shanties. Here are shops, restaurants, billiard-rooms, dance halls, banks, lawyers' offices, hotels, livery stables—all that a town needs. There are fairly-built wooden houses, principally of the battlement-front style, and one story high—a few of them two stories high—and not without some pretence of finish; the platforms and steps in front of them make one continuous line of lounging grounds for Leadville men. I counted forty-six at one time in a short distance, men either leaning against door posts, or sitting with their elbows on their knees. The middle of the street was always filled with groups of men talking. Wagons were driven up and down as fast as if the streets were clear. It looked all the time as if there had been a fire and the people were just about dispersing, or as if a town meeting was just over. Everybody was talking, nearly everybody gesticulating. All faces looked restless, eager, fierce. It was a Monaco gambling-room emptied into a Colorado spruce clearing.

Do the Dying Suffer Pain?

People do not like to think of death. It is an unpleasant subject; but it constantly obtrudes itself, and there has been much speculation as to whether mental or physical pain attends the final act. Observation teaches us that there is little pain of either kind in dying. Experience will come to us all one of these days, but it will come too late to benefit those who remain. It seems to be a kind provision of nature that, as we approach the dread event, our terrors diminish, and the coward and the hero die alike—fearless, indifferent or resigned. As to physical pain, Dr. Edward H. Clark, in "Visions," says:

"The rule is that unconsciousness, not pain, attends the final act. To the subject of it death is no more painful than birth. Painlessly we come; whence we know not. Painless we go; whither we know not. Nature kindly provides an anæsthetic for the body when the spirit leaves it. Previous to that moment and in preparation for it, respiration becomes feeble, generally slow and short, sudden expirations, so that the blood is steadily less and less oxygenated. At the same time the heart acts with corresponding debility, producing a slow, feeble and often irregular pulse. As this process goes on, the blood is not only driven to the head with diminished force and in less quantity, but what flows there is loaded more and more with carbonic acid gas, a powerful anæsthetic, the same as that derived from charcoal. Subject to its influence the nerve centers lose consciousness and sensibility, apparent sleep creeps over the system; then comes stupor, and then the end."

HE KNEW 'EM.

How an American Gentleman Was Intimate with All the Royal Family.

The London correspondent of Harper's Bazar says the royal family always bow to any one who salutes them, and, apropos of this, an amusing story has been told by a New Yorker, who found himself driving along the pretty country road leading to Chiswick one summer's evening in company with another gentleman; the latter, having just come abroad for the first time, was new to all English impressions and formalities. A grand garden party had been given, earlier in the afternoon, by the Princess of Wales, and, the guests having all returned to London, the road was somewhat deserted. As Mr. A—— and his friend bowled along, an open carriage came down the road toward them, containing two ladies dressed alike in black and white silk, with violet-wreathed bonnets, and faces that proclaimed them to be sisters. Mr. A—— lifted his hat, and the ladies smiled most agreeably, and bowed politely. "What pretty women!" exclaimed his companion. "You know them? Who are they?" "Only the Princess of Wales and her sister," replied Mr. A——, carelessly. A cloud of dust, and next came a dog cart, driven by a stout, handsome gentleman, by whose side sat the dark-haired, good-looking Czarowitz; again the same affable exchange of salutes. "Wales and his brother-in-law are passing," said A——, in passing. The rolling of more carriage wheels announced a victoria, in which sat the pretty young Princess Beatrice and the Marchioness of Lorne; a pleasant smile and bow from the latter, rather a haughty glance and brief inclination of the head from the former. "Beatrice and Louise," said A—— to his astonished companion, who had no time to speak before the landau of Princess Mary of Teck appeared, her stout Royal Highness smiling, as usual, with the most winning sweetness as she returned Mr. A——'s bow. Even the two ladies opposite her bowed prettily, and the gay-looking Duke of Teck, who came next in a T cart with the Duke of Edinburgh, gave a most sweeping return to Mr. A——'s salute. One royal name after another being uttered to Mr. A——'s companion, the latter broke out with: "Well, A——, I have heard Americans were well thought of over here, but only fancy how quickly you've got acquainted with the whole royal family. I wish I could have been introduced." Not until some weeks later, and finding himself in the park, and seeing how all the hats were lifted, and every one bowed to, did Mr. A——'s companion discover that his friend's intercourse with the royal family was a "bowing acquaintance" only.

Are Rattlesnakes Poison-Proof

A colored man went rushing into Scott's store, stating that he had "treed a rattlesnake in a gopher hole." This was fun for the boys. In a few minutes a party headed by Mr. Scott set out for the snake. On arriving at the place, sure enough it was found quietly sleeping on the back of the gopher. Mr Scott fastened two strong trout-hooks to the end of a long pole, and, hooking the reptile, held him firmly until he could be dug out. Cotton saturated with chloroform was then held to his mouth until he was insensible. He was then taken up to the store, restoratives applied, and soon he was in fighting trim. His mouth was then forced open and an ounce of hydrocyanic acid forced down his throat. Instead of being instantly killed, as all expected, the snake did not seem to mind the dose at all, but sprung from the box he had been placed in, and was ready for fight. Mr. Scott then, drawing his pistol, shot him dead. One drop of prussic acid placed on the tongue of a dog, it is said, will produce instant death; in this case an ounce had no effect on the snake. It is an interesting subject for investigation. —Quincy (Fla.) Star.

Hardly Ever.

A lady was entertaining at dinner a stranger who had brought a letter of introduction to her husband, and at the end of the meal coffee was served. The lady asked her guest if he took sugar with his coffee; he replied, "O. never, madam; that is to say, hardly ever, unless the coffee is very poor." A few minutes later he said, "Will you please give me a little sugar?"

It is a curious fact that the sale of books in San Francisco is not now as great as it was when the population of the city was much smaller. The San Francisco State says that within the last two years three of the largest retail book houses have gone out of the business, and those remaining complain of reduced sales. It is another curious fact that, in the "godless early days," the sales of religious books in California were far greater than they are now. Popular science, on the booksellers' shelves, seems to have taken the place of religion.

The Rev. W. T. Eustis, in a sermon at the Yale Theological Seminary, urged the need of more practical teaching in applied theology. He said that he had a Bible class of young men, among whom were several bank clerks, and he recently put to them the question: "If funds were intrusted to you as trustee, would you have a right to invest them in a savings bank, and take the interest to your own use?" Several replied that it would be perfectly legitimate.

Henry Young killed his wife at Pittsfield, Mass., and his insanity was so clearly proved that he was sent to an asylum. His own opinion was that he deserved to be hanged, and one morning he was found suspended by the neck with strips of bedclothes, dead.

INDIANA ITEMS.

Scarlet fever is decimating the children of Evansville.

New Albany has sold New Harmony a hand fire engine at $250.

A 7-year-old daughter of William Miller was fatally gored by a cow at Fort Wayne lately.

Over 300 head of sheep have been killed by dogs in Floyd, Harrison and Clark counties in the past two or three weeks.

The fifteenth annual convention of the Indiana Sunday School Union will be held at Richmond, June 25, 26 and 27.

Victor Emery has sued the city of Fort Wayne for $5,000 damages because he broke his leg on a defective sidewalk.

The Louisville, New Albany and Chicago railroad is receiving large quantities of rails from the Indianapolis rolling-mills to relay its track.

A sensation in Brown county is the elopement of James Fleetwood, aged 53 years, with a Miss Thompson, aged 16. Fleetwood leaves a family behind him.

Great preparations are being made for commencement at the State University, which comes off June 11, this being the fiftieth anniversary of that institution.

There is said to be trouble ahead for the people of Scott county. The County Commissioners have ordered the building of an expensive poor asylum, and the people cannot afford the cost.

The enumeration of school children for some of the principal towns of the State is as follows: Lafayette, 6,307; South Bend, 3,712; Crawfordsville, 1,727; Bloomington, 845; La Porte, 3,462; Michigan City, 1,974; Franklin, 958; Madison, 5,540; Noblesville, 741; Muncie, 1,586; Lawrenceburg, 1,680; Brazil, 978.

The sixty-second annual meeting of the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, at Indianapolis, last week, elected the following officers: Most Worthy Grand Master, Bellamy J. Sutton; Deputy Grand Master, C. W. Prather; Senior Warden, Bruce Carr; Junior Grand Warden, Albert P. Charles; Grand Treasurer, Charles Fisher; Grand Secretary, William M. Smythe.

The School Apportionment.

The Superintendent of Public Instruction has just filed his semi-annual apportionment of the State common-school revenue for tuition, and the enumeration of school children by counties, together with the total collections and the amounts apportioned, will be found below:

In his empirical frame of mind, Lord Beaconsfield, when in the Commons, was always heard at his worst. At his best he was incomparable. As a phrase-maker, a man who can, with a combination of two or three words, label, and, to some extent, lame an adversary, Disraeli had no equal. His passion, rarely indulged in, seemed always funny and feigned. But his polished shafts of sarcasm, his feathered darts of wit and irony flew about the House at will and never missed their mark. This gift he retained to the last, though as he became more prosperous his manner became more benign.

Auburn Courier.
AUBURN, INDIANA, JUNE 12, 1879.
THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY, EDITORS.

The able speech of Senator McDonald of Indiana, on the "use of troops," will be found on the 3d page of this paper. Read what the Indiana statesman has to say.

In the band tournament held at Muncie, Ind, recently, the following bands were victors:

Class 1—Capital prize of $200, Currier's band, Cincinnati.

Class 2—Prize of $150, Female band, of Indianapolis.

Class 3—Prize of $100, Union City band.

Class 4—Prize of $100, Jonesboro band.

Class 5—Prize of $50, Selma band.

Class 5—Second Premium—Prize $25, Daleville band.

The Republican says "the citizens of Auburn are anxious to know something about the finances of the town." For the information of our cotemporary we will say that "the citizens of Auburn" read the report of the town officers in the COURIER of May 1st, 1879, and the voters indicated on May 5th, that the reports gave entire satisfaction. As to the school board, the report will be made to the county commissioners as the law requires; we are informed, however, that the school board does not owe one cent.

Murray, the burglar who was sentenced to the penitentiary for four years, and who was brought to this county by the sheriff of Whitley county, a few Sundays ago, has since made his escape from the Whitley county jail in some mysterious way. Murray was brought to this county to point out the place where stolen goods were secreted, and the officers claimed that they had "got what they came for." It is said that some woman made the assertion, at Columbia City, that she had $3,000 that said Murray would not be taken to the penitentiary. A reward is offered for the prisoner.

Those of our citizens who were mentioned last week as having gone to Logansport to meet George Hazzard in a criminal prosecution, did not have the pleasure of meeting slippery George, he having jumped the town before the arrival of our citizens. Nothing was done in the case, except that the Auburn parties were required to give bond in the sum of $500 each, for their appearance at the September term of the Cass county court. Since then Hazzard has commenced a civil suit in the same court, against the same parties, for $10,000 damages. We have not space for further comment this week, but hope to be able to give full particulars in our next issue.

In the case of the State vs. Benjamin Gaskill, charged with drawing and threatening to use deadly weapons, the defendant was fined $10.00 which he refused to pay, preferring to go to jail. Application was made to the county commissioners to have the prisoner put at hard labor, whereupon Benjamin concluded to replevy the judgement, which including costs amounted to about $75.00. Alexander Hurraw and Stephen H. Ensley went his bail. Our space will not allow a full statement of the evidence in the case. We only add that the trouble was caused by a neighborhood quarrel, and in all such cases all parties are more or less at fault.

At the Elkhart decoration day exercises, week before last, Milo S. Hascall, of Goshen, was the orator, and his numerous political allusions, at such an unbefitting time, have elicited much comment by the press. These remarks, by the Ligonier Banner, we regard as entirely apropos:

"Milo S. Hascall, who is 'hardly ever' expected to talk fifteen minutes in public without exhibiting his assinine qualities, had the effrontery and meanness to deliver a senseless partisan harangue on the occasion of decorating the soldiers' graves at Elkhart. While such contemptible twaddle might reasonably have been expected from an empty-headed blatherskite like Hascall, we are surprised that a sense of propriety did not impel the parties having charge of the decoration ceremonies to put a stop to the fellow's venomous ranting against a great political party, which to-day constitutes an overwhelming majority of the American people."

A Tooter.

The act of our general assembly in regard to the blowing of locomotive whistles at road crossings, approved March 20, is about the sickest attempt to remedy an old law that we have ever observed; it is a clear case of "out of the frying-pan into the fire," and if the country at large and the legislature itself does not soon so regard it, we will renounce all our claims to the possession of average horse-sense. Here is the subject matter—Listen: "It shall be the duty of all railroad companies, operating in this state, to have attached to every locomotive engine a whistle, such as is now in use or may be hereafter used by all well-managed railroad companies, and the engineers or other persons in charge of or operating such engine upon the line of any such railroad, shall, when such engine approaches the crossing of any turnpike or other public highway in this state, and when such engine is not less than eighty nor more than one hundred rods from such crossing, sound the whistle on such engine attached thereto, continuously, from the time of sounding such whistle until such engine shall have fully passed such crossing."

The object of this law, if it has any, was evidently to avoid accidents at crossings, but we venture to say, prompted by personal observation thus far, that there will be ten accidents hereafter where there was but one in the past, at least so long as such a nuisance can be sustained and tolerated by the people whom it afflicts. The old custom of simply ringing the bell while passing crossings was amply sufficient to warn all persons who might be near the crossing, and, in view of the fact that even the ringing of the bell has a tendency to frighten horses, some question might arise as to whether it might not be better to abolish that. People generally, nowadays, in a country where railroads form a perfect network, are on the alert when crossing railway tracks, though of course occasional cases of carelessness are to be found. However frequent these may be, when comparing the almost inevitable increase of accidents that will be occasioned—when considering the constant din in the ears of railway passengers, and the general discomfiture of everybody who lives in the neighborhood of a railroad, or in a railroad town,—weighing all these disadvantages in the balance, as against the customary method, the new "tooting law" is, to say the least, abominable.

In reference to the election of county superintendent, the Press of last week says:

"A number of other republicans were candidates and had friends on the board; but as the COURIER had insisted that politics should enter into the of a superintendent, the republican trustees came together and agreed upon a candidate they could all support, and carried the day. Mr. Eares received the entire vote of his party, for the fifth term, and it is not too much to say that, under other circumstances, he would have been again elected."

Concerning the same, the Garrett Herald man chips in, as follows:

"Had the democracy kept quiet upon the subject, and not offered an insult, through their county organ, to the republicans who voted for Mr. B. upon several similar occasions, the manner of conducting the election would, in all probability, have been different. As the democrats desired the party vote tested, the republicans felt disposed to gratify them, and before the election, met in caucus and nominated Mr. McIntosh who was elected by one majority."

It will be remembered that we did not mention the appointment of county superintendent, until the 3d of April, one month after the republicans had taken advantage of the death of a democratic trustee, and appointed a republican to fill the vacancy, for the express purpose of appointing a republican county superintendent.

The charge that the COURIER was the first to intimate that politics should be considered in the election of a superintendent, is false in every particular; though we would not be ashamed of it, if true; for there is no reason why each party cannot, with as much propriety, present a candidate for county superintendent, as for state superintendent of public instruction; one is just as proper as the other. Those who are continually harping about making school appointments without regard to politics, are the very fellows who will slip one of their own party into office at every opportunity, just as was done in the case in question. Can it be denied that the appointment, of a successor to Mr. Greenwood, trustee of Franklin township, almost before the deceased was cold in death, was a trick of the republican party of this county to secure the office of county superintendent? Why such haste, if nothing was at stake? The trick was too transparent; every person knew that the republicans intended to whip every trustee of their party into the support of a republican, though the scheme came near failing, owing to one of the trustees trying to dodge the republican caucus, to avoid pledging himself to vote for any certain candidate; he was finally captured, however, and compelled to do that which the Press condemned publicly, and that which its editor sanctioned privately. So far as we are concerned, we care not who is superintendent, but the COURIER will always be found supporting a democrat, if qualified for the position, rather than a republican, for that or any other office, from the president down to road supervisor, whether there is a possibility of success or not.

—Cyrus Cline was re-elected by the township trustees for county superintendent.

—Several of the young men of this place spent the Sabbath in Waterloo.

—Business was terribly dull last Saturday.

—Louis Bohn, of Waterloo, was in town on Monday.

—Prof. E. B. Smith, of Freemont, was in town one day this week.

—Several of the saloon keepers have been disappointed in procuring liquor licenses this term of commissioners' court.

—A man by the name of Wm Noyes, brother to Hon. E. B. Noyes, committed suicide last Thursday evening by taking strychnine. He was a widower and had one boy. Domestic difficulties was the cause of the rash act. He was about 50 years old. GOLA.

St. Joe.

—Frost Saturday morning.

—Not much prospect for corn; wheat and oats above the average.

—At the St. Joe elevator wheat is worth $1.06, oats 27 cents, and corn 35 cents. During the month of May, 8,000 bushels of wheat and 6,000 bushels of oats were shipped from this place; and the shipments for the year ending May 31st, were 65,000 bushels of wheat and oats.

—Died, June 6, of Bright's disease of the kidneys, Thomas Johnson, of Concord township. Funeral services were held in the grove at Widney's Corners, Sunday, June 8.

—The Dunkards have been holding a series of meetings, at the Sodom schoolhouse, which continued Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

—Alex. Filley, of Newville, proposes to make St. Joe his future residence, having bought property and moved his family recently. We look to see Newville abandoned, one of these days, entirely.

—Sealed proposals for the building of a church in St. Joe will be received by the committee until June 21.

—Tommy Ables has finally conquered, and, after the third trial, made the raise of the necessary papers and was hitched in the matrimonial harness Sunday morning last, Rev. Oviatt, of Newville, performing the ceremony. We learn that Tommy and Jennie will take a trip over the B. & O. on Pete's hand-car, to celebrate the happy affair. They have our best wishes for a shining life and many Able blessings.

—J. S., of Coburn Corners, must learn to pay his saw-mill bills promptly or stay away from Antwerp, Ohio, as changing his name doesn't pay. So says the firm of Champion Bros.

—J. S. France, having sold his interest in the saw-mill to Bleeks & Filley, proposes to have another mill here in the course of a month or six weeks. Success to you, Joe; "the more the merrier."

—A certain would-be prominent man, not a thousand miles away from our little village, has been trying to make himself more conspicuous of late by circulating a remonstrance to one of St. Joe's petitioned improvements, which latter would be not only a benefit to St. Joe, but to a large scope of country south of the river, equal to, if not larger, than all of the town of Concord. It is not the increase of taxes which pinches those who started the remonstrance, but something else, which we propose to give a little airing one of these days.

Still Victorious.

Many years have passed since Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder was first offered to the public; and its superiority over all Baking Powders for making wholesome, light, sweet bread and biscuits has been established. Still victorious, standing to-day in the estimation of thousands as the only safe and reliable powder.

—Fred Davis returned last evening from Bloomington, where he has been attending college. He looks well and wears the same smile as of old.

OBITUARY.

Mrs. Emily L. Duck was born Sept. 20, 1842, in what was then Richland county, Ohio, and with her parents emigrated to Goshen, Indiana, in 1858. She was united in marriage to Martin L. Duck, November 11, 1860, and departed this life June 6, 1879, aged 35 years, 8 months and 6 days, leaving her husband and six children to mourn her loss. She professed faith in the Lord Jesus Christ and was baptised into the Baptist church of this place, October 9, 1870. She was a loving and affectionate mother, a devoted companion, a kind neighbor, and lived a consistent christian life of singular beauty, continually letting her light "so shine that others, seeing that light, were constrained to walk therein."

She endured her long and severe affliction with christian patience and fortitude, and entered the valley without a fear or murmur, but could say, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me," which words were selected by her self as her funeral text.

NO MATTER HOW HIGH THE "TONE."

WHEN A TAILOR

No matter how high up his "tone" is, asks you $10 and $14 for a pair of "trousers," as he calls them, the wool of which is sorted by orphans and poor blind girls, and is kept some years in some old mill in Germany before he buys it on credit; when this noble tailor stands off and views you, enveloped in one of his $35 suits, gesticulating like a maniac, you may think here is a little humbug about it all, but it is not humbug; it is just twenty dollars out of your pocket into his'n. There is a place where you can get precisely the same suit for—well, you call on

SILKS.

The superiority of our Silk Department over that of any other house in the city, is a long-established fact. We have never before, however, been able to offer the same inducements in that department to purchasers that we now can.

DRESS SILKS

In all the new and desirable shades and designs.

Trimming Silks and Satins to Match.

WE have now in stock an unusual fine line of AMERICAN SILKS, in plain and brocade patterns, so justly celebrated for their beauty of colorings and designs, and great durability.

BLACK SILKS.—Besides an elegant assortment of black dress silks, we have received several pieces of MANTILLA SILKS, 27 inches wide, and just the thing in every way for the purpose. We have always made our silk department a specialty, and are satisfied with the lowest possible prices consistent with the best class of goods.

GRENADINES, in black and colors, and in all the new and tasteful designs, at exceedingly low prices.

BLACK CASHMERES.—In these goods we keep only the makes of established reputation for purity of dye, and excellence of make and finish. We are offering these goods at prices that must command the attention of the closest buyers.

MOURNING GOODS.—We are now able to display everything desirable in this line, and at our well-known low prices.

SUIT DEPARTMENT.—We have many attractions in this department, and some special bargains well worth looking at. This department is especially interesting at this time.

FRINGES.—We have an elegant line of silk and grass fringes, in all colors, ranging in price from 40c to $4. The low prices that we have made on these goods have given them an extraordinary sale this season.

NOTIONS, ETC.—We here mention a few specialties under this head. SACQUE and DRESS ORNAMENTS in large variety. Some of the most EXQUISITE BUTTONS are offered—each one a work of art. New line of BRETON and TORCHON LACES. DOUBLE-FACED RIBBONS in all the novel and desirable shades and combinations. The completest line of LADIES', GENTLEMEN'S and CHILDREN'S gloves and hosiery ever before offered by us. LACE mits in black and colors.

Local and Miscellaneous

—Whew!

—Let's go swimmin'.

—Shoot the new railroad law.

—Everybody is "conspiring" much.

—Next comes the old settlers' meeting.

—The very latest, in summer hats, at Yesbera's new store.

—Amos Keeter was in town this week. Everybody knows him.

—Highest prices paid for wool, at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's.

—The new walk in the court-yard is a daisy—it's a darling— it's a dumpling.

—Conductor Geo. Hogford is again on duty, having had a hard tussle with a billious attack.

—The wool trade is getting lively in Auburn; the highest price paid yesterday was 26 cents.

—Jos. Beugnot went up to Angola Tuesday, looking after his interests in the nursery business.

—An abstract of the proceedings of the board of commissioners will appear in next week's issue.

—For choice family groceries, go to Schaab, Beugnot & Co's.; they always sell at bottom prices.

—Go to Yesbera's new place of business and see how cheap he is selling gents' furnishing goods.

—The best place in DeKalb county to buy clothing, dry-goods and groceries, is at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's.

—The best five cent cigars in town are sold by Schaab, Beugnot & Co. Try them and be convinced.

—Sam. Pommert, the slender tonsorial artist on Main street, has just completed a flying trip to Ohio.

—There is more agricultural machinery handled at Auburn, than any other town in the state, of the same size.

—Lawyer Rose presided in the circuit court yesterday, while Judge McClellan was running a little court in the jury room.

—Our main street jeweler and watchmaker, J. Abright, left Monday on a trip to Columbus, O. Later—He's back.

—Mr. Griswold, of Auburn, was in town Saturday last, and took part in the exercises at the grove.—Garrett Herald.

—There is more Leasure about Kiblingers hardware-store, than any other place we know of. They call it John, for short.

—The genial ex-editor of the COURIER, (Tom Mays, we mean,) got in from St. Louis Tuesday evening. He reports a gorgeous time.

—Sol. Barney, one of Spencerville's enterprising dry-goods merchants paid the COURIER office a substantial visit last Monday.

—The Boston Post says that Adam never smoked. We'll bet two to one, though, he chewed something when Eve gave him away.

—The new sidewalk in front of the court house, is universally admired. We fellows on the north side would be satisfied with a plain one.

—Call at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's. for fur hats, as they have the largest and best selected stock in DeKalb county, at prices below all competion.

—The north-west corner room on the second floor of the court house has been assigned to the county superintendent, by the board of commissioners.

—A twenty-five-cent pencil, stationery and jewelry vender, accompanid by a dame who assists him, was spouting on the street-corners this week.

—The Butler band requests us to say that the members of that organization, who behaved badly at Auburn on decoration day, have been expelled.

—The contract for making the next one hundred seed cleaners for Messrs. Ensley & Shilling has been awarded to F. T. Zimmerman, he being the lowest bidder.

—The parties who laid the stone walk in front of the court house were paid the sum of $178.40 for the work and material, which includes the GUARDIAN ANGELS.

—List of unclaimed letters in the postoffice at Auburn, Ind., June 7th, 79. N. M. Adams, (2), W. A. Hall, P. H. Roland, (3).

JOS. RAINIER, P. M.

—S. S. Mallory, of Toledo, who is engaged in the milling business, a brother-in-law of T. C. Mays, dropped into Auburn yesterday and will remain on a visit of several days.

—CARPETS! CARPETS!!—The best place to buy carpets in DeKalb county, is at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's., as they have the best selection, and at prices far below all competition.

—Married, at Niles, Trumbull county, Ohio, June 5, 1879, at the residence of James H. Tidd, by Elder N. N. Bartlett, George Headley, of Newville, Ind., and Miss Mary H. Hamel, of Niles.

—Perry Lukens, of Fort Wayne, traveling agent and solicitor for the Gazette, was knocking around town Tuesday. He is a pleasant fellow, and competent for the position he holds.

—We should have said last week that Prof. C. A. Fyke and lady, and Mr. W. M. Kist (of the Record) and lady, all of Butler, gave the COURIER office a pleasant call. Better late than never.

—Yesbera has moved his stock of goods to the room north of Abright's jewelry store. Call and see him when you want a new suit made in the latest fashion.

—There has been nine jury trials in the circuit court since our last issue. We consider that getting along pretty well. Proceedings are proceeding with clock-like regularity.

—While at Ft. Wayne last Saturday, Dr. J. B. Casebeer met with an accident by being thrown from a carriage. His injuries are not considered serious, and he will be ready for business again in a few days.

—The conductors, engineers and firemen on all the railroads, as well as people who live along the lines, are mad enough to chew soap and spit white, in consequence of the passage of the new "whistling law."

—The happiest period in a boy's life, as we have learned from a sad yet blissful experience, is the day when he can pull at the end of a nickel cigar, in the presence of his paternal dad, without subjecting himself to a premature grave.

—The Lutheran Sunday-school of Auburn, will hold a picnic in the grove near Ensley Avenue, on Saturday June 21st, 79, to which all other schools in the county are invited. Get ready to go, take your dinner along, and have a good time.

—Judge Lowry will be present at the meeting of the old settlers, one week from to-day, and has consented to talk for a few moments. The meeting is to be held at Ensley's grove, near the junction. See order of exercises in another column.

—There is a greater victory gained by the man or woman who can say, "I was wrong and am sorry; forgive me," than mailed knights ever won on the battle-field.—Ex.

True, but how much handier it is to be bull-headed and say, "You hateful old brute, you wouldn't give up if you knew you were wrong!"

—A grand concert will be given at Ensley's hall on Wednesday evening, June 18, '79, by about forty children, under the leadership of Miss Franc Stahl. The programme will consist of a selection of first-class music, and the entertainment will be first-class throughout. Admission 10 cents.

—Strawberries are getting within the reach of the average country editor—ten cents a quart. Our mouth waters as we anticipate and wait for some man to come in who doesn't stand us off, in which unlooked-for event we mean to buy a couple—of strawberries, not quarts.

—In a letter dated June 10th, and addressed to our townsman, W. H. Dills, Col. I. B. McDonald, of Columbia City, states that he will increase the crowd at the old settlers' meeting, to be held at Auburn on Thursday, June 19th, by a majority of one, and that he will be glad to meet his old-time friends at this place.

—The old settlers' meeting, to be held next Thursday, June 19th, will be an enjoyable affair. Several of the oldest pioneers of DeKalb and adjoining counties will be present, and no pains will be spared to interest all who attend. Miss Frankie Ryan will assist materially in the entertainment, as she has kindly consented to furnish music for the occasion.

—A free book of nearly 100 large octavo pages for the sick. Full of valuable notes on scrofula; diseases of the breathing organs; diseases of men; diseases of women; aches and pains; heart troubles; and a great variety of chronic diseases, with evidence that in most cases that these diseases are curable. Sent for one stamp. Address MURRAY HILL PUB. CO., No. 129 E. 28th St., N. Y. 11-6m.

—The Olympic theatre at Ft. Wayne, commence the play of the "Black Crook" at that place next Monday, June 16, and will continue one week. They have secured the original Black Crook company from the grand opera house, of New York, and the performance will be first-class in every respect. Don't fail to go down to the city and see it next week.

—As one of the results of the infamous railroad law which has recently gone into effect, requiring the continuous blowing of the engine-whistle for eighty rods, at every wagon-road crossing, a team ran away at the stave-factory last Monday and demolished things most beautifully. This, however, is but a beginning; we shall expect them, or to hear of them, hourly.

—License to retail intoxicating liquor in DeKalb county, was granted to the following parties at the June term of commissioners court:

Thomas Somers, Auburn,
Wm. Rainier, "
Fred Hulsenbeck, "
S. J. Locke, Waterloo,
James H. Clifford, "
Isaac Herschler, Butler,
Nicholas Gengnagle "

—Marshal Scott tells us about a skeleton—not a skeleton wagon, but a "sure 'nuff" dead skeleton—that was unearthed a few days ago, while the work on the avenue was in progress. He—i. e. the dead skeleton—having been extremely dead for a number of years, was unable to give his name, or tell where he was going; and as he had no vest on—or anything else to speak of—his card couldn't be found on his person. If any one has lost such a man, or wants one, apply to Tom Scott for terms.

—We learn with sincerest regret of the death, on Monday of last week, June 2, of Dr. N. Sherman, of Plymouth, one of the most highly esteemed and oldest practicing physicians of that place, having been a resident for the last thirty-four years. He was in his sixty-third year, and had been ill for some time. His home paper, the Plymouth Democrat, gives a full sketch of his life and dwells upon it in a lengthy and well-merited memorial.

—We had the pleasure, during his visit of the latter part of last week, of meeting a brother pencil-pusher in the person of D. H. Tolan, of the Delphos (O.) Herald. He is an intelligent, affable gentleman, and a brother of T. J. Tolan, the well-known master-architect of Fort Wayne. Mr. Tolan has occasion (?) to visit Auburn quite frequently, on business,—business, did we say? well yes, it is business,—and we will be glad to welcome him at all times.

—A "sweet-scented scoundrel" stopped in front of Davenport's drug-store, one day last week, and inquired who kept the store next door; upon being informed that it was S. W Ralston's, and that he was absent, the s.-s.s. dropped in casually, you know, and told Mrs. Ralston that he wanted to see her husband; had known him for years; particular friend; wanted fifty cents "till to-morrow;" would be all right then, etc., etc. Mrs. R. unsuspectingly gave it to him, and where now is the s.-s. s.?—on his usual "beat," in search of fresh victims.

—The following delicate surgical operation was performed at Hicksville, a few days since, and is thus spoken of by the News:

"On Tuesday Dr. Combs, assisted by Dr. Kiamont, in the presence of the other physicians of our town, performed a difficult surgical operation upon Geo. Gilbert, whose brain is badly diseased, in the first place caused by being hit with a piece of shell while in the army and since by a scantling. A piece of the skull 3x1¼ inches was sawed out, commencing on the top of the forehead and running back toward the crown of the head, putting in a silver plate. Mr Gilbert stood the operation very well, and bids fair to recover. The brain was badly diseased."

Dr. Price's Floral Riches.

This delightful Cologne water is receiving much attention not only from the ladies and gentlemen of refinement and taste, but from professional men generally. It is so gratefully refreshing to the invalid, its odor is so exquisitely delicate and yet so rich and persistent.

Church Socials.

—The ladies' Presbyterian society will give a strawberry festival on next Tuesday evening, in Dr. Ford's building. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

MRS. J. E. ROSE, Sec'y.

—The mite society of the M. E. church will meet at the residence of Mrs. A. Robbins, on Friday evening, June 20th, refreshments at eight o'clock. All are invited to attend.

MRS. J. ANDERSON, Sec'y.

Soldiers Reunion.

At the last meeting of the Union Soldiers' Association of this city it was determined to hold a reunion of the ex-soldiers of this county at Auburn, on or about the 19th or 20th of September, or the 8th of October next, the anniversary of important battles in which many of the DeKalb soldiers were engaged. Committees will be appointed at the next meeting of the association to confer with ex-soldiers in other parts of the county.

R. H. WEAMER, Sec'y.

Final reports were made on the ditches petitioned for by Daniel McClellan et al., in Troy township, and Jacob H. Smith et al. in Troy township.

Twenty-four ditch cases are now pending in commissioners court.

Old Settlers' Meeting.

The first annual meeting of the Old Settler's Society of DeKalb county will be held at Auburn in the beautiful grove on Ensley Avenue, between Auburn and Auburn junction, on Thursday, June 19th, 1879. The order of exercises will be as follows:

Meeting called to order at 10:30 a. m.
Music.
Oration by Hon. John Morris.
Music.
Recess for dinner.
1:30 p. m. Music.
Report of officers.
Election of officers.
Speeches by old settlers, Hon. A. Ellison, of Lagrange, Judge Prentiss, of Noble, L. H. Stocker, Esq., of Steuben; Major Sprott, Hon. R. Lowry, Col. I. B. McDonald, and others, are invited and expected to be present.
Music.
Benediction.

Arrangements have been made for excursion rates on the railroads leading to Auburn on that day. The Ft. W., J. & S. railroad will carry passengers on regular trains from Angola, Pleasant Lake, Summit and Waterloo at excursion rates. The Eel River railroad will run a special train leaving Butler at 8 a. m., stopping at Moore's Station, and returning to Butler at 6:30 p. m. The B. & O. railroad will carry passengers from Albion, Avilla, Garrett, Hicksville St. Joe and Concord.

Tables will be prepared in the grove, and every person is expected to come with baskets well filled with refreshments.

Newville.

—Weather pleasant and warm at this time; very different from last Friday morning, when we had ice for breakfast.

—Wheat looks well in this region, and bids fair for a good crop, though some fears are expressed that it has been injured by the last frosts.

—The writer of the Spencerville items is rather hard on the Newvillians who attended the concert at that place, especially the "star of the east;" this is the first time we ever knew that the "star of the east" had traveled so far west.

—The ladies all want new hats, as a matter of course, and business is lively at the millinery stores; but business in general is rather dull.

—We had a nice little row at the drug-store a few days ago, and too much "family disturbance" was the probable cause.

—The health of this region is remarkably good just now, for which we of course feel thankful. ALPHA.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. Sherar, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y. 6-cow 6-m.

$1500 TO $6000 A YEAR, or $5 to $20 a day in your own locality. No risk. Women do as well as men. Many make more than the amount stated above. No one can fail to make money fast. Any one can do the work. You can make from 50c to $2 an hour by devoting your evenings and spare time to the business. It costs nothing to try the business. Nothing like it for money making ever offered before. Business pleasant and strictly honorable. Reader, if you want to know all about the best paying business before the public, send us your address and we will send you full particulars and private terms free; samples worth $5 also free; you can then make up your mind for yourself. Address, GEORGE STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine. 25-1y.

GROWING OLD.

Is it parting with the freshness
 Of the smoothly-dimpled cheek?
Is it losing from the dimples
 Half [illegible] they speak?
Is it fading [illegible]
 From the wavy, golden hair?
Is it finding on the forehead
 Graver lines of thought and care?

Is it dropping—as the rose-leaves
 Drop their sweetness, overblown—
Household names that once were dearer,
 More familiar, than our own?
Is it meeting on the pathway
 Faces strange and glances cold,
While the soul, with moan and shiver,
 Whispers sadly, "Growing old!"

Is it frowning at the folly
 Of the ardent hopes of youth?
Is it cynic melancholy
 At the rarity of truth?
Is it disbelief in loving,
 Selfish hate, or miser's greed?
Then, such blight of nature's noblest
 Is a "growing old" indeed.

But the silver thread that shineth
 Whitely in the thinning tress,
And the pallor where the bloom was
 Need not tell of bitterness;
And the brow's more [illegible] furrows,
 Where it once was marble fair,
May be but the spirit's tracing
 Of the peace of answered prayer.

If the smiles have gone in deeper,
 And the tears more quickly start—
Both together meet in music
 Low and tender in the heart;
And in others' joy and gladness,
 When the life can find its own,
Surely angels lean to listen
 To the sweetness of the tone.

Nothing lost of all we planted,
 In the time of budding leaves;
Only something bound in bundles
 And set by our precious sheaves;
Only treasure kept in safety,
 Out of reach and out of rust,
Till we clasp it—grown the richer
 Through the glory of that trust!

On the gradual sloping pathway,
 As the passing years decline,
Gleams a golden love-light, falling
 Far from upper heights divine;
And the shadows from that brightness
 Wrap them softly in their fold,
Who unto celestial whiteness
 Walk by way of "growing old."

THE COUSIN'S PERFIDY.

A pretty little cottage in the suburb of Maidstone; vines trailing over it, patches of flowers in front of it, and an air of comfort and beauty all around it; a man of 30 and a woman of 25 conversing in the veranda in earnest tones.

"My dear Mary," said George Parker, "it seems really too bad! To be separated from you two or three whole months before the second year of married life has passed, and before all the romance of married life has died out, is hard to bear. It will be quite impossible for me to leave my business and go with you."

"I know it, George," replied the wife; "but this letter says that mother is on her dying bed, that she suffers for her daughter's care, that she is constantly calling for me. If I should not go, when she is dead an' gone my conscience would always upbraid me. To be away from you even so short a time is a great deal for me; but I must do my duty. Your cousin, Carrie Wilson, will perhaps consent to come and superintend the house while I am gone, and I will write to you every day."

On the following day, Mrs. Parker went away to Scotland, and George's cousin Carrie consented to come and stay with George, and manage the household affairs during her absence.

George wrote each day to his wife, proving the devotion of his heart in each letter; telling of his loneliness, but not complaining; wishing for his wife, but not urging her return. These letters were a great consolation to Mary. Without them she could not have existed; with them she could endure, but not be happy.

When she had been away a few weeks, George inclosed in one of his letters a picture of the cousin who had so kindly come to his lovely home and taken charge of it. Mary, in reply, wrote: "I do not like the face of your cousin. There is something behind the sweetness of her expression which, if allowed to penetrate, the perpetual smile would render the pretty face hideous; besides, she is too young. I cannot reconcile myself to her constant companionship with you. In fact, I don't like her. Let your cousin return home, George. I should feel better satisfied."

Poor Mary! A pang of jealousy shot through her heart, and it was destined to be followed by many another, for George's reply was, "Carrie, my cousin has now no home but mine. She was a dependent on an aunt, who treated her shamefully. I cannot send her away as I would a servant. Your trial, Mary, is too much [illegible] ungenerous, my darling."

Mary never again referred to Carrie; and, for a time, her letters were constrained in affection and detail. George noticed it not, but continued to write in his wonted tender manner.

Meantime, Mary remained at the bedside of her mother, whose death was almost hourly expected. One day, when she had been absent nearly three months, she received a letter from Carrie, saying that George was too much occupied with business to write, but he begged her to say all was well, and he sent his heart's love to his wife and child. Mary was restless, with a sense of neglect and jealousy. She wrote appealing letters every day, but received no answer; and so another month went by.

Then the mother died; and poor Mary, worn out with grief and watching, and the apparent neglect of her husband, broke down in both mind and body. She took the train for the south, but, before she had proceeded a hundred miles, her mind became utterly clouded. She was sent to a lunatic asylum, where she remained over a year, and then reason slowly returned to her. All her misery burst upon her in full force. She told her story to the physician, was believed, and assisted; and one dreary day, a mere ghost of her former self, robed in deep mourning, started for the south, and arrived in Maidstone, procured a cab, and drove through the familiar streets to her husband's suburban residence. She could scarcely pull the bell. The thought of how she would be received, what had transpired during her absence, and the tale she had to recount, made her weak. Nor did she forget her husband's neglect. By the time the door was opened (by a strange servant) her voice had almost left her. Twice she essayed to speak, and twice she failed.

"Is Mr. Parker in?" she at length faltered.

"Yes," replied the wondering servant. "Will you walk in?"

The wife made her way into the house, and ran to the well-remembered cozy parlor. At the door she paused, and what a sight met her yearning eyes. George, her husband, was bending over the piano, at which sat Carrie. She was singing; and George would occasionally stroke her hair in approbation, or cast a look at her upturned face that should have belonged to Mary alone. Over the piano, where once hung her picture, Mary saw that of Carrie. The entire appearance of the room seemed changed.

George Parker cast a startled look at the intruder, and recognized in the thin, worn, wild-looking creature his once-handsome wife.

"Good heavens, Mary!" he cried; "I thought you were dead."

"What words are these? I cannot hear aright!" exclaimed Mary.

"Do not converse with her, George. She can lay no claim to you after desertion, nor to your child," said Carrie, leaving the piano, and springing to the side of [illegible] caressed.

He knew not [illegible] to do or say.

"Have you any claim on my husband?" questioned Mary, having fully gained her self-possession.

"Certainly [illegible]."

Mary staggered to a seat, and at that instant Nancy, the housemaid, an old servant, and one who had been devotedly attached to Mary, entered the room. She had been listening at the door.

"I ain't afraid to speak out, now that mistress has got back," she said defiantly. "I've kept the secret just as long as I'm going to. All the letters that Mr. Parker wrote Miss Carrie kept. They were never sent. She hid them, and I've got them here all safe and sound."

George was in a frenzy of despair, and at a word he was prepared to spring upon and tear to pieces the woman he had but a few moments ago caressed.

"Will you tell me what your motive was?" he demanded of Carrie.

"Love for you, George, and determination to be your wife. I sincerely repented of my crime when I heard your wife was dead, and I thought had I but waited, how easily I could have accomplished my wish without the aid of guilt; but it is too late now. I am a miserable, wretched woman—a sinner who has the right to expect mercy from no one. I will go from your house at once, and Heaven help me in the future."

"Do not add hypocrisy to your crime; and, if you would not have me repent my mercy, leave the house this instant," said George, in tones not to be doubted.

He was right when he spoke of the hypocrisy of Carrie. She had hoped to touch the heart of Mary. Her husband's words, save as far as they exonerated her in the eyes of the world, were indifferent to her. Carrie soon detected that she had killed all the pity in the heart of Mary, as well as she had killed all happiness in her life. She gave one appealing look at George and ran from the room. George would have followed her, driven wild with desperation, but Mary saw his intention, and, catching him by the arm, she said, "No violence, George; I forbid it!"

A word was enough for George from Mary. All his old love, his esteem and admiration for her had returned. He could not believe he had forgotten her for an instant, and, when he cast a thought as to what her life had been for the past year, and what a return home she had, he could have killed himself, coward-like, and escaped the life of misery he had created so perfectly for another.

"Now tell me, George, of what I was accused, and, in defence, I will tell you all my life since we parted; for the sake of our little one."

"I shall say nothing in accusation, but simply the fact that for months I never heard from you."

"That was the commencement of the woman's treachery. I wrote almost every day. At last, when no answer came to the letters, and my mother died, I became insane. For one year I have been an inhabitant of an insane asylum. Think of that, George! Look at me, the wreck I am. But, careworn and friendless as I was, I thought I could turn to my husband, and find the shelter I see now is only to be found in heaven, for my husband has taken another to his heart, from which I had been cast. That fact has deadened all sense of happiness within me. I live but through the love of my child, but for her I have done. Am I innocent in your eyes of all desertion—of all unbecoming a wife and a mother? Before the eyes of our child—"

"Your child!" exclaimed George. "Don't you know that she is dead?"

An agonizing cry was the only response, and Mary fell to the floor. A day of unconsciousness ensued, and then the old malady of insanity again took possession of her. She became violent, and it was found necessary to send her to an asylum.

With one wife a lunatic, and the other a proven criminal, and his child dead, there is no promise of future happiness in the life of George Parker.

How Wilkie Collins Produces Novels.

"Why, the truth is I write all day long, or nearly so. I've been obliged to stop writing at night. I used to write a great deal at night—the temptation to do it is very great, as there are no children and no organs about after midnight—but I really found that my bedroom was so full of ghosts when I tried to go to sleep that I could not close my eyes. I indulged, too, in far more pipes than was good for me in the wee hours. I had to stop both smoking and writing at night.

"I cannot take any exercise until after I've finished my writing for the day, for so sure as I go out the inspiration flies, and I cannot lure it back until the next day."

The second floor—American style—of his spacious mansion in Gloucester place is devoted to the work-room for the "small trade" of the great novelist. In what we should call the back parlor—a large, square apartment—he sits at one of two large, square tables and weaves the fictions that enchant the world.—Olive Logan, in Wilkes' Spirit.

TYPICAL OCCURRENCES.

Mrs. Little and his wife quarreled while out riding at Easton, Me., and in the excitement Mrs. Little let her baby roll off her lap to be killed under the wheels of the wagon.

A San Francisco barber, formerly a prizefighter, seeing a customer take off his coat and push up his shirt sleeves, instinctively regarded those movements as preparatory to a scrimmage, and gave him a whipping before an understanding could be effected.

A lady called at a jewelry store in Portland, Me., and before entering she left her baby in its carriage at the door. Having finished her purchases, she went home. The jeweler finally was attracted by the child crying, and took it into the store and amused it with some trinkets until its mother missed the baby and returned. She had forgotten it.

Two belles of Toddtown, Iowa, went to a ball with a joint beau, but he was impartial in his attentions, and the ones went out to fight. "During the hair-pulling which ensued," says a witness, "the contestants got up against a barbed-wire fence which appeared to be hungry for calico. Their clothing would now make a good variegated pattern for a rag carpet."

A walking match by two San Francisco men without any legs, except wooden ones, proceeded uneventfully for three miles. Then one of the contestants remarked, in reply to a spectator's question, that his legs had been cut off by a cannon ball. "Guess you mean a mowing machine," said the other pedestrian. Then the race ended; for the insulted veteran attacked his rival, and a fierce combat closed the contest.

While H. L. Schlorff, of New Orleans, was fishing with a hook and line, at the Old Lake End, he felt a fearful jerk upon his rod. He began to pull. Great was his astonishment to find that he had caught an alligator four feet long and very active. Schlorff called for help, and, three men hastening to him, the alligator was hauled ashore, having done no further damage than to masticate the foot of one of the men. This is one of the few recorded instances where an alligator has been caught with hook and line.

At the supper-table at a hotel in Delaware, Ohio, while a good number of boarders were present, a young machinist 21 years of age, named Jim Alexander, was served to a dish that had been omitted from the bill of fare. As he was quietly seated at the table sipping his cup of tea, Miss Gustie Smith, an adopted daughter of the landlord, who is described as remarkably beautiful and just budding into womanhood, came up behind him and rubbed two handfuls of pepper in his eyes, which nearly drove him frantic with pain. The motive which prompted her to the deed was, as she claims, that young Alexander would persist in playing the part of Paul Pry, by following her at nights when she would go walking with company, and moreover would return to the hotel wiih stories concerning her that were detrimental to her character. The reports were wholly without foundation. She had endured his persecution until patience had ceased to be a virtue.

Dr. Dufaur, a French physician, reports this interesting case: A common brown owl built its nest beneath the projecting roof of a farmhouse, where it had a brood of young. One day the farmer, moved by curiosity, drove away the old bird, took out the young owls, and, after looking at them, replaced them uninjured. In the evening, as he was entering his house with his servant, the latter suddenly heard the beating of wings, and felt the claws of the owl on his chin, and before he could defend himself received a blow from its beak directly under the eye. On the following day an unsuccessful hunt for the bird was instituted, but in the dusk it appeared again and attacked the farmer himself, striking him directly in the eye with its beak. Dr. Dufaur found a wound of the cornea and an abundant hemorrhage. The sight of the eye was completely lost, and the other eye was subsequently threatened with sympathetic inflamation.

G. W. Smith, living away up in Douglas county, Ore., took his Henry rifle and strolled into the woods. There was snow on the ground and tracks—bear tracks—on the snow. Two miles across a valley and up a hill the hunter followed the trail. All at once a huge cinnamon bear appeared in the path, walking leisurely along. The crack of the Henry, a sharp reverberation among the crags, the thunderous answer of the beast, and the hunter took to his heels. Confounded bruin. Smith turned. In a terrible moment the bear closed and knocked the rifle into the air and its owner upon the ground. As he fell Smith heard the clear report of a rifle. Stunned as he was he thanked his lucky stars that some friendly hand had made itself felt in the nick of time, for the bear was lying upon his side, dead. Recovering, Smith looked far and near for his rescuer. He saw no one. Much puzzled he picked up his rifle and looked into the magazine. He found but eight bullets, and the mystery was explained. In starting on the hunt he had put ten bullets in, had fired one shot, and so it must have been that the rifle discharged itself in the fall providentially killing the bear.

The Indianapolis Sentinel of a recent date says: "There is another deeply interesting question which is about to be brought up in the Superior Court of Tippecanoe county, Judge Ward presiding. It is whether a man can allow his hen to lay on another's land, and then claim the egg as his property. The point is this: A Mr. Wilson, of Wabash township, has a Bramah hen, which went into the stable of his neighbor and laid eggs in the horse trough, which the owner of the stable appropriated to his own use, hence the action. It will be argued on the one side that Mr. Wilson could not control his hen from flying over the fence, and on the other that Mr. Brown, the neighbor, could not be expected to furnish his stable for a nest for Wilson's Bramah hen. The hen is to be brought into court to be identified, as also the eggs, on question of ownership. The trial promises to be an interesting one, involving as it does many important questions, and evoking as it will some of the rarest talent of the Lafayette bar. It is highly probable that Messrs. Behm & Behm and Calnahan will be retained for the hen, and Messrs. Stein, Coffroth and Baird for the nest."

Luther McCoy, a young law student of Booneville, Ind., met with one of the most remarkable adventures on record, the particulars of which are thus related by a local correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer. McCoy says he went to Rockport to attend the Spencer County Court, and while returning home about 10 o'clock in the evening he was stopped by Jacob Brother and Levi Landsburg, who demanded that he should go to the Clerk's office, get a license and marry Jacob Brother's daughter, Cynthiana. McCoy protested, but Brother insisted that the daughter had been grossly wronged, and reparation should be made at once. Having no means of defense, McCoy was taken by Brother and Landsburg to the Clerk's office, who issued the papers, and then the trio started together for Brother's residence. A clergyman was called in and McCoy was married to the woman. This, McCoy alleges, was all done with threats of death to him should he resist. The newly-married couple were taken to a room and locked up for the night, and in the morning the groom started for his father's house with the bride. Having told his father the circumstances of the marriage the old gentleman took the bride back to her home, and McCoy has now brought suit to have the marriage declared null and void.

A Hunt After Bats.

One of the funniest stories I have heard for a very long time, says a writer for the London Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News, is my friend Mr. Eccles' description of how he caught innumerable bats one night. It was many years ago, when he was young in his profession, and while on a tour with a provincial company he had taken lodgings in a clean but rather dilapidated little house. Soon after going to bed he fell asleep, and soon after falling asleep he was awakened by a strange, fluttering noise, as of a frightened bird, in the curtains of his bed. He sprung up, struck a light, and saw a dark-colored little creature with wings blundering about the room. Not being well acquainted with natural history, Mr. Eccles did not recognize it as a bat, but determined to catch it, if possible, and examine it carefully in the morning. Taking up a soft felt hat, he began the hunt, and tried to capture the intruder for a long time in vain; but at last he pounced upon it, carefully took it from under the hat, shut it in a drawer, listened to its ineffectual attempts to escape—wanting to be sure he had really caught it—and went to bed to dream of flying dragons. But he was not destined to sleep for long.

Hardly had he dozed off when another fluttering awakened him, and, lighting another match, he found another bat. After this one he had another hunt, caught it, put it in the drawer with its brother, and again went to bed. Again, however, he was awakened in a similar manner; bats came not in single spies, but—if the expression be pardonable—in battalions.

Mr. Eccles hunted diligently and enthusiastically, making quite a collection of specimens, and putting them all with great care in the drawer. Heated with the chase, he then opened the window, and, tired out, at last enjoyed a few minutes' sleep.

Waking with the morning light, he jumped out of bed and opened the drawer very cautiously, a fraction of an inch at a time, to look for his bats; but, lo and behold, there were no bats there! He opened the drawer wide, and then discovered that it had no back to it. He had, in fact, been passing all his night in catching the same bat, which had flown out of the back of the drawer as soon as he had put it in the front, and, when the window was opened, had finally escaped.

Did Not Save the Czar.

As is well known, when the Czar was fired at in 1866 by Karakosoff, in the Summer Garden, the first officer who came on the scene was Gen. Todleben. The assassin was gone, but the General found, lying on the spot and apparently insensible, a young peasant, whose named proved afterward to be Ossip Ivanowitch. Another young man, an apprentice, who was there likewise, but was never heard of afterward, asserted that he had actually seen Ossip pull back the arm of the assassin as the latter was firing his pistol, and that the former had, consequently, saved the life of the Czar. The fact was at once considered proved, and young Ossip was lionized into a hero, and introduced to the Czar, who made a nobleman of him under the name of Kommissaroff. For a whole season the young fellow, under the guidance of Gen. Todleben, was the idol of St. Petersburg society. His father, a non-political convict in Siberia, was recalled and, after a triumphant journey, admitted to share in the new prosperity of his son. Eventually, when the enthusiasm had cooled down, it was ascertained that Ossip had never saved the life of the Czar at all, and that, being slightly tipsy when the event took place close by him, he had simply been frightened by the pistol's report, and had fainted. The matter was hushed up as soon as possible—they manage that sort of thing very well in St. Petersburg—and the new nobleman was provided with a Lieutenantcy in the Caucasus. I suppose he is still there.—London Truth.

The Green-Eyed Monster.

Mr. Kroeger was tranquilly eating his breakfast, a morning or so ago, when his boy broke the silence by asking him for 25 cents to go to the minstrels with that night. Mr. Kroeger promptly refused, on the ground of hard times.

Mr. Kroeger's boy is more than a boy, and, when he sets his heart on having anything, he generally succeeds in getting it; so, when his father refused to comply with his request, he moved over by his mother, and said:

"I guess I'll tell ma what the cook said to you last night."

Mrs. Kroeger's eyes flashed like two balls of fire.

"You're a nice man," she said sarcastically, "to come home and pet me, and kiss me, and call me your dew-gemmed tulip, and then go and receive the caresses of the cook. You miserable frog-eyed runt, for two pins I'd go over there and rake your eyes out!"

"I—ah—" stammered the lord of the manor, when his wife broke in:

"Oh, yes—I'll ah you!" and, turning suddenly to the boy, she demanded an explanation.

"Will you give me 25 cents?"

"Yes."

"Give me the money first," said the boy. "I'm opening the year on the C. O. D. principle."

He got the money, and relieved his mother by telling her:

"Last night cook came to pa, and got pretty close to him——"

"Oh, you wretch!" hissed Mrs. K.

"And, when she got beside him, she smiled sweetly and said, 'Mr. Kroeger, the potatoes are getting low, and you had better get another sack.'"

The boy got out as fast as possible, while Kroeger lifted his paper before his face to veil the smile which made it look like a calcium-light.—Exchange.

FASHION NOTES.

Paniers grow larger and rise higher around the hips.

Elbow sleeves are to be worn again for street costume.

Candles have come into fashion in New York.

Traveling dresses are made with no trimming, or very little.

Children's garments have large square pockets back of the hips.

Small boys wear hats. Small girls wear bonnets or close caps.

Gauze scarfs, trimmed with velvet, are among the light wrappings announced for this summer.

French traveling dresses have long basques, plain overskirts finished by a fold, and underskirts trimmed with two small plaited flounces.

The panier draperies shorten the basques made for new costumes, but sometimes the basque is made long and draped into folds.

Black cashmere and Pompadour brocade are blended in some of the costumes recently made up in Paris. The trimming is Breton lace, and bows of reversible watered ribbon.

It is a peculiar branch of bonnet industry now that each fashionable woman shall have a garland of flowers suitable to the time of year.

A variation on the Marie Stuart shapes in bonnets has two ostrich plumes which meet in front above the forehead and wave down toward the ears. A knot of Pekin gauze or a handsome ornament conceals the place where the feathers join.

Walking jackets for the street are made of what are called Indian fabrics, that is, goods of the mastic and cinnamon shades, embroidered by hand in a palm pattern. Some of the close-fitting jackets terminate in a swallow-tail.

The greatest latitude is permitted in contrasts of color and variety of material in all costumes intended for home or carriage wear. Garden, lawn, tennis, croquet, and archery costumes are made as bright and picturesque as possible. All colors and tones and tints, softly blended or sharply contrasting, and made brighter and gayer still with gold braid and gold-thread embroidery, are brought into play in making the butterfly-like toilets that flit here and there over the green, velvety lawns.

Florida Alligators.

The habits of Florida alligators are thus described by the Savannah News: Although alligators are very clumsy, their quickness, in some cases is remarkable, as when in water a speed of from five to eight miles an hour is made, and on land they are able to throw themselves over half a circle, using the fore feet for a fulcrum, striking their enemy with their tail with tremendous force.

In getting food the alligator shows a remarkable degree of cunning. Fish is acceptable, and, to catch them, a number of alligators form in a line, driving the fish before them into a cove or inlet.

Then each alligator makes a rush, catches a fish in his open mouth, rises to the surface, tosses the fish into the air, at the same time expelling the water by a current of air drawn through the nose, and is ready to bolt the fish when it falls.

Owing to the formation of the teeth, the alligator cannot masticate his food, but bolts it in small chunks. The gullet is not large.

Prey of size is concealed until it begins to putrefy, when it is sought and devoured. The largest animals are attacked if they get into the water, dragged down and drowned.

Last spring a large ox went into the waters of Lake Jackson, not far from Tallahassee, to drink. An alligator fastened to the fore leg of the animal, crushing the bone. The ox struggled on shore, dragging his antagonist with him.

At this time the shore was black with alligators, attracted by the smell of blood, and some crawled upon the bank. The ox fought valiantly, tossing one of the monsters high into the air.

From the effects of the fall it lay on the ground stunned a considerable time. But the wounded ox again got into the water, and a mammoth alligator closed on his nose and dragged him under.

Morning Mirage.

A characteristic phenomenon in Dakota is the morning mirage, seen on the prairies just before sunrise in the clear, cold, still weather. At such times wide reaches of country ordinarily cut off from the view by rising grounds or belts of timber will be raised, as it were, above these obstacles. Towns and other prominent objects, twenty miles away, are no longer invisible, but are clearly revealed, with all that lies between them and the spectator. The windows may be counted in houses which at other times can no more be seen than if they were at the antipodes, and near objects, usually just within the range of vision, seem to be brought much closer. As the sun's orb rises above the horizon, the vision sinks below it.

THE GARDEN.

"Come into the garden, Maud,"
 For the black bat, night, has flown,
And the cats that danced on the onion bed
 Have left it, at last, alone;
But there isn't an onion left in the patch
 That I would care to own.

"For the breezes of morning move,"
 And the sun is climbing high;
And I look at the garden-patch I love,
 And I think I should like to die;
I could kick every cat in the neighborhood
 Clear up to the azure sky.

All night the onions have heard
 Brindle, and Tabby, and Tom;
And the truck-patch looks as it had been stirred
 By an eight-inch Ericsson bomb;
If you mentioned the pansy bed in a word,
 You would have to call it a "glom."

They have made one long wild tear
 From the porch to the alley gate;
They are coming again, I swear,
 And I collar the shotgun and wait,
And brindle cat wauls, "Is he here? Is he here?"
 And the gray cat yells on the gate;
And the black cat yowls at the other in fear,
 And the yellow cat wails in hate.

They are coming; I hear their feet;
 On the roof and the porch they tread;
They are coming to wrestle and beat
 Down the earth in my onion bed.
But I hurl them back in retreat
 With a handful of powder and lead,
And I laugh at their wails and scrambling feet
 On the roof of my neighbor's shed.

SABBATH READING.

The Secret of Happiness.

What should I seek, and what desire,
So that my days may joyous be?
Where shall I find the hidden fire
For faith that never may cease to be?
First, in myself my search must rest
Ere it go forth upon its quest.

Bright my own soul; pure my intent,
So shall I walk to find my joy;
Self in the common welfare blent;
Swift to upbuild, slow to destroy;
Knowing each heart hath secret good,
Often not known or understood.

Welcome must each [illegible] impulse seem
Felt by brother, or friend, or foe;
Never be held in light esteem
The blessing another's work may show.
So must the measure be just and fair
For another's goodness, toil or prayer.

To walk where the sunshine loves to fall,
Or kneel in the shadow, subdued and still;
Hear every voice that in love may call,
Patient in strife, resigned to ill.
So shall each day hold something blest,
And the soul attain its longed-for rest.

Oh thou whose heart is a world of care,
Whose thoughts in a fever come and go,
Strive, with the strength that is born of prayer,
Peace in thy spirit first to know;
And, seeking ever some human good,
Find a crown of gold for thy cross of wood.

Bismarck's Religious Faith.

In the eyes of the multitude, Bismarck is a great but unscrupulous statesman, intent upon uniting Germany and making it the leading nation of Europe. As a man, he seems hard-headed, self-willed and iron-handed. As a ruler, he is looked upon as the incarnation of the despotic spirit, a believer in force, an infidel as to moral suasion.

Many persons who sympathize with his policy censure the means by which he executes it. They do not consider that, so long as that policy is threatened from within and without, the Chancellor must trust in force; nor do they read the lesson of the centuries, Force must rule until Right reigns.

The fact is not apprehended by the unthinking multitude that the work of grafting a statesman's policy into the organic life of a nation requires, like grafting a fruit-tree, excision, incision, pressure and time.

But it is not of Bismarck's policy we would write, but of that which few credit him with possessing—his religious belief. Strange as it may seem to those who know only the Chancellor, Bismarck is not only a religious man, but his religion is the foundation of his policy.

Dr. Busch, one of the statesman's secretaries, in a recent book, "Bismarck in the Franco-German War," narrates incidents, and reports private conversations which justify this assertion.

On the eve of his leaving Berlin to join the army, the Chancellor partook of the Lord's Supper. The solemn rite was celebrated in his own room, that it might not appear as an exhibition of official piety.

One morning, Bismarck was called suddenly from his bed to see a French General. Dr. Busch, on entering the bedroom, just after the chief had left it, found everything in disorder. On the floor was a book of devotion, "Daily Watchwords and Texts of the Moravian Brethren for 1870." On the table by the bed was another, "Daily Refreshment for Believing Christians."

"The Chancellor reads in them every night," said Bismarck's valet to Dr. Busch, seeing his surprise.

One day, while dining with his staff, several of whom were "free-thinkers," Bismarck turned the conversation into a serious vein. A secretary had spoken of the feeling of duty which pervaded the German army, from the private to the General.

Bismarck caught the idea and tossed it still higher. "The feeling of duty," he said, "in a man who submits to be shot dead on his post, alone, in the dark, is due to what is left of belief in our people. He knows that there is Some One who sees him when the Lieutenant does not see him."

"Do you believe, your Excellency," asked a secretary, "that they really reflect on this?"

"Reflect?—no; it is a feeling, a tone, an instinct. If they reflect, they lose it. Then they talk themselves out of it. "How," Bismarck continued, "without faith in a revealed religion, in a God who wills what is good, in a Supreme Judge, and in a future life, men can live together harmoniously, each doing his duty and letting every one else do his, I do not understand."

There was a pause in the conversation, and the Chancellor then gave expression to his faith.

"If I were no longer a Christian," he said, "I would not remain for an hour at my post. If I could not count upon my God, assuredly I should not do so on earthly masters.

"Why should I," he continued, "disturb myself and work unceasingly in this world, exposing myself to all sorts of vexations, if I had not the feeling that I must do my duty for God's sake? If I did not believe in a divine order, which has destined this German nation for something good and great, I would at once give up the business of a diplomatist. Orders and titles have no charm for me."

There was another pause, for the staff were silent before this revelation of their chief's inner life. He continued to lay bare the foundations of his statesmanship.

"I owe the firmness which I have shown for ten years against all possible absurdities only to my decided faith. Take from me this faith, and you take from me my Fatherland. If I were not a believing Christian, if I had not the supernatural basis of religion, you would not have had such a Chancellor."

"I delight in country life, in the woods and in nature," he said, in closing the conversation. "Take from me my relation to God, and I am the man who will pack up to-morrow and be off to Varzin [his farm] to grow my oats."

The surprise with which these revelations of a statesman's inner life are read is due to their singularity. Neither history nor biography are so full of instances of statesmen confessing their faith in God, and in Christianity, at a dinner-table surrounded by "free-thinkers," as to prevent the reading of these revelations from being most interesting and stimulating.

"I live among heathen," said the Chancellor, as he concluded this acknowledgment that his religion was the basis of his statesmanship. "I don't seek to make proselytes, but I am obliged to confess my faith."—Youth's Companion.

Disasters in Transatlantic Steam Navigation.

A supplement to the American Ship of this week furnishes the public with an elaborate table of maritime disasters, compiled by Mr. G. B. Winslow from records in the archives of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company. It shows the number of vessels lost in transatlantic steam navigation from 1836, when the Sirius first crossed the ocean. The general results are shown by their summaries: The whole number of vessels, by the different casualties specified, is 145; of which never were heard of after leaving port, 26; wrecked on coasts, 80; foundered at sea, 6; sunk at sea, 6; abandoned, 8; by collision with iceberg, 3; collision with other vessels, 4; capsized, 1; burned, 11. The loss of life by the several kinds of disaster, as far as ascertained, was as follows: By missing vessels, 850; by vessels sunk at sea (including loss by Arctic, 562), 778; by vessels burned, 533; by vessels wrecked, 1,611; by collisions, 350; by vessels foundered, 10; by other casualties, 70; total, 4,202. It is remarkable that the loss of life appears to have been made matter of open record in the case of only three of twenty-six missing vessels in the list given. These were the President, which left New York for Liverpool in 1841, and of which the loss is vaguely given as 200, when it has always been supposed to be much higher; the City of Glasgow, of the Inman line, which left Glasgow for New York in 1853; and the Pacific, of the Collins line, which left Liverpool for New York in 1856. The united loss by these vessels was 850. The total loss, as given above, does not include that of the twenty-three vessels against which the record is, "Missing; all lost." As far as can be judged from the character of these, and from their points of departure, they were mostly transient ships, carrying few or no passengers. With an average of 100 persons to each, including crew, the total loss of life on the list would be increased to 6,500 human beings. A critical examination of the dates when the missing vessels were built, and of their time of sailing, goes to confirm a statement made by the American Ship, viz: that many vessels were built on the Clyde and elsewhere in Scotland, on mere speculation, of cheap materials badly put together, and wholly unfit to encounter even moderate ocean storms. Of five that left their ports in November, 1872, not one was ever heard of afterward. Two others followed in 1874, two in 1877, and three in 1879, and that is the last known of them.—New York Tribune.

His First Chinaman.

A countryman came up Vine street, yesterday morning, with just enough usquebaugh aboard to make him unsteady. At Sixth street he ran foul of a Chinaman, the first one he had ever seen.

"You almond-eyed heathen!" he exclaimed, grasping John by the hand and shaking it joyfully; "you are the first of your good-for-nothing breed I ever saw."

"Chinaman in hully," said the Celestial, struggling to free himself.

"Devil take your washee-washee, or whatever you call it," said the countryman, as he picked up a parcel of boiled shirts and things which the Chinaman, in his flight, had let fall to the sidewalk. "I want to see if you are the outlandish beast the newspapers say you are. How about the pigtail, eh? Yes, by gracious, here it is!" and he took hold of the tip-end of that adornment, and lifted it up like a pump-handle. "Beats anything I ever saw on the head of mortal man. And this beastly shirt," he continued, as he took hold of the flowing garment, while John struggled vainly to get loose, "if you had any shame about you, you would wear inside of your infernal pants."

"Lette me glow!" yelled the Celestial.

"Don't fret the cattle," said the countryman, soothingly. "I want to see if they have lied about your hoof-harness!" and, looking down at John's feet, he burst into a loud laugh."

"Ho, ho!" he roared, "I wouldn't be caught dead in shoes like them, so help me Heaven!" and he contemplated them with unmixed pleasure; "turned up at the toes as if they were looking for a bee-tree," he continued, "no heels, no strings, and cellar-doors for soles, as I'm a sinner! Ho, ho, ha, ha! Shoot them, shoot them!"

These innocent words struck terror to the Chinaman's heart, and, breaking away, he dashed down the street, yelling

"P'lice, p'lice! Hoodlum shoote Chinaman! P'lice, p'lice!"

The countryman watched the terrific pace of his late friend with some astonishment, and, after his pigtail had cracked around the first corner, he went on his way, remarking:

"No man could have made me believe that kind of time could have been made in them shoes if I hadn't seen it with my own eyes."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Youthful Appreciation of Science.

A South Norwalk (Ct.) physician a few days ago was overhauling an electrical machine, and, after putting it in order, turned the crank to test it. His little daughter wanted to help, so he told her to turn and he would hold the handles. The child did her part well, and the current of electricity was so strong that the doctor's hands shook as though he had an attack of the ague. The next day the little girl asked her father to let her "play the hand-organ again." "Hand-organ?" said the doctor in an inquiring tone of voice; "I didn't know that you had ever played a hand-organ." "Oh, yes, I did, yesterday, you know, when I played and you was the monkey."

FARM NOTES.

I never knew any one that was too good or too smart to be a farmer. The blue sky, the balmy breezes and green fields never tainted any pure man's morality, or dwarfed any noble man's intellectual ability.—Lambie.

A reliable horticulturist about the use of salt on strawberries says: "About the time the blossom buds appear, sow broadcast common salt over the bed at the rate of ten bushels to the acre. I find that a bed that has been salted has fewer insects, less weeds, and an increase of moisture, a very essential point in successful strawberry culture."

A horse with tender, thin-walled, and small front feet is certainly better off without shoes on; and the longer time he can be spared from work the better. Such a horse should not be kept tied in a single stall, but should be given out-door liberty when the weather permits; and when indoors he should go loose in a comfortable shed or box-stall, with earthen floor. Look out for corn. A few months' liberty on pasture in the spring would be beneficial. Such a horse should never wear heavy shoes, and the smith should be told not to draw the nails tight when shoeing.

The culture of sugar beets is attracting a good deal of attention among the New England farmers. Maine tried the experiment several years ago, the State rendering some assistance, and it has proved a success. A good many New Hampshire farmers are going to plant small sections this spring, and in the fall compare notes as to the cost of raising and the amount of the yield. In Massachusetts the farmers of the Connecticut river valley propose to go into the business on a large scale this year, many of them turning to beets from tobacco, which has brought low prices of late years, while its continued cultivation exhausts the soil at a terrible rate. In Europe the culture of sugar beets has reached enormous proportions, and half of all the sugar consumed on the continent is derived from this source.

Whey fed to calves should be as sweet as it can be procured, and this means that it should be taken directly from the vats. At first calves do not relish it, and there is usually some trouble in getting them to drink it. Feeding it alone will not do. Mix wheat bran, or, what is better, red middlings, for whey is poor feed, and especially deficient in bone-forming material which the bran supplies. A little oil-meal is good to add. Care must be taken to bring up the calves gradually to full feeding, and in no case should there be dependence on whey without the addition of grain. If they cannot be made to take it with relish they will not do well, but judiciously fed it will promote growth. Good calves can be raised on whey and middlings. The main point on which care must be exercised is to get the whey as sweet as possible.

Keep Your Cattle in Flesh.—I am feeding some steers now that were good grade and were rather extra calves, and were fed at the troughs with beef cattle all the shelled corn they would eat for two-thirds of the first winter, when they were turned with stock-cattle and had ordinary feed and pasture till 2½ years old. They were then in a very good condition, and averaged 1,135 pounds. They are about 3 years old now; I bought them last fall and fed them with about 100 other cattle that are now feeding for beef. They are doing the poorest of any. It is my opinion that if the grain that was fed to them the first winter had been divided, one-third fed to them the first winter, and the two-thirds fed to them the next winter, they would have been much better than they now are. To let cattle fall off you lose the feed you have fed to them while gaining the flesh they lose and the food they ate while losing it; besides, they will not make as good steers as if kept gaining all the time. Any animal, if allowed to get poor, after once having been fat, will never fatten as well again.—An Iowa farmer.

Chloride of potassium, it appears from the experience of a correspondent of the Fancier's Journal, is as efficacious for fowls with sore throats as for people. It is certainly a simple and harmless remedy, if remedy it be, and worthy of a trial in poultry yards threatened with roup. The correspondent in question experimented with a valuable cock that had taken cold, and called attention to this fact by an ominous sneeze and rattle in the throat. His feathers ruffled up, he refused his food, his comb and wattles lost their healthy red. He was put in close confinement, doomed to drink water dosed with cayenne pepper—in proportions of half a teaspoonful to a pint of water—and had poured down his throat three times per diem a solution of chloride of potassium, with sugar in water, as much as would dissolve, two teaspoonfuls each time. By this treatment, keeping him confined in a warm place, this cock was cured in about three days. The owner believes that a severe case of roup was prevented, which would have cost him a high-priced bird.

Novel Use of a Locomotive.

Every day proves the truth of the old adage: "Necessity is the mother of invention." Our attention has just been called to a new way of utilizing the power of a locomotive. Some years ago Porter, Bell & Co., of Pittsburgh, sent one of their small locomotives to the famous Dutch flat in California. It was used for hauling logs from a timber tract to the saw-mill. But, as much of the timber was in a deep canon, and the mill was on the hilltop, the ingenious owner desired to make it do another kind of duty as well as its own. They arranged an inclined track, placing a car on it, to which they lash the timber, and by a wire rope draw it to the top. The rope passes over a drum at the top of the hill, and the power is supplied by the little locomotive. The modus operandi is to run the engine on to a side-track alongside the drum on to friction wheels, through which the power is communicated; and here, like a dog in a churn-wheel or a horse in a treadmill, the engine revolves its drivers without the engine advancing, and lifts its load 600 feet in height in 1,200 feet of track, the engine thus becoming practically a stationary engine.—Iron Age.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

Old potatoes may be freshened up by plunging them into cold water before cooking them.

A small piece of paper or linen, moistened with spirits of turpentine and put into a bureau or wardrobe for a single day, two or three times, is said to be a sufficient preservative against moths.

To Clean Black Cashmere.—Place the dress or goods in strong borax-water, made lukewarm; let it remain in soak all night, then take out and hang on line to drip, and when nearly dry press off. Do not rinse or wring.

To Renovate a Black Chip Hat.—Add to one pint cold water teaspoonful of ammonia; use with a soft tooth or nail brush; when clean rinse with cold water and place in sun to dry. Do not soak or scrub sufficiently to destroy the shape. It will look as good as new.

The best way to admit pure air in the night (where windows are the only mode of ventilation) is to open the sleeping-room door into a hall where there is an open window, in order to avoid the draught. A window with a small opening at top and bottom ventilates more than one with one opening only.

Dutch Rolls.—Sift three quarts of flour; break three eggs into a pint of cold milk, in which put a teaspoonful of yeast, and stir up; cut a spoonful of butter up fine and work it in your flour; mix the milk and eggs and yeast with the flour; knead thoroughly. Make into rolls, butter the pan, and stand by the stove to rise. Bake in a quick oven.

Apple Charlotte.—Pare and slice thin one dozen apples; grate two large slices of bread; butter your pudding-dish well, and sprinkle some bread on it; then put on a layer of apples, a sprinkle of sugar, then bread crumbs, then small lumps of butter. Fill the dish with these alternate layers; then sweeten a cup of water and pour over the whole. Bake slowly, and when cold turn it upside down into another dish.

Dutch Sauce.—1. Take half a pint of melted butter and put into a stew-pan. 2. Add the yelks of five eggs. 3. Stand the stewpan in a saucepan of hot water over the fire, and stir well with a wooden spoon. 4. Season with salt and a few grains of cayenne pepper. 5. Stir continually until it thickens; you must not let the sauce boil, as it will curdle. 6. Just before the sauce is finished stir in two teaspoonfuls of lemon-juice.

Boiled Frosting.—For the whites of two eggs use one-half pound of granulated sugar. Beat the eggs to a stiff froth. Put a very little water to the sugar, and boil until it strings, stirring it only enough to keep it from burning. Add the sugar to the eggs while hot. Two persons are required to do this, one to continue beating the eggs while the other pours in the sugar very gradually. Flavor to taste. In making cold frosting it is better not to beat the eggs first. Beat the sugar and eggs together.

Frangipane Tart.—Sheet a tart-tin with puff-paste; pour into it some of the following cream: Beat well four eggs, add to them a pint of cream, four spoonfuls of flour and some loaf sugar; put them into a stew-pan, and rasp in, with a lump of sugar, the peel of a lemon; simmer the whole, constantly stirring it, on a slow fire, for about twenty minutes; then stir in two dozen sweet and bitter almonds, previously beaten to a paste, with a few drops of water. Having filled the tart with this cream, bake it, and sift over it fine sugar.

Cream Dressing.—When oil is disliked in salads, the following dressing will be found to be excellent: Rub the yelks of two hard-boiled eggs very fine with a spoon; incorporate with them a dessert-spoonful of mixed mustard; then stir in a table-spoonful of melted butter, half a teacupful of thick cream, a salt-spoonful of salt, and cayenne pepper enough to take up on the point of a very small penknife blade, and a few drops of anchovy or Worcestershire sauce; and very carefully sufficient vinegar to reduce the mixture to a smooth, creamy consistency, and pour it upon lettuce carefully prepared for the table.

To Destroy Angle-worms.—Angle-worms at the roots of plants can be made to come to the surface by inserting a fine hair-pin or darning-needle into the mold, and pouring lime-water upon the soil. This will be found to be good for the health of the plant also, and will keep the foliage fresh and green. Apply once a week. Calla lilies should be placed in a shady corner of the garden during the months of June and July, and be given no water except that which falls from the clouds. Early in August they should be put in a size larger pot with very rich earth—that is, loam and peat mixed. You cannot give too much water when they are growing and they are wanted to bloom.

Every Woman Her Own Dressmaker.

Any woman can now exercise her own taste and yet be stylish and well-dressed, provided she has any taste of her own to exercise. The plump woman can disguise her plumpness in a well-fitting princesse dress, though if very large she should never wear anything but neutral colors. The short woman can wear demi-train skirts and slightly trimmed. The slender, tall figure can wear the shirred waists and overskirts, the latter draped high and much trimmed. Any woman of any "knack" whatever can make a well-fitting, stylish garment by using any one of the paper patterns now for sale even in the smallest country village. Surely they would not be outdone by their foreign sisters, for patterns are now exported to all the foreign countries—even to China, though as yet not many of them have adopted the American style of dress.—Cincinnati Gazette.

HOME DOCTOR.

Never use anything but light blankets as a covering for the sick. The heavy impervious cotton counterpane is bad, for the reason that it keeps in the exhalations from the pores of the sick person, while the blanket allows them to pass through. Weak persons are invariably distressed by a great weight of bedclothes, which often prevents their getting any sound sleep whatever.

Arrow Root for Sick People.—The following I often use for my patients: I take a desert teaspoonful of arrow root and add a a table-spoonful of milk; wet and rub it smooth. To this I add a teaspoonful of powdered sugar. Heat a half-pint of rich milk and bring it just up to the boil. Then, when it boils, stir in carefully the arrow root and sugar. Allow it to boil three minutes, and give either warm or cold.—Hospital Nurse.

To Relieve Corns on the Sole of the Foot.—Cut a piece of stout card-board to fit the inside of the sole of the shoe. The card-board must be large enough in every way to prevent it shifting under the foot in walking. Cut a round hole in it exactly where the corn rests, but a little larger than the corn. This arrangement relieves the corn from the pressure and allows of its cure, and at the same time gives immediate relief in walking.

Children and Open Air.—It is a curious physiological fact that, although open-air life is so favorable to health, yet it has the apparent effect of stunting growth in early youth. Let two children be brought up together, one made to "rough" it out-of-doors, and the other carefully tended and kept within; other things being equal, the boy of the drawing-room will be taller, and, to all appearance, more developed than his companion. The laborer's children, for instance, who play in the lonely country roads and fields all day, whose parents lock their cottage doors when leaving for work in the morning, so that their offspring shall not gain entrance and get into mischief, are almost invariably short for their age. The children of working farmers exhibit the same peculiarity. After 16 or 18, after years of hesitation, as it were, the lads suddenly shoot up, and become great, hulking, broad fellows, possessed of immense strength. Hence it would seem that in-door life forces growth at the wrong period, and so injures.

An Improvement.—We are pleased to note the change people have made in the matter of swathing their children's necks. A few years ago the error of hugging a boy's or girl's neck with a great comforter or scarf was general, but now-a-days we don't often see it; the feet and wrists are the proper members to keep warm; the face and throat will harden into a healthy indifference to cold; but that muffler exchanged for an extra pair of thick socks and knitted gloves would keep a boy or girl really warm and well. Bronchitis and sore throat have declined 50 per cent. since the absurd use of high collars and twice-around neckerchiefs went out of fashion; and if the poor would take better care of their children's feet, half the infantile mortality would disappear. It only costs a trifle to put a piece of thick felt or cork into the bottom of a boot or shoe, but the difference is often considerable between that and a doctor's bill, with perhaps the undertaker's besides.—Science of Health.

Remedies for Corns.—A bit of linen dipped in turpentine and wrapped around the corn night and morning, if persevered in, will give relief. Arnica applied likewise will alleviate the pain. Lemon juice is also beneficial, softening the hard skin so that with a blunt knife a considerable portion of the corn may be removed. The easiest way to apply it is to cut off a piece of lemon, then nick it so as to let in the toe with the corn and bind on at night. Repeat twice or thrice. A good corn plaster can be made by dissolving by heat two ounces of yellow wax in two ounces of purified ammonia, and, just before it is cold, add six drachms of acetate of copper. Spread this ointment on a piece of soft leather. Before applying, soak the corn for some time in a solution of soda and pare as closely as possible. Corns are entirely owing to continued pressure on some one part. At first they are the production of the outer skin alone, but by gradual thickening they become connected not only with the true skin beneath, but even with the adjacent muscles, and, like many another evil, prevention is better than cure.

How to Start a Balky Horse.

There are many ways of accomplishing this much-desired object. Indeed, as for a human ailment, every-one has a different recipe—but the right one. Some advocate building a fire under him. This is effectual, as it is calculated to render the animal's nerves steady. Try it, by all means, and, if that does not do, pour sand in his ears; never mind if you do make him deaf for life—who wants a balky horse? If the sand trick won't work, cast off the tugs and traces, tie his tail fast to the whiffletree, and start him off. After this dodge he may never sulk again, but the chances are that he will be minus a tail; never mind—who wants a balky horse? If this plan fails, stand in front of him and blow in his nostrils. In wondering at the ridiculous appearance of a fool under his nose, he may forget the cause of his stubbornness and move on. If he doesn't, let three or four men catch him by the head and drag him along.

If the last is no go, thrash the hide off of him. Do not seek to find out the cause of his balkiness. Don't look under his collar to see if there is a blister, or reason whether the load is too heavy for him. Give him a curse and a blow, instead of a kind word. He is only a dumb brute, and it does not matter. Do not, under any circumstances, give him time to get his wind when he stops after a hard pull, but lay whip on until he is beaten to a standstill. Break his spirit down; let him know that you are master and tyrant, not master and friend.

There is one way some foolish people have of managing a balky horse, and that is to take him out of the shafts, unharness him, walk him up and down a few minutes, then harness again and hitch him up. He will invariably start right off, and not be apt to repeat his trick unless again imposed upon. Try it.—Wallace's Monthly.

ALL SORTS.

English ladies in high life are usually allotted about $2,500 a year for pin money.

This has been a good season for the Newfoundland seal-fishing. It is roughly estimated that 500,000 seals have been taken.

The other day a Muhlenburg (Ky.) farmer plowed up a pot of Indian money, or wampum. He wants it remonetized.

Archery is to be fashionable among the ladies, and very properly; every young lady should know how to manage her beau.

People who have studied the coffee plant, its nature and requisites, are forced to the conclusion that it is simply a waste of time to experiment upon it in any part of the United States.

In Holland, where sand is more plentiful and cheaper than hay, it is used for bedding cows. This is said to keep the animals always entirely clean, and the milk never takes the odor of the stable.

A woman named Marietta Bregulia, living in Vineland, N. J., has just taken out her naturalization papers. This is said to be the first time in the history of the country that a woman has been naturalized.

When they start in to have a big time in Kansas they have a big time generally. The Empire City Echo says: "A lady gave birth to triplets while attending the golden wedding of her parents, at Mound City, recently."

The grandfather of Henry James, Jr., the novelist, was a keen-witted Irish immigrant who had eleven children, and provided all of them with a fortune out of his own accumulation of several million dollars, derived in part from the Syracuse salt works.

Throughout England and Wales the average product per acre of the best farm land is $960 annually. In those countries, as well as in Scotland, the smaller the farms the better they are cultivated, and the larger is the average productiveness per acre.

The Lake Champlain water monster has been seen again, this time by a "trustworthy and temperate farmer." He describes it as having a head like a serpent, and much longer, showing fifteen feet of its body above the water, and making a noise like the discharge of a gun.

Every State in the Union except Louisiana has now a Sunday law of some kind. Many of them simply prohibit labor. In South Carolina the statute provides that all persons "having no reasonable or lawful excuse" shall attend some religious meeting every Sunday.

Health is the ground which great persons cultivate, whereby they exchange the light flying hours into golden usage. To them it is industry represented in its power; the human riches of time. The minute-glass runs willingly sand of centuries when great ideas are in the healthful moments.—Wilkinson.

BESIDE THE BROOK.

"I go a-fishing!" and he sped
With rod and line, where by-paths led,
'Neath latticed boughs, beside the brook
Where fish were lured with cunning hook.
"I'll read in solitude awhile!"
With favorite book, and morning smile,
Through winding ways, she sought the nook
She loved the best, beside the brook.
Later, I passed; the line and book
Were queerly twined, beside the brook;
While, in the grove, the angler's prize
Was reading love songs in his eyes.
—George Birdseye, in Scribner's Monthly.

Carlyle is 80, and more crabbed than ever. He is quoted as saying to an American: "Weel, sir, and so ye come frae that big coontry where the vote of the grandest scoundrel on airth is equal to that of Jesus Christ. And ye think much o' Jarge Washington, but he was no a great mon—he was a good surveyor maybe, but he was no a great mon!"

A Farmington (Me.) man caught a young woodchuck last summer, and kept it until it was as tame as a dog. Last winter it took to the ground and spent the winter like others of its kind. During the time the family moved to another part of the town, but on going back to the old place, the other day, the woodchuck was out and seemed delighted to see his old friends.

The 1800th anniversary of the destruction of Pompeii and Herculaneum by lava from Vesuvius is to be celebrated by a scientific festival this year. The celebration will take place at Pompeii next November, and many foreign archæologists are to be invited to join their Italian brethren on the occasion. We presume a number of American scholars and tourists will be on the ground.

There are more ways than one, as the pastor of a church in Baltimore demonstrated to the satisfaction of such of his hearers as were remiss in their pew rents. He just boarded up their pews, and, when they and their wives and daughters, bristling in silks and satins, came to the sanctuary to worship, they had to seek more retired quarters. The plan worked well, however, and the church is now in funds.

As some lady visitors were going through a penitentiary under the escort of a superintendent, they came to a room in which three women were sewing. "Dear me!" one of the visitors whispered, "what vicious-looking creatures! Pray, what are they here for?" "Because they have no other home; this is our sitting-room, and they are my wife and two daughters," blandly answered the superintendent.

Mr. Robert Bonner has spent $156,700 for geldings and probably more. Thus, he paid for Dexter $33,000, for Edwin Forest $16,000, for Grafton $15,000. Bruno cost him $15,000, the Auburn horse $13,000, Wellesly Boy $12,000, Joe Elliott $10,000, Mambrino Bertie $10,000, Dick Jamieson $10,000, Lantern and Light $9,000, John Taylor $3,500, Centennial $3,000, Keene Jim $2,800, Boston Gray $2,000, Carl Burr $1,200, Honest Peter $1,200.

Farm Work for June

Salt boxes attached to the fences of the pasture, and kept replenished with salt, will be trouble well bestowed.

A run in a good piece of grass will greatly help the calves. The more they are pushed, without over doing it, during the first year's growth, the better the mature animal will be.

A few rubbing-posts set up in pastures will save injuries to the fences. Cattle will use these conveniences very often, if provided for them, and it is worth all the trouble to witness the enjoyment of the cattle in the use of them.

Early blood beets and sugar beets may be sown early this month. Mangels will now require clean culture and vigorous thinnings. Rutabagas may be sown from the 1st to the 25th of this month, upon land that has not been prepared in time for earlier crops.

Pigs for fall killing may be forced from the start. A run at grass, a little milk, and regular, steady feeding on bran and meal slops, will help to make a large growth, which afterward quickly filled up with fat. The low prices now prevailing, must be offset by making more pork than formerly out of the same feed.

Mr. Slick's Bargain.

(Detroit Free Press.)

"New bonnet, new bonnet—twelve dollars for a new bonnet!" exclaimed Mr. Slick the other evening as his wife suggested a change from the winter styles.

"Yes, only twelve dollars," she humbly replied.

"Twelve dollars for a bonnet is a confounded outrage and I know it!" he went on. "Why, I can buy two fine silk hats for that money and have some strawberry change left. It's a dead swindle to ask twelve dollars for a bonnet."

"Well, I can't do any better, Mr. Slick. That's the price, and I must pay or go without."

"You don't know how to buy—that's what ails you!" he growled. "I'll bet money I can buy a $12 bonnet for $8. It's all in knowing how to handle the salesmen."

"I wish you'd try it," she suggested.

"I will—by George! I will! I'll bring you up a new bonnet in the morning, and I'll get it four dollars cheaper than you dare to!"

Mr. Slick was as good as his word. He went into a millinery store next forenoon with his eye-teeth all sharpened, and with the idea in his mind that every bonnet in the store was priced at exactly twelve dollars. He looked around a little, selected a bonnet that pleased him, and pointing his cane at it, and calling up his deepest voice, he inquired:

"Are you asking twelve dollars for that bonnet?"

The woman flushed, looked from the bonnet to the man, and was trying to reply, when he said:

"These are not the times for outrageous prices, and all buyers realize it. I'll give you eight dollars for that bonnet, and not a cent more."

"That—that bonnet"—

"Eight dollars and no more!" he interrupted; and she put the article in a box and took his money.

"What'd I tell my wife, eh?" he whispered as he went out. "I tell you it takes a man to buy goods, no matter whether it's fence-posts or paper cambric!"

When he sat down at home and took the cover off the box and held up the bonnet, Mrs. Slick inquired:

"How much did she charge you?"

"Eight dollars, madam; while you would have paid twelve!"

"Richard!" she said, as she tried to laugh all over at once. "I was with the lady next door when she ordered that bonnet for her cook, and the price was to be four dollars! You see it—"

He held up his finger, counted three fives out of his wallet and left them on a chair for her.

Beautiful Pictures For All.

The great Art Publishing House of George Stinson & Co., of Portland, Maine, moves steadily on in the even tenor of its way, apparently not feeling the dull times. During the year 1878 they sold over four million pictures of all descriptions. They publish every description of fine pictures, and their prices range from ten cents upwards to twenty dollars per copy. Their correspondence for this large business is immense; they receive, on an average, over one thousand letters per day. Messrs. Stinson & Co publish only the better class of pictures, and it is well known that anything coming from this reliable house is of standard merit. We have just received copies of four very fine steel engravings, which they have just brought out. The plates were engraved in London, at an expense of four thousand pounds sterling, or twenty thousand dollars, to which great sum must be added the customs duty of twenty-five per cent. on account of their being imported into the United States. These engravings are after paintings by great modern masters of art, and the artists who engraved the plates stand in the front rank of the world's renowned engravers.

It is believed, and generally conceded, that these engravings make up the finest and most elegant set of works of high art ever brought out by American publishers. This enterprising firm, though many years in the art publishing business, have not grown old and unprogressive, but on the other hand make improvement and progress year by year, giving the people better and better pictures for the same or less money. They may, we feel sure, fairly claim to stand at the head of the Art Publishing business in America. We can only understand the colossal proportions their trade has assumed by remembering that this is a great and mighty nation of nearly fifty million people. We cannot better illustrate the magnitude of their business than to state the amount of money paid by them for postage stamps during the year 1876, 1877, and 1878. We have the figures direct from the firm, or we should think there was some error. In 1876, they paid for postage $33,104.92. In 1877, they paid for postage $37,269.76. In 1878 the amount of money they paid for postage stamps was simply enormous—a little over $50,000.00. Stinson & Co. stand among the largest and most judicious advertisers in the country, and a short time since paid in a single day $24,000.00 in cash on a contract for advertising. They employ agents everywhere throughout the United States and Dominion of Canada for the sale of their pictures by subscription; we call attention to their advertisement for agents in another column. Those who need pleasant, profitable work, should correspond with them.

TUTT'S PILLS CURE PILES.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE FEVER AND AGUE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE BILIOUS COLIC.
TUTT'S PILLS Cure KIDNEY Complaint.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE TORPID LIVER.
TUTT'S PILLS IMPART APPETITE.

DR. TUTT has succeeded in combining in these pills the heretofore antagonistic qualities of a STRENGTHENING PURGATIVE, and a PURIFYING TONIC.

Their first apparent effect is to increase the appetite by causing the food to properly assimilate. Thus the system is nourished, and by their tonic action on the digestive organs, regular and healthy evacuations are produced.

The rapidity with which PERSONS TAKE ON FLESH while under the influence of these Pills, indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, melancholy, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system. Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents. Office 35 Murray Street, NEW YORK.

A Touching Allegory.

[Galveston News.]

A certain good natured old republican farmer, named Hayes, preserved his constant good nature, turn up what might. One day one of his men came in and told him that one of his lead oxen had stampeded, it being that big blond off-ox, Roscoe Conkling. "Well," responded the old farmer, "he always was a breachy cuss. I'm glad he's gone." Not long afterward another messenger came in haste to announce that old Brindle Butler was dead. "You don't say so!" responded the happy old granger. "He was an old ox, anyhow. Just take off his hide and sell it; it will fetch more than he was worth. I took him for a bad debt in the first place." This thing went on for some time, until the stalwart press began to reprimand Hayes, saying that all his losses were judgments sent by the Lord for his wickedness. "Well," he responded placidly, "if the Lord will take out the judgment in that kind of cattle, it is the cheapest way I can pay it."

Who is Caught in the Trap?

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

The democratic majority in congress has compelled the republican conspirators to take a square stand in favor of military interference with elections. The bayonet at the polls is the demand of the republican party. There is no obscuring the fact. It is impossible for them to dodge the issue. They are committed to the infamously odious policy, and will be compelled to explain and defend it before the American people. The conspirators have chuckled not a little over what the democratic majority has accomplished during the extra session, and have given out that every movement has been in the interest of the republican party. But when the day of adjournment comes the conspirators will be likely to comprehend the situation of their party. They will see that they, and not the democrats, have been caught in a trap, and that, in trying to explain Hayes' vetoes, they have been compelled to assume responsibility that will effectually crush their party. The democrats will see to it that every line of the issues are made as vivid as lightning.

What Was Leprosy in the Bible.

Every one knows how large a space is occupied by the Levitical laws regarding leprosy, and most persons who have thought about it have probably been perplexed by the fact. The subject has hitherto been obscure, owing to our insufficient knowledge of the varieties and symptoms of that terrible disease; indeed, it is only within the last few years that medical investigation, carried on in the countries which are its special homes, have cleared up all the debatable features, except, perhaps, its supposed contagiousness, in regard to which the committee of our London College of Physicians "consider that the weight of evidence is decidedly on the negative side," although there is a considerable amount of testimony that "the disease is contagious in a certain stage, when the ulcers are running." Now all this recent information is condensed, from which it appears that the true leprosy of the law was not the common white leprosy. Lepra vulgaris, or dry tetter, did not render the sufferer unclean; but Elephantiasis, under either of its chief forms, the tuberculated and the anaesthetic, the various symptoms of which in their earlier stages are delineated with remarkable accuracy in the rules laid down for the priest's guidance. Should the student of the law wonder why a physical disease should be the subject of such minute religious legislation, he will find enough in these "notes" to convince him that an ample explanation is to be found in the sanitary aspect of the subject. Egypt was in ancient times the chief seat of this most malignant and horrible of diseases, which as a poison in the blood descended from parent to child with a frightful persistence; and the Israelites, in their crowded and servile condition, must have been peculiarly liable to contract it, and carry its fatal germs in their desert wanderings. Hence the necessity, to their prosperous development, of hedging it round with the most stringent restrictions, and by the laws of uncleanness and separation checking its spread through intermarriages between the healthy and the tainted. Of course, we are not precluded from seeing a religious meaning underlying these sanitary ordinances, and, Mr. Clarke accordingly sums up his dissertation by adding that the proper treatment of leprosy as a disease of the body became a type of the proper treatment of sin, not through a mere resemblance which might recommend itself to the fancy, but through the law being an inspired interpretation of the truths of nature.—The Quarterly Review.

Indian Marriages.

The ceremony of marriage among some of the blanket Indians—the Sacs and Foxes, for example—is very touching and effective. It has also the merit of being cheap. The brave, conceiving a liking for some dusky beauty, arrays himself in his best blanket and repairs to her bedside after "dewy eve" has set in. If the girl dislikes him she calls her mother, if she has one, and if not, some other relative, and has him put out. If, on the other hand, she loves him, or thinks she does, he is admitted to privileges that, in christian communities, are deemed infamous until the church and state have given their blessing and their sanction. In the morning the warrior presents his bride with a new dress—a present from his relatives. She accepts it with many thanks. The man leaves for his own house and sends his mother or sister to bring home the girl. She then returns to her own house and gives the new dress to some female relative, takes what belongs to her, goes back to her husband's tepee and all is settled, until one party or the other gets tired of the arrangement. In such case, after waiting a proper period either one can marry again, and keep on marrying and separating to no end. Among the five nations—or, at least, four of them—marriage is about the same as with white christians. Some of the wilder tribes are rank polygamists and pay no heed whatever to marriage ceremonials of any kind.

Horrible Story From Mexico.

[Logansport Journal.]

Last week, in Chihuahua, a woman went into a shoemaker's shop in front of his dwelling and was measured for a pair of shoes. The son of Crispin said to the woman: "You have a verry pretty foot." "Do you think so?" said she. He replied: "Yes; that is the prettiest foot in Mexico." The woman was to come back the next day and leave one dollar, when the shoes were to be commenced. The shoemaker's wife, hearing all, said nothing. The next day the shoemaker was out when the woman with the pretty foot called, according to agreement, and the wife got her into the back room and stabbed her to death. The wife then cut a steak out of the dead woman's leg and packed the body under the bed. The shoemaker came home and ate his dinner. The wife asked him how he liked the meat. He answered that "it was the best he had ever eaten." The wife then told him he had eaten a part of "the prettiest leg in Mexico." He asked her what she meant. She showed him the body under the bed, and made a dash at him with a knife, but he escaped and ran to the Palacio and told the judge what had happened. The judge summond a guard of soldiers and went to the house. He asked the wife if she had committed the murder, and when she answered yes and attempted to justify the act he ordered her to be shot on the spot by the soldiers, and his orders were promptly obeyed.

A Bird's Courtship and Death.

Do birds have a language of their own, and have they any of the emotions of humans?

A lady who lives on Olive street relates the following: A few days ago there fell in front of her window from a tree a "chippy" or ground bird, such as chatter about in parks or streets. It seemed wearied and crippled. She picked it up, carried it in the house, fed it from her own mouth, and at night placed it in the cage with her canary. The canary at once bestowed upon the new comer all of the attention of a mother, and nestled besides the little stranger during the night. In the morning the lady placed the chippy in the window, so that it might have the privilege of regaining its freedom. It plumed its tinny wings and went away. The canary mourned during the day as if he had lost a mate. In the evening the chippy came back and perched upon the window. The sash was raised and it flew in and nestled upon the cage. The canary at once struck up his liveliest notes, and seemed gratified. This was repeated two or three days, the chippy going each morning and returning in the evening.

One day it went away and did not come back. The canary drooped, and the next day fell dead from his perch in the sunshine that played over his gilded cage in the window. That night the chippy returned, and during the evening it mourned over its dead companion. In the morning it clung to the cage until it was turned out. For a few days the empty cage was hung in the window, and on each succeeding evening the chippy returned, and chirped as if it was grief-stricken. One day it brought a petal of a tube-rose in its bill, dropped it in the cage, flew away, and never came back.

Peopling the West.

NEW YORK, June 3.—The movement to send masses of Irish Catholics from the city of New York and Brooklyn, and to settle them on western lands, is creating much excitement in this city, and promises to end in an Irish exodus. The class of persons opposed to it are the politicians, for New York has been made and kept largely democratic by the votes which, if the movement is widespread, will be taken to the western prairies. The priests of the city are enlisted in the movement, the Cardinal gives it his favor, the Bishops are talking for it, and money begins to flow in. The theory of the movement is that in the crowded tenements of the city the Irish race becomes impaired, and the benefits of the multiplication of the Irish fall because of the great harvest of death among them. Being naturally a rural people, the design is to transfer the Irish Catholics in large bodies to settle them on the western lands, where they may till the soil. The practical part of the design contemplates floating a joint stock company with $100,000 capital, already incorporated under the laws of the state of Illinois, and known as the Irish Catholic Colonization Association. About $15,000 of the stock of this company has been placed in the city, and Mr. John Kelly, Eugene Kelly, Father Ducay, Mr. Thomas O'Connor and Father Donnelly have each invested $1,000 in the stock of the company. The investment is said to be a good one, for the money will be paid back in a certain number of years, for the colonists will be required to pay for the land purchased by the association, the improvements put upon it and annual interest. Each farm is to be held by the association as security. No money will be intrusted to the colonist to imprudently squander. The advances to him will be made in the shape of improvements he desires. The association has for each immigrant a quarter-section of land, plowed over the previous summer. They have a cottage already built. The colonist goes upon the place in the spring time, casts in his seed and in four months he has a harvest. The plan does not contemplate relieving New York of the thriftless, absolutely destitute class, or the foisting upon the west of the offscourings of the population of the great city, but the association designs to select those who have already saved up several hundred dollars and to help them on to a road to independence. The scheme does not contemplate aid to Protestants but Mr. Wm. E. Dodge and others are contemplating putting in operation a similar plan for the benefit of poor Protestant Germans, Englishmen and Americans.

An American Chapel in China Sacked.

[Foochow Herald.]

On Sunday, the 16th of February, a mob of over a hundred persons forcibly entered the American Methodist Chapel at Yunch'un, one hundred and forty miles south of Foochow, and violently assaulted the christians who had gathered therein for divine worship. The catechist and congregation escaped to the Magistrate's yamen, leaving the mob in possession of the chapel. The rabble immediately set to work and destroyed the seats, tables, &c. Previous to this attack the people had been called upon by the gentry to subscribe $100 cash—avowedly toward the extermination of christianity in this district. Their modus operandi was to tear down the chapel in the first instance, and subsequently to destroy the houses of the christians—thus forcibly driving them out of the place. But, happily, only part of this programme was carried out. The sufferers by the riot fled to the Magistrate's yamen, where they were kindly received and promised protection.

A few days later the Magistrate went in person to inspect the wrecked chapel. He immediately instituted an examination into the whole affair, and required the offenders to pay all expenses attending the repair of the chapel, to furnish medical aid to the wounded men, and to find six months' security for the lives of the persons assaulted. The man who had been most severely beaten was ordered to receive $30 as compensation, but, with rare disinterestedness, he refused to receive the money, in order that the purity of his motives in becoming a christian should not be doubted. By this prompt action of the Yunch'un Magistrate, and the unselfish conduct of the native christians, not only has peace been restored but also a good state of feeling between the christians and their heathen neighbors secured, the latter for once fully understanding that christians must not be persecuted for refusing to contribute to idolatrous purposes, and also that the higher and nobler principles which they claim to have adopted are entitled to respect and legal recognition.

How the Whale Blows.

The common notion regarding the "blowing" of the whale appears to be that which credits the animal with inhaling large quantities of water into its mouth, presumably in the act of nutrition. This water is then said to escape into the nostrils, and to be ejected therefrom in the act of blowing. The behavior of the whale in the open sea at first sight favors this apparently simple explanation. Careering along in the full exercise of its mighty powers the huge body is seen to dive and to re-appear some distance off at the surface, discharging from its nostrils a shower of water and spray. The observation is correct enough as it stands, but the interpretation of the phenomena is erroneous. Apart from the anatomical difficulties in the way of explaining how water from the mouth could escape in such large quantities, and so persistently, into the nostrils, there is not merely an utter want of purpose in this view of the act of "spouting," but we have also to consider that this act would materially interfere with the breathing of the animal. Hence a more rational explanation of what is implied in the "blowing" of the whales rests on the simple assertion that the water and spray do not in reality proceed from the blow-hole, but consist of water forced upward into the air by the expiratory effort of the animal. The whale begins the expiratory or "breathing-out" action of its lungs just before reaching the surface of the water, and the warm expired air therefore carries up with it the water lying above the head and blow-holes of the ascending animal. That this view is correct is highly probable not merely by the observation of the breathing of young whales and porpoises kept in confinement, but also by the fact that the last portion of the "blow" consists of a white silvery spray or vapor, formed by the rapid condensation of the warm air from the lungs as it comes in contact with the colder atmosphere. The water received into the mouth escapes at the sides of the mouth, and does not enter the nostrils at all.

The Emigration Humbug—A Lost One Hundred Thousand Dollars.

(Boston Post Letter from Tensas Parish, La.)

Labor here is totally disorganized, although no more emigration to Kansas is going on. We hear that the originators of the emigration scheme are so disappointed that they have arranged a plan to send armed steamers down the river to force the negroes away; that parties will be stationed on the banks to fire on these relief boats, making it appear that the planters have prevented the negroes leaving, and have fired on these rescuing steamers. It seems hardly credible, but it would not be half so strange as what has already taken place. In truth, the negroes have not been interfered with in any way whatever; those who wished to, have gone, and I believe in no other spot on earth could people leave their debts unpaid, break contracts and walk off without the slightest opposition. It would be laughable were it not a matter of such terrible importance to hear the negroes demanding protection for life and property; this, too, when in October thousands were raging through these parishes in arms, swearing the extermination of the whites and utter destruction of their property, for no other reason than the stories told them of their re-enslavement, should the democrats, or, better say, the whites, be allowed to vote. It is truly hard that people should suffer such persecution for political purposes, those, too, who have never in any way been disloyal to the United States government. My family, for instance, were not in the south during the war, and my husband was among the first to respond to President Lincoln's call for money by lending one hundred thousand dollars. We had for this property papers of protection from the government; yet, everything, mules, horses, cattle, was taken, vouchers given by the federal officers, yet we can get no claims recognized and have never received remuneration for any of our losses. Some of the returned emigrants from Kansas are at a place near us. They have been most kindly received, given work at once, and advances again made them. They are the happiest creatures it is possible to imagine.

* * *

An exchange says: "The two Ohio brigadiers have created quite a rumpus in the republican camp. The republicans sent for old Zach to come and help them during the campaign—old Zach Chandler, we mean, who, in a late patriotic eruption in the senate, said he saw the Union army 'go through' Washington and 'come back again,' but he did not seem to ever have any business 'with' that army. He is the man who will electioneer against the Ohio brigadiers—one of them has only one leg."

ARROW-HEADS.

How the Indians Made Them.

A young man in the Smithsonian Institute, writes the Washington correspondent of the Cleveland Leader, has just made public the discovery of the method employed in making the stone and volcanic glass arrow-heads, daggers, knives, axes and razors of the prehistoric races. Up to this time this has been a great problem to all antiquarian students, but no theory has ever been advanced showing so practical results as Cushing's. He started to solve the difficulty by putting himself in the identical position of the Aztecs or mound builders—without anything to work with except sticks, various shaped stones such as he could find on the banks of any stream, and his hands. After making some rude implements by chipping one flint with another he discovered that no amount of chipping would produce surfaces like the best of those which he was trying to imitate. He therefore came to the conclusion that there was another way of doing it, and, by chance, tried pressure by the point of a stick, instead of chipping by blows of a stone; when, presto! he found that he could break stone, flint and obsidian in any shape he chose. Soon he had made spearheads and daggers that would cut like a razor, as good as any he had before him, which had been picked up from all over the world. By a little more observation, he found that the "flaking," which he calls his process, on the old arrow-head left grooves that all turned one way. He produced a like result by turning his stick the easiest way from right to left. He therefore concludes that the prehistorics were right-handed people like ourselves. This conclusion is reinforced by the fact that occasionally an arrow-head is found that has flakes running from left to right, showing a left-handed person. The importance of the discovery is that it shows that the early races were able to do this work without the use of iron or bronze, a thing long doubted.

A New View of the Exodus.

One of the most prominent promoters of the colored emigration scheme recently said that homes had already been secured for 10,000 southern negroes in Indiana, a large share of whom were republican voters, and that it was not improbable that by this means the state would be carried for the republican party in the presidential contest next year. This is doubtless an over sanguine view of the situation, but it may serve as a basis for working out the problem on a wider field.—New York Sun.

We have had information from some of the lower counties which corroborates the above somewhat. We advise our democratic friends to be watchful and active. The republicans have already begun the campaign in Indiana for 1880. A wealthy, active man has been already appointed chairman of the state committee, with a wide-awake executive committee to second his efforts. He, like "Charlie" Foster, has a good deal of business in New York, and flits backward and forward frequently. It may be that he has a large amount of private business on hand; but then, if he has, why make him chairman of the republican state committee. It behooves Indiana democrats to be on the alert. As to the tide of southern negroes coming in this direction, we believe we have enough laborers in the state to take full care of its agricultural interests—perhaps already more than enough. If they are brought here, it is with the hope that the state may be secured to the republicans next year.—State Sentinel.

(Last Week.)

—And behold Balaam's ass has kicked the "Rocky Mountain Goat" clear out of time—he was so completely paralyzed that he was unable to come to time on the "second round."

—The railroad company is doing more work here at present, in repairs, than was ever done at any one time since the town was located.

—Mr. B. F. Lowther, of Baltimore, arrived here last week to act as assistant general foreman—also, Mr. D. H. Baily, of Zanesville, Ohio, as foreman in the boiler shop. Seven journeymen also were added to the list of employes here last week, chiefly from Baltimore, which was not done to fill vacancies caused by discharges, but to meet the demand caused by an increase of business.

—The future prospects of the town were never better than at present, and business has been remarkably lively on the B. & O. this season.

—There is a good opening here at present for a good live and well-informed journalist, to publish a newspaper in the interest of the town. One who will attend to his own business would be patronized by our citizens. X.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

EDWARD PARR, who killed his daughter, Mrs. Susan Irwin, in Philadelphia, was convicted on Saturday of murder in the first degree. "Good," he exclaimed, when the jury brought in the verdict. "Let me hang on Monday."

EDWARD PARR, who was under sentence of death at Philadelphia for brutally murdering his daughter, committed suicide by swallowing poison.

A STROKE of lightning precipitated a disastrous conflagration at Point Breeze, near Philadelphia, last week. Five vessels, 1,000,000 gallons of oil, 1,000 feet of wharf, an immense cooper-shop, the largest tin-can factory in the country and several warehouses were burned. The loss is estimated at about $1,000,000.... A horrible and mysterious murder startled the people of New York last week. A wealthy lady, Mrs. Hall, living in a large mansion in an aristocratic quarter of the city, was murdered during the night, presumably for the purpose of robbery. When discovered, the murdered woman was bound hand and foot, gagged and blindfolded.

AN explosion of fire-damp in a mine at Coaldale, Pa., killed two men and injured several.

THE WEST.

INFORMATION received by the Indian Bureau at Washington, from Fort Belknap, states that 800 lodges of Sitting Bull's Indians are reported south of the British line. They have not as yet committed any acts of direct hostility.... A dispatch from Santa Fe, New Mexico, reports that "some United States soldiers of the Fifteenth Infantry, stationed at Fort Bliss, crossed the international boundary to Paso del Norte and got into a row with the Mexicans, in which two soldiers were killed and several wounded before they could recross the Rio Grande."

THE Episcopal Diocese Convention, in session at Detroit last week, elected Rev. Dr. S. S. Harris, of Chicago, to fill the vacancy caused by the displacement of Bishop McCoskry.

TWO HIGHWAYMEN perpetrated a bold robbery in Chicago a few days ago. Two messengers were sent from the Illinois Central railroad office to one of the banks with a package of money. While walking along Washington street, in the very heart of the city, they were attacked by two footpads. The messenger who carried the package was knocked down with a sand-club, while his companion was blinded with pepper; the package, containing about $9,000, was seized, and before the passers-by could realize the nature of the transaction the thieves, with the money, had driven out of sight in a buggy which was waiting for them.

A SCOUT who recently arrived at Fort Keogh from Sitting Bull's camp reports that the chief has gone with six lodges and his immediate attendants to the Saskatchewan country. Before going he advised his band to come to terms with the Government and return to the United States. There are now 300 lodges encamped on the boundary line, hunting buffalo on this side. They say they are determined to hold this buffalo country, by force if necessary.

A DISPATCH from the West reports that "the coach from Deadwood" for Sidney was stopped near the Cheyenne river by five masked robbers. The passengers, four in number, were robbed of their money and valuables. The mail-sacks were cut open and their contents thrown on the road, the robbers taking the registered packages. Having made a successful "clean-up," the robbers allowed the coach to proceed on its northward journey.

THE footpads who recently knocked down a messenger of the Illinois Central railroad in the streets of Chicago, in broad daylight, and robbed him of $10,000, have been arrested and a considerable portion of the money recovered.

THE twenty-first saengerfest of the North American Saengerbund began at Cincinnati on Wednesday, the 11th of June, and, lasting five days, wound up on Sunday, the 15th, with an out-door musical fete. The chorus was nearly 2,000 strong, comprising all the local societies, and visiting clubs from all over the West, besides some from the East.

A RECENT dispatch from Kansas City says: "The war between the Southwestern lines on the Kansas City passenger business is being fought with a fury and determination worthy of a better cause. The rates from Kansas City to Chicago have been reduced to 50 cents, and it is stated that some of the roads are now getting out chromos to be given to travelers as an inducement, in case the rates should go down still lower."

THE SOUTH.

THE Arkansas editors, at their recent convention at Little Rock, decided to make an excursion to Chicago and the Northwest, starting about the 1st of next month.

DISPATCHES from Savannah, Ga., give meager particulars of a bloody conflict in Liberty county, in that State, between a negro militia company and a party of negro excursionists, in which about ten of the participants were killed and a large number wounded.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE PARKER, at Fort Smith, Ark., has sentenced to be hung, Aug. 29, Henry Stuart and William Elliott for a murder committed in the Indian Territory.

GENERAL.

HANGED: At St. Catherines, Mo., John Bland, aged 23, for the murder of his brother-in-law, Elijah Ward; at Hillsboro, Mo., Monroe Guy (colored), for the murder of another colored man named Aaron McPete, on Christmas night last; in Norwich, N. Y., Felix McCann, aged 70, for the murder of James M. Hatch in December, 1878.

A RECENT telegram from Eagle Pass, on the Rio Grande, in Texas, says that a company of Mexican infantry at Piedras Negras, on the Mexican side, mutinied and fought their way through the guard at the gate. About fifteen crossed to Eagle Pass under a heavy fire from the loyal troops, who continued firing after the deserters landed. The fugitives surrendered their arms to the citizens, and were subsequently returned to Mexico. A number of the mutineers were killed on the Mexican side. The cause of the desertion is that the troops have been six months without pay and have nothing to eat.

AT a meeting of railroad managers in New York last week, freight rates were advanced 5 cents per 100 pounds on grain, fourth class, flour and live hogs from Chicago to New York, and in equal proportions from all other points.

WASHINGTON.

CHAIRMAN SPARKS, of the House Military Committee, says that it is not the intention of his committee to take action on the Fitz-John Porter papers, which were recently referred to Congress by the President, until the regular session.

WASHINGTON dispatches say that the nomination of Secretary McCrary for Circuit Judge in place of Dillon will meet with strong opposition, and perhaps defeat, in the Senate. It is reported that a successor will not be nominated for the Secretary until the question of the judgeship is settled.

FOUR members of the Senate Committee on Elections are opposed to any further interference with the case of Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, against whom charges of corruption were made some time ago by members of the Kansas Legislature. An equal number of the committee members think the matter should be investigated. The odd man is Senator Ingalls himself. There will consequently be no investigation.... Fire-bugs are again annoying the people of Columbus, Ohio. Five incendiary fires occurred in one night, last week.

POLITICAL.

THE Workingmen of California recently held a State convention at San Francisco, at which Dennis Kearney presided. A ticket for State officers, headed by William F. White for Governor, was placed in the field.

THE Greenbackers of Minnesota met at St. Paul on the 10th inst., organized by electing Ignatius Donnelly to preside, adopted a platform, and nominated the following candidates for State officers: Governor, Asa Barton; Lieutenant-Governor, Wm. Meighan; Treasurer, Andrew Nelson; Secretary of State, N. P. Lane; Attorney General, W. P. Kelly; Railroad Commissioner, Ebenezer Ayers.... A State Convention of the Prohibitionists of Minnesota was held at the same time and place, and a full State ticket nominated, with Rev. W. W. Satterlee at the head for Governor.

THE Iowa Republican Convention assembled at the State capital June 11, and organized by electing ex-Senator Harlan to preside. Gov. Gear and Lieut. Gov. Campbell were nominated for re-election by acclamation; Judge Beck was renominated for Supreme Judge, and Mr. Von Coelln for Superintendent of Public Instruction.

FOREIGN.

THE intention of the Spaniards to establish themselves on the coast of Borneo has provoked a vigorous remonstrance from the English, who believe themselves the owners of pre-emptive rights in the great island.... The German Government has decided to address other European Governments on the subject of the improper, and in some cases inhuman, manner in which the war in South America is carried on by the belligerent states, and to suggest a joint interference.

BERLIN dispatches report that the Government is considering the advisability of increasing the strength of the army, being incited thereto by the growth of the French and Russian military establishments.... Solovieff, who attempted the assassination of the Russian Czar in April last, was tried at St. Petersburg last week, convicted, sentenced, and executed, all on the same day.

THE Chamber of Deputies, the other day, by a vote of 306 to 195, authorized the prosecution by the Government of Paul de Cassagnac, after a scene of great excitement, during which Gambetta moved the expulsion of de Cassagnac from the House, but he afterwards withdrew the motion, M. de Cassagnac having withdrawn the word "cowardice," which he had applied to the conduct of the Government.... The legislative body of the Orange Free State, in South Africa, has adopted resolutions expressing a hope that the independence of Transvaal will be restored.... A Rome dispatch says the eruption of Mount Ætna has ceased, but the volcano continues to give forth smoke.

THE Emperor and Empress of Germany celebrated their golden wedding on the 11th of June.

THE Bishop of Amiens (France) is dead.... The Czar of Russia, it is stated, renounced his contemplated visit to the German Emperor because he feared assassination.

A PARIS dispatch chronicles the death of the Prince of Orange, heir apparent to the throne of the Netherlands.... John Ennis, the Chicago pedestrian, now in England, has made a hero of himself by saving the lives of two women who fell into the river Thames.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Herald, at Alexandria, Egypt, says: "After a seven months' campaign, Capt. Gessi returns north completely victorious. The revolt has been crushed, and with it must go down the slave traffic which has outraged civilization for half a century. In all seven pitched battles were fought on the Gazelle river, the slave-traders and rebels combining against Gessi. All the slave stations were destroyed, and the establishment of civilized rule will prevent any further raids from the region of the Gazelle."

A PORTION of the German Asiatic squadron has been ordered to the coasts of Chili and Peru, for the purpose of protecting German interests from the barbarism of Chilian naval officers.... A dispatch from Belgrade reports that the Russo-Bulgarian authorities, with a body of Russian troops, have taken forcible possession of the frontier districts claimed by Servia, driving out the Servian officials. The population are angry and discontented at the action of the Russians.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

At a meeting of the Senate Finance Committee, held on the 6th inst., it was decided, by a vote of 4 to 3, to postpone action on the Warner Silver bill until December next. There was considerable feeling among the silver men over the action of the committee, and when the Senate met Mr. Coke offered a resolution to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill, and to declare the bill before the Senate for action. Messrs. Edmunds, Whyte and others objected, and the resolution went over. The Senate then took up, and, after a sharp debate, passed the bill repealing the jurors' test oath—yeas, 25; nays, 16—a strict party vote.——The Army Appropriation bill was reported to the House. It is substantially the same as the vetoed bill, except the sixth section, for which is substituted a clause providing that no money appropriated in this act is appropriated, or shall be paid, for the subsistence, equipment, transportation or compensation of any portion of the army of the United States to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls at any election held within any State.

There was no session of the Senate on the 7th inst., and little or nothing was done in the House, the day being devoted to the bill making additional appropriations for the Postoffice Department, which was finally passed.

In the Senate, on the 9th inst., Mr. Coke's resolution to discharge the Finance Committee from further consideration of the Warner Silver bill, and to declare it before the Senate for action, was laid before the Senate, but on motion of Mr. Voorhees was laid over. The McDonald bill authorizing the employment of the militia and land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases was taken up, and Mr. Harris made a speech in support of the bill.——The House made short work with the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill. It was reported by the committee, and immediately passed, under a suspension of the rules, by a vote of 168 yeas to 21 nays.——There was a caucus of Democratic Senators, in the evening, to consider what action should be taken on the Warner Silver bill, but no definite agreement was reached. The silver men expressed great indignation at the refusal of the Finance Committee to report the bill.

The Senate, on the 10th, unanimously passed the House resolution appropriating $3,000 to erect a monument to mark the birthplace of George Washington. The bill relating to vinegar factories established and operated prior to March 1, 1879, was passed. It provides that such factories may be operated for the manufacture of vinegar by alcoholic vapor within 600 feet of a distillery, under regulations by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senate, by the close vote of 21 yeas to 20 nays, refused to take up Mr. Coke's resolution discharging the Finance Committee from further consideration of the Warner Silver bill, and declaring it before the Senate for action.——In the House, Mr. Morrison, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a resolution, which was adopted, providing for the final adjournment of Congress at noon on the 17th of June. The Judicial Appropriation bill was passed by the House in the same shape in which it was prepared by authority of the Democratic Advisory Committee and reported by the Appropriation Committee. It makes no provision for the payment of election Supervisors and Deputy Marshals, and specifically prohibits the payment of any part of the appropriations to these officers, and the making of any engagement to pay them. Various amendments by the Republicans were promptly voted down by the Democrats. The bill passed by a strictly party vote.

In the Senate, on the 11th, the Committee on Appropriations reported back the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill as passed by the House, with a large number of amendments, the aggregate effect of which is to make it conform substantially to the recently-vetoed bill of the same title, divested of the political sections, and omitting, also, the appropriation for judicial expenses contained in that measure, and all increase of salaries therein proposed for the benefit of clerks and bureau officers in the various executive departments. Mr. Hill, of Georgia, addressed the Senate at length, in reply to Mr. Blaine's late speech.——The House, after a warm debate, passed the Democratic Caucus Army Appropriation bill. A number of amendments were offered—including one reducing the army to 15,000 men—and promptly rejected. Only 31 votes were recorded against the bill, to 178 yeas. Mr. Stephens, from the Coinage Committee, reported a bill for the adoption of the metric system of weights, measures and coinage, which was ordered printed and recommitted. The bill previously passed by the Senate relating to vinegar factories was passed by the House. Mr. Carlisle reported the bill directing the Attorney General to adjust or compromise the claim of the United States under the will of Joseph S. Lewis. Passed. This is the case in which Lewis, formerly of Hoboken, N. J., left an estate of about $1,000,000 to be applied to the reduction of the national debt. Mr. Knott, from the Judiciary Committee, submitted the report of that committee on the veto message of the President. Printed and recommitted. The report begins with an allusion to the danger to be apprehended from the presence of armed troops at the ballot-box, and says: "Even the author of the message under consideration himself admits that any military interference whatever at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and would tend to destroy the freedom of elections. The present Congress, in the exercise of its undoubted right to prescribe the purpose for which the land and naval forces of the Government shall be used, saw proper in making appropriations for the support of the army to enact that it should not only be a clearly unlawful, but penal, offense for any Federal officer to employ troops or armed men at State elections for any purpose whatever, except to repel armed enemies of the United States. That bill the President returned to the House of Representatives without his signature. His reasons for objecting to the bill seem to have been these: First, that, in his judgment, the repeal of the clause in question was unnecessary; second, because it would 'prohibit all civil officers of the United States from employing the only adequate civil force to enable them to preserve the peace and execute certain laws at Congressional elections;' and, third, because the manner in which the repeal was proposed did not happen in that particular instance to be in harmony with Executive taste; and was therefore considered by the author of the message as furnishing a suitable occasion to deliver to the House of Representatives a gratuitous lecture upon the methods in which it should discharge its constitutional functions. As the President has twice called the attention of the House to these objections, the first two may be referred to hereafter, but with regard to the third it is, perhaps, sufficient to say that the manner in which Congress chose to repeal the clause in question was not only in strict conformity to the constitution and rules of the two houses respectively, but justified by numerous precedents in the annals of Federal legislation. Impressed with the importance of removing the last shadow of a pretext for any interference with State elections by armed forces of the United States, and desiring to obviate, if possible, the President's objections to the measure already proposed for that purpose, the House of Representatives promptly passed a separate bill, which was as promptly concurred in by the Senate, simply providing that it should not be lawful to bring to or employ at any place where a general or special election is being held in any State any part of the army or navy, unless such forces should be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, or to enforce section 4, article 4, of the constitution, and laws made in pursuance thereof, and repealing all provisions inconsistent with the purposes of the bill. This bill was speedily returned with a message from the President, assigning his objections to its approval, which are now to be considered. The first of these objections is a simple repetition of the one assigned in the message vetoing the Army Appropriation bill. No one can read the two messages together without being struck by the marked difference in the tone of the two documents in respect to this objection."

Mr. Knott points out the difference between the two messages, and continues:

"The entire argument against the necessity of the bill is left to rest upon the President's reiterated assertion that troops have not been and will not be used to interfere with any State election during his administration; that the assertion was no doubt sincere, but, unfortunately for its validity as a reason for refusing to approve a bill designed for the protection of future generations, as well as this, the official term of the present Executive is limited, and he may be succeeded by one who will feel a less scrupulous regard for the freedom and purity of the ballot than he professes himself to entertain. The next objection to the approval of the bill, as alleged in the message, is that it would abrogate on certain days and at certain places a number of laws, but especially section 5,298 of the Revised Statutes, which is reverently referred to as 'an ancient and fundamental law which has been in force from the foundation of the Government,' and seems to be regarded by the President as invested with some peculiar sanctity, not pertaining to any other provision in the entire system of American jurisprudence. He enlarges upon the statement that this section was sanctioned by Washington, Jefferson and Lincoln, and contains the principle which was acted upon by the four Presidents more endeared to the American people than all others at the most critical periods in their respective administrations. If he had examined the facts connected with the transactions to which he alludes, he would have found that neither of the four illustrious patriots and statesmen to whom he refers either did or proposed to do anything which would not have been perfectly lawful under the strictest letter of the bill he returned to the House, had it been in force at that time. He would have discovered, moreover, that neither of them ever construed either of the acts cited by him as conferring upon the President or any of his subordinates any arbitrary or extra-legal power, but merely as authorizing the use of the necessary means for securing the execution of the law in the regular methods, and through the agencies prescribed by law."

In support of his assertion, Mr. Knott refers to the action of Washington in the Whisky Insurrection, of Jefferson in the Aaron Burr case, of Jackson in 1832, and Lincoln in the outbreak of the Civil War, and adds:

"Owing, perhaps, to the limited time he allowed himself in which to prepare his message, the President failed to observe the fact that the various statutes to which he refers, including section 5,298, are as completely abrogated or suspended by the act approved by President Lincoln on the 27th of February, 1865, as they possibly could be by the bill to prevent military interference with elections, had he returned it to the House with his approval. He seems to have totally forgotten that the law approved by Lincoln on the 27th of February, 1865, making it a high misdemeanor in him or other officers of the United States to employ armed men at a State election except for two specified purposes, was still in force, and that it was as much his duty under his official oath to see that it should be faithfully executed as any other provision in the statutes."

The report affirms that the power to establish police regulations which may be necessary for the preservation of domestic order and the prevention of violence and crime affecting the life or property within their respective limits belongs exclusively to the States, and the Federal Government can only intervene to protect the State in the execution of its own laws for the purpose upon application of the Legislature or Governor, where the Legislature cannot be convened. Supreme Court decisions are quoted in support of this position, and the following extract from a letter of the present Secretary of State while Attorney General under a former administration, sent by him to the Marshal of Florida on the 20th of August, 1868:

"The special duty and authority in the execution of a process issued to you must not be confounded with the duty and authority of suppressing disorder and preserving the peace, which, under our Government, belongs to the civil authorities of the States, and not to the civil authorities of the United States."

The report continues:

"To prevent the substitution of the petty discretion of superserviceable Federal officials for the law, the soldier with his bayonet for the civil officer with his warrant, and other dangerous abuses to which the recent experience of our country has shown it to be liable, was the sole object and would have been the only effect of the bill to prevent military interference at the polls, which the President found it impossible to approve.

"The third and final objection offered by the President to the bill is, to use his own language, 'its discrimination in favor of the State and against the national authority.' Under the constitution, the Federal Government has not, and no law of Congress can give it authority to preserve the peace in a State, either at the polls or elsewhere, unless called upon by proper State authorities for that purpose under the circumstances for which the constitution was provided. How, therefore, there could possibly be a discrimination against an authority that does not and cannot exist, it is difficult to see. It is equally impossible to discover how a distinct reservation of the power of the President to suppress an insurrection against the Government of a State at any time or place when properly called upon can be said to derogate from the authority of the United States. There is a single consideration sufficient in itself to show that the fears expressed by the President that the bill would subordinate national to State authority were totally unfounded, but which seems singularly enough to have escaped his observation. Under the law as it now stands, and has stood since 1795, the President is not bound to call for the militia, or to employ the land or naval forces of the United States to suppress every riot or popular tumult in a State, although called upon by the Legislature or Executive for that purpose. If the President should have reason to believe that force was not called for in good faith, to suppress an insurrection against the Government of the state, but to be used for any purpose in any manner inimical to the United States, it would not only be his right, but his duty, to withhold it."

Mr. Wallace, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported to the Senate, on the 12th, without amendment, the House bill making appropriations for certain judicial expenses. Mr. Beck offered an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, for the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill. It was ordered printed. The bill continuing the pension of the late Gen. Shields ($100 a month) to his widow and children, with an amendment granting a pension of $50 a month to the widow of the late Fletcher Webster, was passed. The Army Appropriation bill was received from the House. Mr. Blaine addressed the Senate on the McDonald bill, his remarks consisting chiefly of a reply to the speech of Mr. Hill, of Georgia.——In the House, a bill was reported from the Committee on Civil-Service Reform, prohibiting officers of, claimants against, or contractors under the United States from contributing money for political purposes. The Senate bill repealing the jurors' test oath was called up in the House, but the Republicans filibustered to prevent action on the bill, refusing to vote on the call for the previous question.——The Senate Judiciary Committee has referred to the sub-committee, consisting of Messrs. Garland, Bayard, Conkling and Carpenter, an important question raised in regard to Secretary McCrary's nomination for the Circuit Judgeship which is to be vacated by Judge Dillon next September. The novel question is whether a nomination can constitutionally be confirmed to fill a vacancy not yet created, if at the same time it be stipulated that the person so nominated is to continue to occupy another office until the position to which he is prospectively appointed shall have actually become vacant by resignation or otherwise. The committee defer action upon Secretary McCrary's nomination until after they pass upon this general question.

IT is rumored that the eldest daughter of N. P. Banks is studying for the stage. Her father was an actor in a small way in his youth.

MISS BESSIE EVARTS, the third daughter of the Secretary of State, is engaged to Mr. Edward Perkins, of the Senior class at Harvard University.

PARIS papers take it for granted that every prominent American is a Senator. La Liberte spoke of Col. Thomas A. Scott as President of the Senate, and now, strangest of all, Figaro speaks of Mark Twain as a Senator.

JOSEPH A. GOULD died in Enfield, Me., lately, and an autopsy showed that death was caused by a splinter of bone, about the size of a match, which had penetrated his brain from a wound received during the civil war in 1865 and remained there ever since.

Eleven Children Poisoned.

The entire school district known as the Jacobs' Mills district, at Newark, ten miles from here, numbering twenty children, drank water from a brook poisoned by the carcasses of dead horses and sheep, also potato tops on which paris green had been used, they being thrown into the brook. Seventeen children were taken down and eleven are dead. Edward Morse lost two, Fred Simon one, L. Wilson one, Mr. Park one, John Cole one, John Aldrich five, thus taking his entire family of five children. Mrs. Aldrich is hopelessly insane. The children suffered untold agonies, and after death the bodies became putrid and required immediate burial. Work has been suspended and great excitement prevails. The teacher of the school noticed something wrong about the taste of the water and forbade its use in the school, but seventeen of the scholars used it, and were stricken down within twenty-four hours. One of these children, a son of Mr. Hudson, pulled through. Just above the school house was a field of potatoes last season, and paris green was used extensively to exterminate potato bugs. The potato tops were dumped into the barnyard of Horace Cheney, who built a drain from the barn-yard to the brook; he also buried a colt in the spring of 1878, on the edge of the brook, and the flowing water washed out part of the carcass. A Mr. Simpson, who has lost one child, objected to the colt's being buried there, and caused Cheney to move it elsewhere, which was done, but it was buried in a swamp only fifty feet from the brook, and the water of which ran into the brook. Cheney remarked that he guessed he hadn't bettered it much. Violent threats are freely expressed toward Cheney.—Island Pond (Vt.) Cor. Boston Herald.

A QUAKERESS, at a funeral in Rockville, Ind., said that the spirit moved her to undertake a sermon, and that she was encouraged to speak. But she began by telling the mourners that the dead man was in eternal torment, and they had her arrested.

TYPICAL OCCURRENCES.

AT Ironton, Ohio, the other day, Samuel Mountain, aged 45, a nail-plate shearer, was grinding a shear-knife at a large grindstone, when it exploded, breaking to pieces, one of which struck him upon the side of the head, breaking his neck and killing him instantly.

TWO MONROE (Mo.) boys who had seen their father kill a hen by chopping her head off, thought they would like to try an experiment in the same direction, substituting a human being for a hen. So a little boy about their own age was laid on a plank and one of the others went after the ax, which he secured, and was returning to deal the fatal blow when he was discovered, and the ax, which was a sharp one, taken from him.

A KENTUCKY girl and her lover had vainly tried for four years to elope together. They were Thomas Owen and Miss Kate Sanford, of Milburn. A few nights ago Miss Kate bravely jumped out of a window. She broke one of the small bones near the ankle, but Tom got away with her, and she was held on her feet while the marriage ceremony was performed by a sympathizing clergyman. Surely such persistence should win the parental blessing.

MR. JAMES W. CHISOLM'S house in Brooklyn, N. Y., was entered by the second-story window one night recently, and $60 in money and a pair of bracelets were stolen. The door-bell of the house was rung violently a few nights subsequently. There was a yellow envelope hanging to the door-knob by a string. The stolen bracelets were in the envelope, and with them the following note: "Mrs. Chisolm, I am sorry I had to take the money. It was to bury a dead child."

JERRY SHILT was one of the loafers of West Baltimore, Ohio, yet he was the accepted suitor of Mary Brittenbaugh, a highly respectable lady. The neighbors were not willing to let her have her own way in the matter, but determined to put an end to the courtship. On three successive evenings Jerry was dragged out of Miss Brittenbaugh's parlor by masked men, but on the fourth evening he was there as usual. The next measure was to tar and feather him; and that kept him away from the house several days, but he called again as soon as he was clean. On emerging he was fired at from an ambush, the bullet going through his hat. The incident appears to have roused him to the necessity of action, and he eloped with Miss Brittenbaugh on the following night.

A REVENUE officer, named Cotton, mysteriously disappeared from Gainesville, Ga., two years ago. The disappearance of Cotton had almost been forgotten until a few days ago, when James Bryant, his brother-in-law, lying at the point of death, confessed the crime and prayed for pardon. He said he tried to get Cotton to drink poison, but failed. This exasperated him, and one day he found Cotton in a blackberry patch, when he struck him a fatal blow on the head, took the body and buried it under his distillery, with a pistol and the bottle of poison. Bryant died and some gentlemen searched for Cotton. According to the dying man's confession, they found a human skeleton with the skull badly broken, and by it lay a pistol and bottle.

MR. MUNROE, of Meredith, Mo., was a strong disciplinarian in his own household, and prided himself on the obedience of his family. His children were accustomed to the rod from their cradles until they quitted the parental roof, and it was even said that he whipped his wife on several occasions. But he was of high standing in the community, and when, a few days ago, he spoke in a church meeting of the duty of fathers in training their offspring, he was very attentively listened to. On his way home he met his son George, who had been fishing on Sunday, and gave the boy a cruel beating—perhaps to illustrate the subject that he had been discussing in church. George went to a neighbor's house, borrowed a gun, and shot his father dead.

FROM the Graham County (Kan.) Star: Miss Nettie C. Carpenter, a young lady from Michigan, had quite an adventure last Wednesday. She has taken herself a claim, and built thereon a very neat stone dug-out, roofed with poles and dirt. To keep the dirt from falling down she put heavy paper on the under side of the poles, and, hearing a rattling noise on the paper, she thought that the mice were at work. She got the broomstick and gave the paper a gentle tap, when, instead of mice, as the young lady thought, she brought down a hissing viper. His vipership immediately took possession of the bed and coiled himself for a fight, but he got more of it than he could stand, and had to succumb to the courage of Miss Nettie. He measured four feet in length. How many of your Eastern ladies would have fought and killed it with a broomstick?

A REMARKABLE suicide is reported in the Philadelphia newspapers. Harry Ackley, aged only 12 years, hung himself in the House of Refuge there. For attempting to escape from the institution he had been placed in solitary confinement, on bread and water, in a dark and unfurnished cell. He had been kept there a week, being taken out each day for a little air and exercise. He had piteously entreated for release when last locked up, and when the door was again opened he was found hanging by his suspenders and dead. He had taken his own way of obtaining release. It appears that, though the officials knew who and where was the boy's father, the father himself knew nothing of the whereabouts of his child until informed of the suicide.

A LAWYER in Dayton, Ohio, had in his office a particularly industrious student. One of the clients was a young and pretty woman, and her consultations with the lawyer were always held in his private room, behind closed doors. The student became anxious to learn about the case that required so much secret discussion. He peeped and listened at the keyhole, and was rewarded by the knowledge that, while the legal business related to the collection of a small debt, most of the interviews were devoted to courtship. The lawyer desired the woman to marry him, while she, being wealthy, feared that his motive was mercenary. On the occasion of her next call the lawyer was not in, and the student politely informed her that, although he had not been admitted to the bar, he was confident that he could deal satisfactorily with her case. She said no, but he persisted, popped the question on the spot, urged his suit eloquently, and was accepted. The lawyer, in revenge, tried to whip him, and that was how the story got out.

THE Saundersville (Ga.) Courier furnishes this pleasant little dog story: "A very intelligent pointer that was owned by a gentleman in this county was so well trained that his master could send him home with a note for anything, and he always attended to his mission with the utmost promptness. One day his master, while walking around his premises, found a loose plank on his fence, and sent the dog to the house with a note for a hammer and some nails. His mistress put the hammer and nails in a basket and gave them to the pointer. On returning to his master he had to cross a narrow stream of water. Reaching the stream, he gave one bound and was over. His owner, who was in sight, saw him set the basket down and commence to jump from the bank into the stream. He continued this performance so long that his master hastened to the spot to see what it all meant. He discovered that in jumping the stream the dog dropped the hammer from the basket into the water and was diving after it."

Intemperate Temperance.

The National Temperance Institute met in Republican Hall yesterday to reorganize, the officers elected last Sunday having declined to serve. Ex-Vice President Walford presided, and asked the pleasure of the meeting. A member asked what was the financial condition of the society. The report of Mrs. Conklin, the Financial Secretary, was read as an answer. The receipts for the last three months were $559.25; expenses, $580.91, showing a deficit of $21.66.

Mrs. Wilson—"Where is the money? How is it accounted for? I claim it has been expended illegally."

Mrs. Conklin—"I deny the charge, and it is such persons as Mrs. Wilson that has destroyed the influence of this society. [Turning to Mrs. Wilson and shaking her finger.] You stole cold victuals from our tea-party, saying you were going to take them to your washerwoman, when you never did, but put them on your own table."

Mrs. Wilson—"It is not so. I didn't spend $12,000 of other's people's money, either. [In an undertone.] She's a barefaced old thing and ought to be tarred and feathered."

Mrs. Lusk—"If you don't stop all this, Mrs. Wilson, I'll call in a policeman. You are making all the disturbance."

Mrs. Wilson—"Where's that dollar that my husband advanced to the janitor? You have not given him credit for it." [Exit Mrs. Wilson, to return in a few minutes and take a seat in the back part of the hall.]

Mr. Conklin—"I think with such members as this society has got it ought to die. That woman ought to be prosecuted for making such charges against me. For shame! For shame! to let this society die! Go on and show to the world that you can live without Mr. or Mrs. Wilson."

Mr. Able—"This whole disturbance is caused by Mr. Wilson's great liberality to the organization, contrary to the wishes of Mrs. Wilson."

Mr. Wilson—"I am sorry that such remarks have been made here. I will not sit and listen to them."

After thanking ex-President Gibbs for coming to their rescue, and becoming responsible for the expenses of the meeting, the society became extinct.—New York Sun.

AUBURN COURIER.

THEO. REED, ROB. J. LOWRY } EDITORS.

THE new-born zeal of the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh in favor of the bill for legalizing the marriage with a deceased wife's sister is said to find inspiration in the wish of the Queen that her daughter Beatrice should marry the widowed Prince Louis of Hesse and take charge of the children of her deceased sister, the Princess Alice. Any wish of the Queen is regarded as a command by all her children.

THE trial of the three Internationalists, Innocenti, Colza and Franciolini, accused of throwing Orsini bombs among the crowd of mourners on the occasion of the funeral ceremony of Victor Emmanuel at Florence on the 9th of February, 1878, whereby eight persons were wounded, and again on the 18th of November, among the crowd forming a demonstration of rejoicing at the escape of King Humbert from assassination by Passanante, whereby seven persons were killed and thirteen wounded, has resulted in their being condemned to twenty-one years' hard labor.

MRS. HATCH has for years been a conspicuous Spiritual medium in Boston. Her specialty is the production of flowers from spirit sources. She gave a seance, a few evenings ago, at a private residence. The lights were extinguished as usual, and the persons in the circle were enjoined to hold fast to each other's hands. Flowers were soon dropped here and there, and Mrs. Hatch began to explain how they had been brought from distant places by spirit hands. All the gas burners in the room had been connected with an electric lighting apparatus, and suddenly the apartment was brightly illuminated. The medium was completely exposed. In her lap was a pile of flowers, and she was caught in the act of tossing them in the air.

AN old veteran of the Mexican war gives the Chicago News the following list of the American Generals who fought in all the campaigns, including those on the Rio Grande and on the march from Vera Cruz to the capital. He claims that Gen. Shields is the last on the roll, which there is now no longer need of calling on this side of the river of time: Lieut. Gen. Winfield Scott, Maj. Gens. Zachary Taylor, Wm. O. Butler, J. A. Quitman, G. J. Pillow, Brevet Maj. Gen. Wm. J. Worth, Brig. Gens. D. E. Twiggs, Stephen Kearney, Franklin Pierce, John E. Wool, Thos. L. Hamer, J. E. Cadwallader, Persifer F. Smith and James Shields.

RUSSIA seems to have the highest death rate of any country that collects mortality statistics. The report of the Medical Bureau for the year 1877 has but recently been published, and it shows that in a population of 80,000,000 the deaths of the year were at the rate of from thirty to fifty per thousand. The ravages of diphtheria put it first in the list of diseases; next comes typhoid fever, and next small-pox. There are about 14,000,000 sectarians in Russia who do not allow vaccination, and this accounts for the large mortality from small-pox. As to the typhoid, it is called in Russia "hunger typhus," for its greatest ravages are always in the famine-stricken districts.

BARON HUDDLESTON, an eminent English Judge, recently took occasion to say from the bench that it was an undoubted fact that a woman told a lie very much better than did a man, and with very much better effect. It was a remarkable circumstance that when a woman was determined to say what was untrue, she said it in a much better manner than a man. Whether this was due to a man feeling that his dignity was to a certain extent offended by recourse to untruth, he did not know; that was a metaphysical question into which he would not enter; but it was certain that a woman told a story much more logically, and, if it was untrue, held to it much more pertinaciously and with much more the appearance of truth than a man could.

CHOLERA has been making fearful havoc among the pilgrims returning from the Hurdwar fair, and is being spread by them through Northern India. It is asserted that between 20,000 and 30,000 hillmen from the Himalayan districts, near Nynee Tal, died on their homeward journey. Several cases, most of them fatal, appeared among the Fifteenth Hussars almost immediately after their arrival at Meerut from Candahar, and it is supposed that the outbreak is due to some men having traveled from Mooltan in railway carriages which had been used by infected pilgrims. The disease has appeared in most cities of the Punjaub, and the fear of the spread of the epidemic to Peshawur has induced the authorities to remove the greater portion of the garrison there. It is suggested that the Government might well consider whether it is not time to put an entire stop to those great religious fairs, seeing that they almost invariably form centers whence pestilence spreads throughout the country, and that the effective sanitary control of the masses of pilgrims assembled is almost impossible.

THE largest cultivated wheat farm on the globe is said to be the Grandin farm, not far from the town of Fargo, Dakota. It embraces some 40,000 acres, both Government and railway land, and lies close to the Red river. Divided into four parts, it has dwellings, granaries, machine shops, elevators, stables for 200 horses, and room for storing 1,000,000 bushels of grain. Besides the wheat farm, there is a stock farm of 20,000 acres. In seeding time, seventy to eighty men are employed, and during harvest 250 to 300 men. Seeding begins about April 9, and continues through the month, and is done very systematically, the machines following one another round the field some four rods apart. Cutting begins about Aug. 8, and ends the fore part of September, succeeded by the thrashing, with eight steam threshers. After thrashing the stubble ground is plowed with great plows, drawn by three horses and cutting two furrows, and this goes on until the weather is cold enough to freeze, usually about Nov. 1. There are many other large farms in the Territory. The average yield of the Dakota wheat farm is from twenty to twenty-three bushels per acre.

OHIO DEMOCRACY.

Platform Adopted at the Recent State Convention.

Resolved, That the Democracy of Ohio demand free and fair elections, and to that end denounce all interference with elections by the military power. That the experience of this and other countries has abundantly proved that the presence of troops at the polls is destructive of freedom of elections, and is incompatible with the existence of free institutions. That the laws enacted by Congress, which, under pretense of regulating the manner of Congressional elections, interfere with the election of State officers, and overthrow the laws of the States governing the choice of such officers, are unconstitutional, and for that reason ought to be repealed. That they are also instrumentalities of fraud, force and corruption, by which the party in power uses the money of the people to corrupt, and thousands of irresponsible officers to harass and coerce, the voters, and especially by force and fraud to deprive our naturalized citizens of the right to vote, and for these reasons also said laws ought to be immediately repealed.

Resolved, That impartial juries are essential to the administration of justice, and thereby to the preservation of liberty. That no man can be secure in his person or property when the juries are packed and controlled by the Government police and for partisan purposes; that, under the Federal jury laws now in existence, juries may be, and have been, so packed and controlled, and that the highest interests of justice and free government require that these laws be changed so as to secure fair, impartial and independent juries in the Federal courts.

Resolved, That the Republican minority in Congress, by refusing to vote supplies to maintain the Government, unless the majority would agree to the use of troops at the polls, and also the maintenance of the unconstitutional, corrupting, violent and unjust election laws aforesaid, and the President of the United States, by his unprecedented use of the veto power in order to perpetuate said laws and the use of armed men at the polls, have shown a spirit of faction and a devotion to party success instead of the welfare of the country, and the preservation of its constitution and liberties, that demand the condemnation of the whole American people.

Resolved, That President Hayes, by his frequent interposition of the veto, in order to defeat legislation that was plainly constitutional, that in no way interfered with the independence of any other department of the Government, and had received the most mature consideration of Congress, has shown utter disregard of the considerations and principles that induced the insertion of the veto power in the constitution, and a like disregard of the wishes and welfare of the people.

Resolved, That we declare it as the sense of the Democracy of Ohio that not a dollar should be appropriated by Congress to pay soldiers, Marshals, Deputy Marshals, or Supervisors of Election to interfere with or control elections.

Resolved, That the efforts of the Republican party to open and keep alive the war feeling between the North and South are to be condemned by every lover of his country.

Resolved, That we reaffirm the financial principles heretofore advocated by the Democratic party of Ohio, that the issue of money in any form and the regulation thereof belong to the General Government alone, and ought not to be delegated or intrusted to individuals or corporations; that we, therefore, oppose the perpetuation of the present national-bank system as a means of control over the currency of the country, and demand the gradual substitution of treasury notes for national-bank currency, to be made receivable for all dues, and a legal-tender equality with coin, such Government issues to be regulated upon the principles established by legislation or organic law, so as to secure the greatest possible stability of value.

Resolved, That after changing the valuation of all property from the scale of paper money, by which the heavy burden of debts now resting upon the people were created, to the former level of gold and silver, the change then made in the metallic standard itself by the demonetization of silver was a monstrous fraud upon the people, cunningly devised in the interest of the holders of bonds, that should be condemned as a violation of every principle of honest dealings, and a covert assault upon the fundamental rights of property, and we, therefore, demand the full restoration of silver to its original place as a metal, the same as gold.

Resolved, That the rapid increase of the interest-bearing debt of the Government under the present administration ought to excite the serious apprehension of the people. We demand that the further increase in the bonded debt in time of peace be stopped, and it put in process of extinction.

Resolved, That the attack made upon the State Legislature in the Republican platform is wholly undeserved, and that the Legislature—in its arduous work of codifying the laws of the State, and in the reduction of fees and salaries of county officers, and the passage of a law to protect the ballot and prevent bribery at elections—deserves the commendation of the people of the State.

Resolved, That it is the duty of our Government to maintain to its fullest extent the doctrine that a man may, in good faith, change his habitation and become a citizen of any country. We should protect, in every part of the world, all our naturalized citizens as we would our native-born, and should resist all improper claims upon them by governments to which they no longer owe allegiance. We demand that existing treaties with all foreign governments be rigidly enforced, and that early steps be taken to obtain from the German empire the fullest recognition of the rights of expatriation, of the rights of our naturalized citizens returning or having property there, by a modification of the treaty existing between us.

IT costs more to kill an Indian than it would to educate him; but the result is a good Indian—a thing which education might not produce.

ELOQUENT PLEA FOR PEACE.

Congressman S. S. Cox on Test Oaths and the Like.

A Burning Rebuke to the Policy of Hate and Unforgiveness.

[From the Congressional Record.]

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] in his opening speech at this session sought to place the onus of repealing these obnoxious statutes upon the Southern Democracy. I beg to say that the action taken at the last and at this session was not the action of one section or of one class of Democrats. The points of the compass have no bearing upon this matter. Our action binds all sections. The advice which led to it was not taken exclusively from any part of the country. The gentleman found no end to his admiration of the Democratic Congressmen who seceded from this hall in 1861. Their noble and heroic conduct was the theme of his admiration; but he more than intimated his detestation of their present conduct in seeking to obliterate these legislative anomalies, born of the war. It was so unhandsome and unheroic in contrast with their splendid heroism as rebels. Ah! the gentleman's purpose is understood. It is not so much to fix opprobrium upon the solid South as to revamp the old slander against the Democracy of the North. He would admire the military heroes of 1861 to derogate from their civil courage of 1879, and by reviving the bad blood of other times, endeavor to regain for his party their lost power over roads macadamized with stale libels upon the Northern Democracy. I regret to say that some color to this view has been given by Southern men; especially by one gentleman, who in the heat of debate said that the South learned secession from the Northern Democracy. I wish he had waited until my eloquent friend from Mississippi [Mr. Chalmers] had spoken. He fitly discriminated between the Northern and Southern Democracy when he said:

"When the war was closed and the Republican party undertook to destroy the constitution, history will say that the same gallant Northern Democracy, with the same flag in their hand, rallied the Southern Democrats and drove the Republicans back to their duty. We, sir, in the South loved the constitution more than the Union; the Republican party loved the Union more than the constitution; but it will be written in history that the gallant Democracy of the North were the truest patriots of the land, and that they loved both the Union and the constitution, one and indivisible."

This statement might go further and be equally just. Does the gentleman forget, what Mr. Greeley in his volume on the "Conflict" would inform him, that the great body of men of the South were opposed to secession? He will find the facts and votes furnished in that volume. Does he forget, too, the men of the Democratic party who opposed secession and risked and lost their lives for the Union? Would he ignore the McClellans and Hancocks and men of no less note, who maintained the vigor of our Federal system against secession, and who fought for both Union and constitution? It pleased him and others to derogate from the Northern Democracy, when he arrogated unto his party all the praise of quelling the "so-called" heroic rebellion. We understand his eulogy and its subtle intent, when he praises his party and the Southern Democracy in 1861, in order to dispraise the Democracy of the North then and the Democracy of both sections now.

Does he remember that in 1860 the Democratic party divided, one great portion of it, under Douglas, representing the Union-constitutional sentiment, with 1,365,976 votes, and the other representing the Southern sentiment, with 847,953 votes? Is it manly, just and fair to ignore his Democratic brothers-in-arms and those of us who voted all supplies to quell the rebellion? When the democracy were sundered, was there no patriotic principle for us North, to guide our conduct? He forgets that the Northern Democracy, in States like Illinois, Indiana and Ohio, favored Douglas, while the extreme States of the South only were largely for Breckinridge. He forgets that in the three great States of Illinois, Indiana and Ohio the whole Democratic vote was cast for Douglas, with the exception of some 25,000 for Breckinridge.

He forgets that the Southern secession leaders could muster only about one-fifth of the total votes of the United States, and that the Northern Democracy fought through the crisis of 1860-'61, and the remaining years of trial and blood, like men as heroic as those from whom they parted. He forgets that in Illinois seventy-five votes were given to Douglas to one for his extreme Southern competitor; yet the gentleman glorifies Southern heroism to detract from his Northern Democratic neighbors. At what particular time did the gentleman from Ohio learn to love rebellion, that he should make an apotheosis to its heroism? Ah! why? Is it because we of the North opposed extra-constitutional methods of conscription and confiscation; or is it because since the war the Democracy have shown the spirit of forgiveness and favored amnesty, that all might come under the shadow of the Government? Is it because we have sought to make our Southern brethren equals here, when they come back redeemed from their prostration and the oppression of your military satraps, under the reconstruction? Is it because Southern men have joined with us in the back pay and pensions of Union soldiers? Is he sorry that we would build up by generous policies the waste places of the South, and lift up a highway for the people yet wandering in the mazes of test-oaths, military force at elections, and Supervisor espionage and oppression? Would he make a desert or an aceldema of the South?

Is it a pleasure to depreciate, denounce and degrade the Northern Democracy? Does his own party need require this? Did our party fail in furnishing troops for the war? Was it a falsehood when a Republican Legislature of New York gave Gov. Seymour the credit for even exceeding the call for soldiers? Did they fail to pay their taxes? Did they fail in giving their youth, their manhood, their sympathy to the Union which their fathers loved, and to the constitution which Washington helped to frame? How can such statements be characterized?

Allow me to say that from the time the war closed until the present time, I have objected to individual amnesty bills, though voting for them, preferring a general bill, because based on a principle. In the Forty-fourth Congress, on my motion, such a bill passed this House by a two-thirds vote. Gentlemen seem to forget that I have not favored this principle altogether because it would be a grace and help to the South, but because it would be a grace, an anodyne, a comfort and a benefit to ourselves. It has been said that forgiveness to your enemy is a charming way of revenge. It leaves your foes your friends and brings about grateful retaliations. An enemy reconciled by force is not so readily to be trusted. As the Italians have it: "Sospetto licenzia fede;" suspicion dismisses faith. I would appeal to gentlemen on the other side, if they have not the spirit of kindness toward others, not to be cruel to themselves. As Sir Thomas Brown has said, "It only feathers the arrow of the enemy." It destroys all that is knightly and magnanimous. There is no lack of patriotism in following the precepts of history as to clemency. It teaches that revenge is injustice and hurts most those who indulge in it.

Fourteen years have passed since the war was closed. We have felt, those of us who are Northern Democrats, that a great wrong was done by this long delay in healing the wounds of the war; but we were prompt to draw the curtain upon our wrongs. Christian, Hebraic, and even pagan lessons are plentiful to teach us to regard such civil wrongs as though they had not been. Gentlemen on the other side would forgive; yet they "powder their opiate with scorn and contempt." They punish while they forgive. This is no charity. Reservation in forgiveness is a species of hatred. Let us imitate the divine forgiveness. It lies in the principle of loving and being loved: "to love Him because He first loved us." It is the doctrine of peace and good will.

Is it for us, who have our brothers near us here as our equals, to harbor the spirit of separation, distrust, and enmity? Let us, if we can, be bound and solidified by one constitution, for one inseparable Union, and under it, for the untrammeled will and rich heritage of its past wisdom and glory. If we must have a test, let us swear to each other by each and every star upon the blue field of our ensign, by the white radiance, in which all colors—red, white, blue, aye, and gray—blend as one—not, as in the old Italian code, by the God who avenges, but as the old Anglo-Saxon kings were adjured, by the grace and mercy of His Son—that good-will and amnesty shall be the spirit and aim of our legislation. Let us swear that no check shall be placed upon the will or the tribunals of the people but for the people, and never, by the Eternal! never to yield our rights, however and how often defeated, to grant the money and substance of the people, that it may be used for their own undoing!

When our laws require of all officers, jurors, and agents of the Government, that they should take the test oath, "so help them God"—what God do they invoke? On whom do they call? Is it the God of vengeance and hate, or is it the God of love and mercy? If it be the latter, then what a mockery is the oath which is the proof and perpetuation of revenge and unforgiveness? The God we would invoke for amnesty and peace has given us a code of ethics, whose highest illustration is drawn from the Sermon on the Mount. Would that I could picture to you that mountain, with its divine orator speaking those ineffable truths!

Is it possible that my friend from the Silver State could have used these words?

"Prosperity sleeps benumbed in the frozen vault of fear, and the great and mighty North, with its generous and forgiving heart, stands at the door, as Jesus stood at the tomb of Lazarus, ready to resurrect and quicken it, with the inspiration of a new life."

I observe this eloquent language in the Record. Could a representative of our Mountain State have forgotten the teachings of the Saviour?

Mr. Speaker, it may be a fancy, but I sometimes think that the loftiest and purest thoughts come down to us from the mountain.

> But in the mountains we do feel our faith.
> All things responsive to the writing there
> Breathed immortality, revolving life,
> And greatness still revolving; infinite;
> There littleness was not; the least of things
> Seemed infinite.

I hope it may not be presuming to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been something of a traveler, and have been upon many mountains of our star. I would that my observations had been better utilized for duty. I have been upon the Atlas, whose giant shoulders were fabled to have upheld the globe. I have learned from there, that even to Northern Africa, the Goths brought their fueros or bills of right, with their arms from the cold forests of the North to the sunny plains and rugged mountains of that old granary of the Roman world. I have been amid the Alps, where the spirit of Tell and liberty is always tempered with mercy, and whose mountains are a monument through a thousand years of Republican generosity. I have been among the Sierras of Spain, where the patriot Riego—whose hymn is the Marseillaise of the Peninsula—was hunted after he had saved constitutional liberty and favored amnesty to all—the noblest exemplar of patriotism since the days of Brutus. From the seven hills of Rome, down through the corridors of time, comes the story which Cicero relates from Thucydides; that a brazen monument was erected by the Thebans to celebrate their victory over the Lacedæmonians, but it was regarded as a memento of civil discord, and the trophy was abolished, because it was not fitting that any record should remain of the conflict between Greek and Greek. From the same throne of ancient power come the words which command only commemoration of foreign conquests and not of domestic calamities; and that Rome, with her imperial grace, believed that it was wisest to erect a bridge of gold, that civil insurgents should pass back to their allegiance. From the Acropolis at Athens, there is the story of the herald at the Olympic games, who announced the clemency of Rome to the conquered, who had been long subjected to the privations and calamities imposed by the conqueror. The historian says that the Greeks, when the herald announced such unexpected deliverance, wept for joy at the grace which had been bestowed.

All these are but subordinate lights around the central light, which came from the mountain whence the great sermon was spoken. Its name is unknown; its locality has no geography. All we know is that it was "set apart."

The mountains of our Scriptures are full of inspiration for our guidance. Their teachings may well be carried into our political ethics. But it was not from Ararat, which lifted its head first above the flood, and received the dove with its olive branch; not from Sinai, which looks proudly upon three nations and almost three countries, and overlooks our kind with its great moral code; not from Horeb, where Jehovah with His fearful hand covered His face that man might not look upon His brightness; not from Tabor, where the great transformation was enacted; not from Pisgah, where Moses made his farewell to the people he had delivered and led so long; not from Carmel, where the prayer of Elijah was answered in fire; not from Lebanon, whose cedars were the beauty of the earth; not from the Mount of Olives, which saw the agony of the Saviour; not from Calvary, at whose great tragedy nature shuddered and the heavens were covered with gloom; not from one or all of these secular and sacred mountains that our best teaching for duty comes. It comes from that nameless mountain, set apart, because from it emanated the great and benignant truths of Him who spake as never man spake. Here is the sublime teaching:

> Ye have heard in the aforetime, that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy.
>
> But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you.
>
> That ye may be children of your Father which is in heaven: for He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

The spirit of this teaching has no hospitality for test oaths, and asks no compensation for grace. Along with this teaching and to the same good end, are the teachings of history, patriotism, chivalry, and even economic selfishness. Yet these teachers are often blind guides to duty. They are but mole-hills compared with the lofty mountain whose spiritual grandeur brings peace, order and civilization!

When these principles obtain in our hearts, then our legislation will conform to them. When they do obtain their hold in these halls, there will arise a brilliant day-star for America. When they do obtain recognition, we may hail a new advent of that Prince of Peace, whose other advent was chanted by the angelic choir?

In conclusion, sir, let me say that, in comparison with this celestial code, by which we should live and die, how little seem all the contests here about armies, appropriations, riders, and coercion, which so exasperate and threaten! Let our legislation be inspired by the lofty thought from that Judean mountain, and God will care for us. In our imperfections here as legislators, let us look aloft, and then "His greatness will flow around our incompleteness, and round our restlessness, His rest!" Then, measures which make for forgiveness, tranquillity and love, like the abolition of hateful oaths, and other reminders of our sad and bloody strife, will rise in supernal dignity above the party passions of the day; and that party which vindicates right against might, freedom against force, popular will against Federal power, rest against unrest, and God's goodness and mercy around and above all, will, in that sign, conquer.

To those in our midst who have the spirit of violence, hate and unforgiveness, and who delight in pains, penalties, test-oaths, bayonets and force, and who would not replace these instruments of turbulence with love, gentleness and forgiveness—my only curse upon such is: that God Almighty, in his abundant and infinite mercy may forgive them, for "they know not what they do."

Playing Tricks on the Pickpockets.

On Saturday a gentleman stopping at one of our hotels determined to deceive the pickpockets, and, procuring a small piece of board, sewed it into the rear pocket of his trousers, and calmly awaited the result. He evidently "sold" a thief, for in the evening he found that the board had been taken away—but, unfortunately for him, a square the same size had been neatly cut out of his broadcloth trousers.—Montreal Witness.

THE EAST RIVER BRIDGE.

The Longest Single-Span Bridge in the World.

From the Scientific American we glean some interesting facts regarding the great bridge now in process of construction connecting the cities of New York and Brooklyn. This structure will have the longest single span of any bridge in the world. The main span will be 1,595 feet 6 inches, and the land spans 930 feet each.

This bridge was designed in 1867 by John A. Roebling, but he died in 1869, before any work on it had begun, and it has been built entirely under the guidance of Washington A. Roebling, the present Chief Engineer.

The bridge extends from the junction of Sands and Fulton streets, in Brooklyn, to Chatham street, in New York—a total length of 5,989 feet, the Brooklyn approach being 971 feet, the suspended part 3,455½ feet, and the New York approach 1,562½ feet.

The approaches will consist of a series of brick and granite arches, which, when finished, will be ornaments to the two cities. It has taken nine years to complete the towers and anchorages, construct the cables, and get everything ready for the suspension of the floor.

Preparing the foundations for the towers was one of the most difficult parts of the work. Huge timber caissons, each 170 feet long, 102 feet wide, and 25 feet high, containing over 1,600,000 feet of timber, were sunk below the bed of the river until they rested on rock or on an equally firm stratum. On the Brooklyn side this was reached at a depth of 45 feet below high water; but it was necessary to go 78 feet below high water on the New York side. The pneumatic method of sinking caissons is not new, but the operations here surpassed by their immensity everything of this kind that has ever been done before.

The towers are 278 feet high. The anchorages are 129 feet by 119 feet at the base, 117 feet by 104 feet at the top, and 89 feet high.

The total quantity of granite and limestone in the towers and anchorages is about 145,000 cubic yards, and it required the continuous work for four years of over 20 quarries in Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and New York to furnish the necessary supply. In the summer of 1876 the masonry was completed.

On the 29th of May, 1877, the first wire for the cables was stretched across the river. There are four cables, each consisting of 19 strands, each strand containing 280 galvanized cast-steel wires, No. 8 gauge. These cables are 15¾ inches in diameter. For wrapping the cables galvanized annealed iron wire was used. March 1, 1879, the four cables were completed, just 21 months after they were commenced.

The platform of the bridge, which is 5 feet wider than Broadway, is sustained by the iron cross beams, and stiffened by 6 longitudinal trusses. It is divided into 5 parts, 2 outer ones intended for horse-cars and general vehicle traffic, 2 intermediate divisions intended to accommodate the rapid-transit passenger cars, and a centra promenade, a little above the level of the main floor, and intended for pedestrians. The stiffening trusses will be of iron, six in number, the two outer ones 9¾ feet high, the other four 16 feet each in height. The total weight of the bridge will be 13,300 tons. It is proposed to move the cars on this bridge by means of wire ropes and stationary engines. This method is considered preferable to the use of locomotives on account of the steep grade of the bridge.

It is estimated that the bridge, when completed, will have cost $13,500,000, of which $9,500,000 will be spent on the bridge itself, and $4,000,000 in acquiring the necessary real estate. It is hoped that in 1881 the bridge will be open to the public.

American Competition in China.

In his report on the trade of Shanghai for the year 1877, Consul Davenport directs attention to the rapid increase in the imports of cotton piece goods from America. The growth is shown in the following table:

	1874. Bales.	1875. Bales.	1876. Bales.	1877. Bales.
Drills	2,630	6,801	9,951	19,612
Sheetings	1,138	2,900	4,265	14,461
Jeans	nil.	nil.	300	2,897

The great increase in 1877 is all the more striking because it has taken place concurrently with a considerable diminution in the import of the same fabrics of British origin. The American has to some extent taken the place of the English article, and of this Mr. Davenport suggests two explanations. It is popularly supposed, he says, to be due to the purity of the American goods, but some hold the opinion that the New England manufacturers have been pushing off their stocks of cotton because they have not been able to find a market for them in America. As to the superior purity of the American products there appears to be no question.—London Economist.

A Temperance Woman.

"King Humbert," old Mr. Throstlewaite read from his paper, "is said to be very fond of Garibaldi." "And it's none to his credit," sputtered Mrs. Throstlewaite, "that he is. The King of Italy might have better taste than to be a-sitting on his royal throne guzzling and swilling spirituous liquors with funny names while his people demand all his attention. If he's fond of it now, where will his appetite carry him by the time he's 45? His fancy drinks won't be strong enough for him then, and he'll be a common raw-whisky drunkard." And she went on to tell of a young man she knew down at New Bedford, who was passionately fond of Tommanjerry, and drank himself into the grave in twenty-three years.—Burdette.

Dirty Afghans.

The dirtiness of the Afghan is proverbial, and it is said that upon one occasion Gen. Roberts captured a Mongol, who was so preternaturally dirty that it was thought necessary, for the safety of the whole camp, that he should be washed. Two genuine Tommy Atkinses were told off for this purpose. They stripped him, and scrubbed him with formidable brushes and a large quantity of black soap for two hours, at the end of which they threw down their brushes in disgust and went to their Colonel. "What is it, men?" "Well, sir, we've washed that Afghan for two hours, but it wasn't no good. After scrubbing him, sir, till our arms were like to break, blessed if we didn't come upon another suit of clothes."—Court Journal.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, JUNE 19, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

The platform of the Ohio democracy, as adopted at the late state convention, is printed in full in another column.

The "eloquent plea for peace" as recently made in congress by Hon. S. S. Cox, will be found on the third page of this paper.

We understand that our democratic friends over at Kendallville, are suggesting the name of Hon. S. S. Shutt, of Dekalb, for congress.

Another excellent nomination has been made by an Indianapolis jury. Lewis Guetig, the murderer, was unanimously nominated for the position of stoker in the devils domain (if there is such a place) for ever and ever.

James Orton Woodruff, proprietor of the "Woodruff scientific expedition," and generally known through Indiana as the proprietor of "Woodruff place," at Indianapolis, during the days of real estate excitement at that place, died in New York on the 4th of this month.

Immigrants are arriving in New York in larger numbers than have been known for years. From Jan. 1st to June 1st 40,593 immigrants had arrived, being an excess of 12,447 over the same period of last year. It is said that the immigrants are of a superior class, and a great majority of them are settling on farms in Kansas and other western states.

We were surprised, startled, astonished, on the receipt of cards relative to the marriage of our popular and accomplished secretary of state, Hon. John Gilbert Shanklin, formerly editor of the Evansville Courier, (named after this paper,) and since (in 1878) elected to his present position, by the democracy of Indiana by a large majority. It seems that the Hon. John, or "Gil." as he is generally known, crossed the Ohio river at Jeffersonville with a large force, and after a glorious attack, captured a very handsome hostage, which Gill proposes shall be an eye witness to all the ups and downs that may occur in his exchequered and eventful career. The name of the happy pair, leaving John out, is Miss Gertrude A. Avery, of Louisville, an accomplished and beautiful lady, and for her sake as well as John's, we wish them a happy, prosperous life.

The plans of the republicans of Ohio were laid with a view of inaugurating a bloody-shirt campaign, but the action of the democrats in putting two "brigadiers" upon their ticket has taken the wind out of the republican sails. Foster and Hickenlooper, the republican candidates at the head of the ticket, when compared with Ewing and Rice the democratic candidates, dwindle into insignificance in a military point of view. When the war began "Charley" Foster was a healthy, vigorous man of about 30 years of age. He was a country storekeeper, made money during the war, and blossomed into a stalwart banker. The republican candidate (Hickenlooper) has no particularly brilliant record that we know of, except holding an office under Andy Johnson. General Ewing, the democratic nominee for governor, served with distinction throughout the war, receiving at the end of it the commission of a major general. The candidate upon the democratic ticket for lieutenant governor, General Rice, volunteered as a private at the beginning of the war in 1861, left one of his legs down at Chickamauga, and when the war closed came out a brigadier general.

There appears to be some difference of opinion among the great lights of the republican party just now, as to whether the late war was waged to "save the union," or to "free the negro." If the idea suggested by Gen. Grant, in his speech made during his trip around the world, is the republican idea, then the object of the war was to "free the negro," and the republican party can lay no claim to having the preservation of the Union at heart. The soldier who now talks about the freedom of the negro being the great result of the war, has no doubt experienced a change of heart politically, in order to be in harmony with the views of Grant, for it is known by all soldiers that mutiny was freely talked of in the army by soldiers of all political opinions, when the news of Lincoln's emancipation proclamation was received; no soldier would acknowledge then, that he was ready to offer himself as a sacrifice for the freedom of the negro—a sacrifice equivalent to exchanging gold-dust for saw-dust in equal quantities; no soldier could then be charged with fighting for the freedom of the negro, without resenting the charge; and if the object of the government at that time was to free the negro by the sacrifice of thousands of soldiers under the pretext of preserving the Union, every government official having knowledge of the damnable plot to destroy life, and assisted in carrying it out, ought to have been hung for murder. The claim made by republicans that their party "saved the Union" should be abandoned if the war was caused by a desire to free the negro. Northern democrats went into the army to preserve the Union; it was preserved, and republicans who fought to "free the negro" deserve no thanks for its preservation.

Over in Ohio, the republicans thought something of introducing war issues in the coming campaign, but they trotted out the wrong man for leader. Charley Foster, the republican candidate for governor, was in the calico business during the war, while Gen. Ewing, the democratic candidate for the same office, was devoting his time and attention to "war issues" which qualified him to make this campaign exceedingly interesting for Charles. The "brigadier" business took the wrong shoot for the stalwarts of our sister state. The great (?) God-forsaken radical party has no favors to bestow upon the soldiers.

Mr. Lincoln must have been terribly mistaken, or the leaders of the republican party are terrible liars, one or the other, as the following extract from a speech delivered by Gen. Steadman, at the Columbus (Ohio) convention, proves. The hero of Chickamauga said:

"I make another statement here to-day and there is a living witness in the state of Ohio who was present when Mr. Lincoln made the utterance. The first time I ever saw him (Lincoln) was after the battle of Chickamauga, when I was ordered by telegraph to report in person to him. I went up and called upon him, and Mr. James M. Ashley, who is living, heard the conversation. Mr. Lincoln took me by the hand, greeting me warmly. He told me he was glad to see me. Still holding me by the hand, he said to Mr. Ashley: "Brother Ashley, what would have become of us in this war if it had not been for the fighting democrats of the northwest?" Mr. Ashley, with a shrug of the shoulders, said, "Well, Mr. Lincoln, I don't know;" when Mr. Lincoln replied: "Our rebellious friends would have had their flag floating at the capitol, sir." He says: "The truth is, Brother Ashley, that our party is made up, to some extent, of the religious and sympathetic element, and they don't make first-class soldiers."

"They don't make first-class soldiers," how is that, ye braves? Now, who was it that went to heaven in the arms of an angel? Was it Mr. Lincoln?

Bro. Zimmerman, of the Warsaw Union, says, in reference to the disregard paid to the democrats of northern Indiana, by the leaders at Indianapolis, that, "if the democratic party of Indiana is to be maintained in harmony in the future, our leaders at Indianapolis must act more fairly; they must cease to ignore the claims of good and honorable men north of the Wabash river. The democracy of Northern Indiana is getting tired of attending the political funerals of its representative men who are slaughtered and laid out by the Indianapolis managers. No idle talk is this, but stern reality, and the sooner the Indianapolis Sentinel and its backers recognize it the better."

So says the COURIER, and we further suggest that though the northern Indiana democrats are not inclined to stoop to the creation of boisterous state conventions by an unlimited issue of tickets to the rabble, they do propose to hereafter stand upon their rights and demand justice in nominations as well as appointments, and it might not be out of place to call the attention of the state central committee to the fact that there are other cities in the state that would gladly extend hospitalities to the attendants at our next state convention; and in order to escape a repetition of the Landers-Holman fight, caused to a great extent by Indianapolis lobbyists, we suggest Lafayette, or some other city with good hotel accommodations. We make these suggestions with due respect to Mr. Landers, who will be a prominent candidate from Indianapolis, in the next convention.

THE WILLIAMS MATRIMONIAL IMBROGLIO.

What the Colonel has to say regarding it.

The Indianapolis Sentinel of last Monday, published a letter from Col. Wm. C. Williams of Albion, in reply to an article published in that paper a short time since, charging that the Col. had fraudulently procured a divorce from his first wife &c. &c., a part of which article was reproduced in the COURIER. We now take pleasure in giving space to the following extracts from the letter of Mr. Williams.

To the Editor of the Sentinel:

SIR—In your issue of May 24 appeared a reportorial description of what purported to be my matrimonial relations with a lady in Philadelphia, gathered from an interview with William A. Lowe, Esq., of your city, and an attorney for the lady in question. Having learned that since the publication of this matter in the Sentinel, the lady has caused to be published in the Press, of Philadelphia, another version of the affair; and having only recently obtained it, and desiring to give my version of this matrimonial imbroglio, I ask the favor of your columns to enable me to present to my friends in Indiana what in justice to myself is demanded at my hands. The public take but little interest in the marital felicities, or otherwise, of people so little distinguished in the world as this lady and myself; but as this lady, and those advising her, have thought it of public importance that this matter should receive as wide publicity as possible, one version was prepared for circulation in Indiana, to operate on my friends here, while the other was to do duty at the East among the friends of both parties to the difficulty. These statements now before the public not only contradict each other at many material points, but are so much at variance with the truth that my wonder is excited that the truth in any respect should be found mixed with such a mass of willful misrepresentations and positive falsehood. I will be as brief as possible, and, without further preliminary, will notice the interview had with "Miss Louisa Brewster," (for by this name the lady prefers to be known in Philadelphia,) by the reporter for the Press in that city. My friends, who know all the facts connected with the unfortunate affair marvel that so many material links are left out in "Miss Brewster's" version. I shall supply these "missing links," and the public can accept that version which best accords with its humor. I was, as stated by "Miss Brewster," married to her in Philadelphia in March 1856, by Rev. J. J. Dowling, D. D., an eminent Baptist clergyman of that city. The marriage was strictly private, so private, indeed, that neither my family nor Miss Brewster's knew of the marriage until after the ceremony had been performed. "Miss Brewster" denies this. We were married at the residence of the minister who solemnized the rite. We had no friends present. I had earnestly besought "Miss Brewster" for months prior to the marriage to release me from the engagement which I felt well assured would result only in much unhappiness to both. * * * * *

* "Miss Brewster" says "that three months after marriage" I left her. She further says: "For economical reasons it was agreed when they married that they should live apart until such time as the husband's income permitted larger comforts!" I do not want to be harsh, but the statements I have quoted are absolute, willful falsehoods. I did not remain in the city "three months," nor three weeks. I did not remain to exceed a week. The statement published in the Sentinel says I left the city "the Monday following the marriage." We were married on Thursday, and I remained only long enough in the city to hurriedly collect what bills for professional services I could, and then started for the coal regions in Northern Pennsylvania, but did not remain long there. How preposterous and silly to say that because I was poor I could not live with my wife! The great majority of young married people are poor, yet they manage to live together. My income from professional services at the time of my marriage, though not large, was yet sufficient to enable me to take good care of my wife, if I had chosen to support her. My circumstances were better than most young men who marry and if I had desired to have this considerate wife live with me, and loved her though the world, if the flesh and the devil were in the house, and poverty guarding the door, we would have walked in and kicked out all obstacles, and made our home happy because love would have been there. Not so, madame; you don't tell the truth! What you call economical reasons, I have another name for. You know why we lived apart. It was for the same reason that, after the lapse of 25 years, we still live apart. I did not—do not love you. I had sworn to you, and I know you have not—can not forget it, for it was the stormiest time I ever had with womankind. I repeat it; I know you remember the terrible scene. I had called down the unharnessed furies on my head if ever I lived with you one hour; and I have sacredly kept that oath. Soon after leaving Philadelphia I went to McDonough, Delaware, and engaged in teaching school. Miss B. says in one statement that I went to New Castle Delaware. In the version in the Sentinel she says I went to Talbot county, Maryland. These discrepancies in Miss B.'s versions I don't consider of sufficient importance to comment upon, I pass on. Knowing madame's disposition pretty well, and not wishing, for economical reasons, to be annoyed by her, I thought it well that she should not know of my whereabouts. To this end I foolishly changed my name. I called myself Jones. Miss B. says she got a letter or two from Mr. Jones while he was in Delaware. It may be she did, I don't now remember. If I wrote to her it was to keep her where she was. It was all in the interest of peace. Miss Brewster says that while I was in Delaware I became engaged to be married to a Miss Bowman, of New Castle, and was only prevented from marrying her by an acquaintance of Miss Brewster's declaring on the day the bans were published in New Castle that Williams had a wife in Philadelphia! A more malicious, slanderous, bald-headed, damnable lie never came from throat of man or woman! I was engaged to no lady in Delaware. No bans were published in New Castle, or any other part of the state, of any contemplated marriage on my part with any mortal woman. It is a devilish invention, hatched in the brain of the woman who would have the public believe she is a martyr. Shame on you! But I ought not to be surprised—I know you. But I must move on. I remained in Delaware until April, 1856, when I was summoned home by the dangerous illness of my father. I had explained to my friends in Delaware, long before I left there, the reason why I had changed my name. I remained in Philadelphia until November, 1856, when I went to New York, and in a few days sailed for Europe, reaching London—to which point I sailed direct from New York—December 12, I returned to the United States in the following May, But remained only some two weeks, having while in Liverpool procured the position of surgeon on one of the New York and Liverpool passenger ships. This position I held until November, 1858, when I returned to Philadelphia, and remained there until April, 1859, when I came to Indiana, where I have ever since had a residence. In May, 1863, having been five months a prisoner in rebel hands, I was exchanged and ordered to rejoin my regiment for duty forthwith;—en-route, I took in Philadelphia to visit my family. Almost the first one to welcome me from the hardships of many weeks close confinement in Libby prison, was dear Miss Brewster who had me arrested for deserting her. It was on that occasion, in the office of the magistrate who issued the warrant for my arrest, that I informed Miss Brewster and her lawyer, Benjamin H Brewster, that I had been divorced from her in Indiana. Her lawyer demanded the proofs, but I had not provided myself with them, and could not furnish them. I am thus particular here, because Miss Louisa says in her statements that she knew nothing of the divorce until three months ago. Madame, I only wonder such a statement did not stick fast in your throat. You know it is a deliberate falsehood; you have known of that divorce for 17 years. In the interview with your attorney at Indianapolis, and which was published in the Sentinel, the reporter who interviewed Mr. Lowe says that at the time you had me arrested, I pleaded a divorce obtained in Indiana. You will not, madam, dare deny that you were present that morning I was arrested; the statement that I informed you of the divorce is correct and no one knows it better than yourself. And now you inform me through these interviews you have had, set forth with all the embellishments known to the reporter's art, that if he (meaning me) doesn't come to terms, I shall go out to Indiana and take possession of his home, etc.! What terms? I have learned from your attorney what you mean by terms, and if I do not come to terms, what then? Will you, indeed, come out to Indiana and take possession of my home! Are you coming out to live with me? I have had measles, chickenpox, blisters on my heels and pepper in my eyes; I have had mumps and earache and colic, and I assure you I have lived through them all; I have survived ocean storms and shipwreck; I have lived next door to a fellow learning to play on a brass horn, and I think I could go through them again; but I cry you mercy, fair lady; don't come out here to take possession of my home oh don't! I fear it might lead to a coolness between us. But in sober earnestness, what does all this racket mean? Is it to scare me? Is this movement on either flank, a 1,000 miles apart, to enable you to sell your property at Asbury Park? My dear madame you well know, and you could if you would, tell these people who are behind you and pushing you on, that I don't scare worth a cent. Miss Brewster and her friends make a great outcry because, as they allege, the costs in the divorce suit are taxed against her. It is not so. There is a judgment against the plaintiff for costs. I have always supposed I, not she, was the plaintiff in that suit. This is a small matter, but why lie about it? And thus it goes all the way through these interviews. The Sentinel's version has it one way, Miss B. gives an entirely different version—willful misrepresentations, suppression of important facts, shameless falsehoods, and an effrontery that I hope is as rare as it is disgusting. I have thus far said but little concerning the version given to your reporter by Mr. Lowe. In the Sentinel the characters change with the facts. It is never Miss Brewster, it is always Mrs. Williams or Mrs. Williams, No. 1. Why this wide discrepancy in the versions, when they come from the same source? The purpose is not hard nor far to find. One is for effect in Northern Indiana; the other is for the latitude of Philadelphia. * * *

* * * The Sentinel says that on my return to Philadelphia in 1850, that I visited my wife, confessed everything, received her forgiveness, etc. My God, said Jack Falstaff, how this world is given to lying! No there is not one particle of truth in this statement. It is a falsehood cut from whole cloth. So important a fact, if true, would certainly have appeared in Miss B.'s interview, but she does not even hint at such a thing. But, I am growing weary of chasing the inconsistencies, misrepresentations and falsehoods, so freely and boldly woven all through, what is paraded with so much flourish before the public as the great wrongs of a meek and suffering deserted wife. The questions connected with and growing out of the divorce can not be settled in the newspapers; another tribunal must pass upon them. The motive held out, and so prominently, that the disposal of property by Miss Brewster was the only object had in view in renewing an old fight, is all pretext; it is the blind behind which quietly, as yet, stalks another purpose, and the sooner it steps into the light the better. If he don't come to terms, says Miss Brewster, the meaning of the whole hue and cry is contained in that short sentence. Correspondence with Miss B.'s attorney, Mr. Lowe, leaves no room to doubt what would "fix up" the whole matter.

THE GENUINE

CELEBRATED

FOR THE CURE OF

Hepatitis, or Liver Complaint,

DYSPEPSIA AND SICK HEADACHE.

Symptoms of a Diseased Liver.

PAIN in the right side, under the edge of the ribs, increases on pressure; sometimes the pain is in the left side; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left side; sometimes the pain is felt under the shoulder blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the shoulder, and is sometimes mistaken for rheumatism in the arm. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness; the bowels in general are costive, sometimes alternative with lax; the head is troubled with pain, accompanied with a dull, heavy sensation in the back part. There is generally a considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. A slight, dry cough is sometimes an attendant. The patient complains of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his feet are cold or burning, and he complains of a prickly sensation of the skin; his spirits are low; and although he is satisfied that exercise would be beneficial to him, yet he can scarcely summon up fortitude enough to try it. In fact, he distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred where few of them existed, yet examination of the body, after death, has shown the LIVER to have been extensively deranged.

AGUE AND FEVER.

DR. C. MCLANE'S LIVER PILLS, IN CASES OF AGUE AND FEVER, when taken with Quinine, are productive of the most happy results. No better cathartic can be used, preparatory to, or after taking Quinine. We would advise all who are afflicted with this disease to give them a FAIR TRIAL.

For all bilious derangements, and as a simple purgative, they are unequaled.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The genuine are never sugar coated.

Every box has a red wax seal on the lid, with the impression DR. MCLANE'S LIVER PILLS.

The genuine MCLANE'S LIVER PILLS bear the signatures of C. MCLANE and FLEMING BROS. on the wrappers.

Insist upon having the genuine DR. C. MCLANE'S LIVER PILLS, prepared by Fleming Bros., of Pittsburgh, Pa., the market being full of imitations of the name McLane, spelled differently but same pronunciation.

Local and Miscellaneous

—We're all going.

—Working the streets.

—The old settlers settle here to-day.

—D. D. Snyder took in the Jaxn races.

—Yesbera has a new tailor. He arrove Friday.

—Hank Little, wife and son spent last Sabbath in Corunna.

—S. J. Locke, of Waterloo, was in town last week, courting.

—The marshal and his corps are doing good work on Cedar street.

—Judge Morris and R. J. Fisher, of Ft. Wayne, were in town last Thursday.

—G. G. Grady, the once famous showman, is now traveling with a puppet-show.

—Cas. J. Coats left last Friday for a short visit to Warren, Ohio. Girl in it, probably.

—Wouldn't it be a good idea to have the sidewalks repaired on west Seventh street, eh?

—Auburn will not celebrate, but there is talk of a pic-nic on the Fourth. Much fun, ain't it?

—Owing to the heavy storms of last week, the races at Hicksville did not prove a success.

—Lawyer Dills smokes a clay pipe now; married men have to curtail expenses, you know.

—Just at the present writing the happiest man in this burg is Bab Lewis. It's a 9½-pound boy.

—Charles Hoffman, formerly an employe in the harness shop of G. Rhodenbaugh, is in the city.

—Frank Copper and W. W. Hoffman say they had a perfectly i-mense time at Defiance last Sunday.

—Wheat is out in head and farmers are making extensive preparations for the harvest of the same.

—Trade at home; you feel better when you leave your money in the hands of home merchants.

—The boy who drives the street-sprinkler is faithful to his duty, and he gets in some effective work.

Things are beginning to look neat about our public square, and hereafter Billy will keep it looking so.

—The means for building the masonic temple, at Fort Wayne, have been secured and now it's a sure go.

—Charlie Cook, who takes an occasional dismal tramp from the junction, has no hankering for tramps.

—The concert given by Miss Frane Stahl, last evening, was well received by a large and attentive audience.

—Mrs. Townsend delivered a temperance lecture to a full house at the Methodist church last Sunday evening.

—Thomas Sommers' new brick business house, on Seventh street, will be completed and occupied in a few days.

—A young friend thinks the best way to hoe corn is to sit down to it. He is one of the been-theres, and ought to know.

—There will be no services at the Presbyterian church next Sabbath morning. Preaching in the evening as usual.

—Geo. Reiter, of Fort Wayne, manufacturer of the far-famed "Pony" cigar, exhibited his smiling phiz on our streets Friday.

—The strawberry festival, given by the ladies' society of the Presbyterian church, last Tuesday, was pretty well attended.

—Billy Shaffer and Bob McClellan got in from Cincinnati Friday; said they had more fun than a barrel of monkeys.

—Mr. Geo. Yesbera, of West Unity, Ohio, was in the city several days last week visiting with his brothers, G. H. and Fred.

—The storm prevented a larger attendance at the burial of a Miss Goetschius, at the Auburn cemetery, last Sabbath.

—The New Castle Democrat cautions the press against one Dr. Fishblate, whom it calls a quack and humbug of the first water.

—"Economy is wealth," thought the young man who called for a five-cent dish of ice-cream, at Hollister's, the other evening.

—We are pleased to note that Miss Ida Mahurin, who has been a victim to that terrible disease consumption, is rapidly improving.

—New novelties at the mammoth clothing establishment of Sam, Pete & Max, Fort Wayne, Ind. See their new advertisement.

—Dr. Williams, a young man from Fosteria, Ohio, is spending a few days in the city, the guest of his old friends Copper and Hoffman.

—Last week it was hotter'n blazes, and this week the boys have had to re-resurrect their overcoats. "Vat a countries, vat a beeples!"

—Mrs. A. J. Little will move her millinery stock into the room formerly occupied by G. H. Yesbera, first door north of the postoffice.

—"They say" whisky unlocks a man's tongue. We believe it since listening to the clatter of a couple of our young "gents" the other night.

—We have a lengthy communication from Garrett, which we cannot make room for this week. It will appear on the first page next week.

—A large excursion, numbering some 175 people, went from Jackson to Chicago, Tuesday morning, over the Saginaw and B. & O. railroads.

—Dr. Matheny and wife, and Guy Plum and wife, took advantage of the low-rate excursion to Cincinnati last week, returning on Saturday.

—Mr. A. W. McMillen and wife, of La Porte, and Mr. G. C. McMillen and wife, of Corunna, were the guests of Recorder Boland last Sunday.

—Ainsworth Ensley, son of Wm. Ensley, fell from a wagon yesterday afternoon, between town and the junction, and broke his wrist.

—Jos. Abright, with a couple of friends, went up to Pleasant Lake, Tuesday, for a big fish. They had a good time, and so did the 'big fish.'

—The Courier office is indebted to George Clark by quite a majority. He heard our strawberry wail last week and responded with a bucket-full. Thanks.

—A fat lady had a little monkey up at the Rome City excursion, last week, which she took great pleasure in exhibiting to a crowd of highly-amused spectators.

—The "lesser light" in the Courier office is under obligations to Conductor Covert, of the Saginaw, for favors; and he may call on us for a reciprocation at any time.

—Miss Anna Williams leaves next Saturday for her home in Lima, Ohio. She has been here only a short time, but will be pleasantly remembered by many friends.

—A man in Kosciusko county committed suicide immediately after eating a hearty dinner. That beats all the patent remedies for quick die-gestion we ever heard of.

—Mr. G. H. K. Moss and family arrived at home yesterday morning. Mr. Moss is much improved in health, and feels like a new man. We are glad to see him looking so well.

—Posters are out for a grand celebration at Columbia City, on the glorious Fourth. No doubt, with the usual enterprise of that thriving little city, the programme will be carried out to the letter.

—It occured last Friday night, and there were four of 'em, and three of 'em came out at the small end of the horn, and t'other fellow was winner, and—that's all, because we wouldn't give it away for four aces.

—How about that walking match? Are you going to "squeal out," after Charley has gone to the expense of building a track, on which he has blistered both heels and otherwise injured himself in practicing for the occasion?

—What is more embarrassing than to entertain your sweet-heart in the presence of the whole family? Our "devil" thinks after you have made the "point," it is ten-to-one worse to entertain your mother-in-law. Don't believe it, do you?

—Jim D. McGill, formerly of Fort Wayne, more recently of Jaxn, and futurely of Toledo, presented his handsome mug in our news dispensary last Tuesday. He got his shoes half-soled Wednesday morning and pulled out for home.

We wish to say to our readers that Dr. Price's Special Flavoring Extracts of Rose, Almond, Nectarine, Vanilla, Lemon, etc., are the finest, purest, and most natural flavors we have ever used. The common flavoring extracts in the market bear no comparison for fine flavor to Dr. Price's.

—It is wonderful what a love for music the people of this burg have. A lately organized glee club was threatened with the contents of a double-barreled shot-gun, for awakening one of our citizens from "his" sweet slumber by such a "horrible noise!"

—The presentation of the Black Crook, at the Olympic, in Fort Wayne, has been unavoidably postponed, owing to the extension of a successful appearance in Detroit. It will be on the boards at the above-named place, however, next Monday, June 23, continuing one week.

—In the case of Parker, of the Kendallville News, against Myers of the Standard, tried last week at Albion, the plaintiff got a verdict of $150. The suit was brought for $10,000; therefore the jury came within $9,850 of it, and Myers will endeavor to make it worse than that by an appeal.

—The most sudden death from disease which has occurred in Auburn for some time, was that of Sarah, wife of Joseph Rothenberger, who died at her residence, on Friday afternoon last, after only eight hours sickness. Mrs. R. was highly esteemed and much respected by all who knew her.

—John Ashley and Dick Burniston visited the northern lakes, last week, with the intention of laying in a summer's supply of fish, and would have done it, Dick says, "if they had remained long enough." They brought home seven, all of which were dressed and well salted—yes they did.

—The Kendallville correspondent of the Ligonier Banner says, "quite a number of Kendallvillians participated in the singing at the Sunday-school congress, held at Rome City, recently." These are the first "villians" of a religious nature we ever heard of, but we presume their regular attendance at Sabbath-school will account for it.

—C. H. Hoyt is at West Liberty, O. to which place he went last Monday. His wife and child, we regret to say, will remain there.

—A couple of sad-eyed individuals from Garrett, showed up well on our streets last Sunday. The boys were evidently "full," and of course, were not choicy in their company. Save your "rep," boys, and be a little more select next time.

—Oh! why is it that Auburn, with a population of nearly 3,000, cannot have a brass-band? Almost every cross-road town in the county has one, and sweet Auburn must go in the rear in this respect. Not long since we had one of the best bands in the state, and could have it again, if the citizens would manifest a little interest in this direction.

—"Live for something," says an exchange, but do not try to make people believe that you are a fool, by thinking that it is within your power to stop this globe from revolving, or even ruin a newspaper office by stopping your share of the business because some one thinks you are likely to expose his "rascality," when he has you under obligations to him for a favor.

—We have heard of persons getting an elephant without knowing what to do with it, but that is certainly not the case with the people of Churubusco and vicinity, for the neat and tasty appearance of the "White Elephant," a semi-monthly quarto newspaper published at that place, certainly gives it a welcome in every family. We wish the new enterprise unbounded success.

—Benjamin Gaskill, of Troy township, was brought before 'Squire Altenberg on last Saturday, having been arrested for burning O. P. Learned's barn, on the night of the 12th inst. The prisoner was put under $3,000 bond, and failing to secure bail he was taken to jail to await trial in the circuit court. Two nights after Mr. Learned's barn was burned, the saw-mill of Gaskill was also burned, and Mr. John S. Robinson, the party who had Gaskill arrested as reported in our last issue, was arrested and tried before 'Squire Altenberg for setting fire to the mill. The evidence against Robinson was not sufficient to convict him, and he was released.

"Noses Have they, but they smell not!"

Among the lower orders, bad smells are little heeded; in fact, "noses have they, but they smell not;" but to the refined and educated, a pleasant odor, emanating from a well-dressed person, produces feelings of pleasure and delight. The fragrance of Dr. Price's Unique Perfumes produces an influence that is captivating and delightful.

Stave and Heading Bolts.

The following price-list of stave and heading bolts will take effect July 1st 1879.

No. 1, red-oak stave bolts $2.50 per cord
No. 1, white-oak " " 2.00 " "

There will be no change in prices on elm stave bolts, and white-ash and bass-wood heading.

County Asylum for Poor.

We gather the following items from the report of the superintendent of the farm and asylum for the poor, made to the board of county commissioners at their June session:

Male inmates	21
Female inmates	9
Total	30
Able to do labor—males	6
Live stock owned by the county.
Cattle	34
Sheep	28
Hogs	75
Mules and horses	8
Chickens	68

Temperance Lecturers.

The lecture of Mrs. Prof. Townsend at the M. E. church, Sunday evening, was well attended, but candor compels us to say that the lecture was far from being satisfactory to the audience, nor in fact even up to the merest average of the many itinerant apostles of temperance.

On Monday last another temperance apostle, hailing from everywhere, by the name of Allen, a thick-set, long-haired "genus homo," apparently from fifty to fifty-five years of age, struck our town to redeem it from the thraldom of King Alcohol. He claimed to be second only to John B. Gough; had enrolled nearly as many names as he; was a veteran in the cause; had a 600-page book of statistics, &c., to give away. He had written recommendations from the Angola club as to his services there. He presented his documents and arguments to our friend Dills, the ex-president of our defunct temperance club; but Dills either smelled something wrong or was too busy in court, and turned him over to the mercies of our ministers, where he must have received the same attention; for that evening he proved upon the streets that he was a much better hand at getting drunk than in getting up temperance lectures. Tuesday morning our ex-president took him in hand and treated him to a lecture which, if he is a gentleman of any decency, he will forever heed.

People can not be too careful in giving credence and recommendations to such tramps, and unless people can do good in the cause and not bring it into disrepute, as the above two pretenders, they had better do nothing.

—"Sammy" Ralston, the little four-year-old girl, brought down the house with her "Little birdie sing for me," at the concert last night.

This is Too Much.

Here is the way the Kendallville Standard, of last week, fixes up the junior and unhitched-up half of the Courier:

"Robert J. Lowry, of the Auburn Courier, was married last week to a lady in Valparaiso."

If Bro. Mayers isn't a trifle more careful in the selection of his news items, he will get another libel suit on his hands; and he'll not get off at $150, either. It strikes us, however, that "Zim," of the Valparaiso Messenger, is at the bottom of it all, and we'll get even if it takes four thousand years.

Proceedings of the Board of Commissioners, June Term, 1879.

Allowed Joseph Pepple $10 for damages caused by the construction of a bridge across Black creek, in Butler township.

Petition to release Samuel Davis, of Troy township, from the payment of ditch tax assessed against him, is dismissed.

The county surveyor ordered to locate the line and boundaries of an old highway in Franklin township, on the petition of O. P. Learned.

Contract for erecting truss bridge across Cedar creek, in the town of Waterloo, awarded to the Western Bridge Works.

Contract for building truss bridge across Cedar creek near Daniel Goodwin's, in Smithfield township, awarded to H. Griswold.

Ordered by the board, that the county recorder transcribe the general index of mortgages, the old record being badly mutilated.

Contract for constructing pile bridge across Cedar creek, in Union township, awarded to H. Griswold.

Contract for constructing a truss bridge across Twenty-six-mile creek, at Newville, awarded to H. Griswold.

Contract for furnishing records and stationers notions for the use of county officers, awarded to O. H. Hasselman, of the Indianapolis Journal company, for the period of one year.

A complete list of allowances will be found in another column.

Spencerville.

Editors Courier:—The communication in the Courier of June 5th, signed "Scribbler," is a misrepresentation, and we desire to say that he is alone in calling the concert given by the Newvillians a fizzle. We have no certain knowledge who this party is, but we do know that he does not express the sentiments of any of the good and respectable citizens of this place. The parties referred to gave us a very good entertainment, free of cost, and were well received by all who were there. We hope "Scribbler" will recover from his biliousness by the time the Newvillians visit us again, and be prepared to treat them with the respect due them.

R. N.

(From another Correspondent.)

—School closes for the summer on Tuesday of the present week.

—Work is progressing finely on the new hardware store of J. M. Cahill.

—Mr. George Bittinger and family, of Ft. Wayne, spent the Sabbath with friends in town.

—The Masonic fraternity are building a hall in connection with Mr. Cahill's hardware and tin store.

—The entertainment given by our band Saturday evening, was not a success, on account of the heavy rain-storm.

—J. A. Provines has contributed one more to the female population of our town, and Zack Kagey adds one more to the opposite sex.

Corunna News.

—Mr. Jesse Shook is building a new fence.

The trains have partially "let up" on the whistling business.

—Dr. Cissel has gone to Maryland to attend the death-bed of his mother.

—The wool-buyers are quite busy, and handle a large quantity each day.

—Mrs. T. B. Hall, of Pioneer, Ohio, is visiting her parents, Mr. & Mrs. E. Orr.

—Perry Allen has taken his team to Auburn, and is working for I. Cool and Marshal Scott.

—Quarterly meeting began last Friday and continued over Sunday. It was largely attended.

—Andrew McMellin and wife, of Laporte, have been visiting under the paternal roof for several days.

—Mr. G. C. Colwell, the gentlemanly traveling agent for a Cincinnati hardware firm, is in town on a short vacation.

—Miss Mary Goetschius, living between this place and Auburn, died last Saturday, of consumption. Her death has been looked for at almost any moment.

—A large number from this place attended the pic-nic at Sedan last Saturday. Ed. Orr only had 75 men, women and children on a hay-rack, and about a ton of "grub."

—We looked for Pete Eldridge, Billy Shaffer and their girls, of Auburn, last Sabbath but they did not make their appearance. Probably they stopped to "See Dan" and will give us call in the near future.

Enuf.

—A. J. Ralston and T. J. Cuppy take the Eel River elevator again on the first of next month. They will pay the highest prices for grain.

TUTT'S PILLS IMPART APPETITE.
Dr. Tutt has succeeded in combining in these pills the heretofore antagonistic qualities of a Strengthening, Purgative, and a Purifying Tonic. Their first apparent effect is to increase the appetite by causing the food to properly assimilate. Thus the system is nourished, and by their tonic action on the digestive organs, regular and healthy evacuations are produced. The rapidity with which persons take on flesh while under the influence of these pills, indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, melancholy, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system. Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents. Office 35 Murray Street, NEW YORK.

THE SCHOOL OF LIFE.

BY GEORGE W. BURWELL.

As I sit beside my window,
This calm and pleasant day,
I can hear the hum of voices
In the school room o'er the way.
The sound transports me back again
To the happy days of yore;
I see the old stone school-house
And climb the hill once more.

I seem to pause within the door,
And voices that I hear
Call back the dying memories
Of many a by-gone year.
The busy hum has ceased
At the tapping of the bell,
And now they tune their voices
To the organ's gentle swell.

But hark! 'tis from "o'er the way
I hear the gentle strain;
The day-dream now is over,
And "Richard is himself again.
Yet I will write of present time,
And of days that are to come,
When our work on earth is ended,
That Christ may say "Well done.

We are still at school, though older,
The trying school of life;
Experience is the teacher's name,
The house a world of strife.
Its lessons are severer,
Much harder to control,
Refining for eternity
Our never dying soul.

The merchant in his counting-room,
The honest tiller of the soil,
The rich man and the beggar,
The mechanic at his toil,
Have each to learn life's lesson,
For all must graduate,
When time and death shall close the term,
And shut the book of fate.

The next scene is the opening;
Each student then will know
If he has learned life's lesson well
In the school-room here below.
Then let us strive to merit
The reward that will be given;
For God has said if we faithful prove
We shall have a home in heaven.

CHICAGO, Ill.

ADRIA.

An English Story.

When I went to Uplands Park, I took my horse and dog with me; not because there were no horses and dogs at Margaret's residence, but because I never took up my abode anywhere without them. Turk, my pure-blooded Arabian, was the only horse I had ever cared to ride; and Flo, my hound, was a creature so magnificent as to challenge universal admiration. She knew more about my whims, understood my moods and humors better than anybody in the world.

Uplands Park was my sister Margaret's home. It was a magnificent place, but she never had been happy there. Her marriage was one of convenience. Dr. Severn, her husband, would have been the most ordinary of men, but for one marked, distinguishing trait—obstinacy. Margaret was the fairest, gentlest creature I ever knew.

I had come to them because I had suffered greatly from recent illness, and was much reduced. The situation of Uplands Park was particularly salubrious.

"Oh, a few weeks here will set me up all right!" said I, carelessly, but holding her face between my hands, to mark the little new lines of care there.

"Well, sit down here in my pet easy-chair, John, while I go and see that your room is all ready. And," added my sister, as she disappeared, "I'll send Adria up to talk to you."

As I relapsed into Margaret's pet easy-chair, I wondered who "Adria" was.

The door was open, and overlooked the garden. The flowers were in blossom, and the bees were buzzing over the mignonette bed. I saw my little nephew, Phil, running along the gravel walks, and called to him. He came and climbed upon my knee.

"Have you brought Turk, Uncle John?"

"Yes, my boy."

"And Flo?"

"And Flo, Phil."

"Then won't we have some good fun?" said Phil, with considerable emphasis.

But the child was tired, and, with his rosy cheek against my breast, the white lids drooped over the blue eyes, and the little fellow was fast asleep. As I sat eagerly watching the bees, I suddenly heard voices.

"I told you so before, Uncle Severn. We had a talk about this a month ago; don't you remember?"

The voice was a young girl's.

"Something was said—yes. But my attention has been called more closely to this matter lately, Adria."

"But when I told you that I didn't wish to marry this man I expected the subject to be dismissed forever!"

The words were uttered in a tone of ringing impatience.

"Hush! hush!" said the doctor soothingly. "You are getting exceedingly irritable lately, Adria; I think your nerves must be out of order."

"My nerves will do very well, if you will never mention Charles Redman's name to me again."

There was the rustle of silk, with a footstep upon the terrace. A lady swept by the door, looked in, paused, and hesitated.

"Capt. Fane, I did not know you had come. You have been ill; pray let me relieve you of that happy child."

I let her take the boy, for the sake of having those penciled features and that wealth of brown hair brought so near my face. She was a proud beauty, but it was a pride that I liked. Everything about her—her rippled hair, her hazel eyes, with their black, curled lashes, her white throat, her dress of rose-colored cambric, her dainty silk apron—was artistically pretty. I irreverently thought that she looked like some pink-and-white confectionery, good enough to eat. I forgot that Margaret had promised to send her to talk to me, but talked, involuntarily, for half an hour.

At the end of that time my sister appeared, followed by a footman with refreshments for her invalid.

"I am glad you and Adria are getting acquainted so nicely," she said.

But on Margaret's appearance, Adria fell into an absorbed reverie evidently considering me off her hands, and giving way to a natural inclination. She sat knitting her white brows, and staring—I use the word advisedly—out at the window. By-and-by, Phil rolled off the sofa, and naturally woke up crying. The ease and grace with which Adria Eaton rescued and soothed that frightened child gave her a place in my heart forever.

She was, it seemed, an orphan niece of Dr. Severn, and was, henceforth, to have a home at Uplands Park. I revolved the fact with interest.

In the course of a week I was on very fair terms with Miss Adria. She talked and sang delightfully, and I did not wonder that she was the belle of the neighborhood, as Margaret told me. But I, who saw her day by day in the home circle, found her sweeter, I think, than any man she danced with could fancy her to be. Her quiet tones, her simple and exquisite morning-toilets, her fondness for little Phil and the baby, showed traits of character utterly unlike those which made her popular at ball and party.

Returning from a walk one morning with little Phil, I spied Adria Eaton in the lane. She wore a white dress, and swung her straw hat by its cherry ribbons; and beside her walked the most villainously handsome man I ever saw.

"There's Mr. Redman," said little Phil, pointing.

I put down his chubby fore-finger, passed the pair with a bow, and proceeded into the garden.

In half an hour Adria came in, much disturbed. She passed Phil, who was putting Flo into a harness of his mother's scarf, and even the baby, little Maud, who cooed for a caress, without a word. There was—I was rather shocked to see it—a look of passionate irritation on her face. She went up to her room, and was alone until late in the afternoon. Then she came down, composed in manner, but with some visible trouble about her.

She took Margaret's infant then, and sank down upon a lounge. I was somewhat surprised in a few moments to see that both she and the child were asleep.

"I am glad of it," murmured my good sister. "I do not know what ails Adria, but she has not slept well for weeks past. Almost at any time I awake I can hear her walking in her room."

"There is more the matter with her than you suspect," said Dr. Severn, behind us.

"You don't think Adria is ill, doctor?" said Margaret, anxiously.

"Not physically."

"Something on her mind, then?"

"She is habitually moody and irritable."

"Of late, a little—yes. Poor Adria! I wonder what has gone wrong with her?" and, softly lifting a burnished wave of Adria's hair, Margaret gently kissed the beautiful flushed cheek.

Dr. Severn turned away. I took up my book again, and silence reigned. At the end of half an hour Adria suddenly woke, with a sharp cry. Margaret ran to her.

"Oh, I thought I was married!" cried Adria.

"Adria, Adria, what are you crying about?" said Margaret, the next moment.

The girl, with her face buried in the cushions, was sobbing violently.

"She is ill," said I.

Dr. Severn entered, and approached the lounge.

"She had best go to her room," he said, significantly.

When Adria had gone up-stairs, Margaret turned to her husband, saying, "Doctor, now what do you really think is the matter with Adria?"

"Some mental disorder troubles her." he replied; at which unexpected answer Margaret and I stood silent. "She must keep her room for a while," added the doctor.

"But that, you know, Adria will never do unless very seriously ill."

"She must keep her room, then," repeated Dr. Severn, dogmatically.

From that day this man began a system of petty tyranny over that girl, that was, to her morbid, nervous state, excessively irritating. I do not think that she was seriously disordered at first; but under confinement, and persistent thwarting of her desires, a slow fever settled upon her. She was denied all society, and kept in a dark and imperfectly aired appartment.

"Adria begs to have the windows open; but the doctor says that if she catches cold it will be certain death," said Margaret, much troubled.

I did not know what to say. There was something strange to me about the whole affair. I observed, however, that I never had seen a sick-room that was not greatly benefited by the admission of fresh air.

"Severn is a brute or a blockhead," I would mutter.

I inquired about her daily.

"No better," was the invariable answer.

At length Margaret said that Adria seemed to wander much in her mind, and she was afraid that she was very ill. A gloom settled upon all the house.

One morning, at breakfast, the doctor made a strange announcement.

"Adria informed me this morning that she wished to be married!" he said.

"Married!" cried Margaret.

"It is the whim of a diseased brain; but I believe that it will be best to gratify it," said the doctor, meditatively. "You know, of course, that she is engaged to my friend Mr. Redmman?"

"She never told me. Adria was always so close about her love affairs. She seemed to think it indelicate to discuss them," exclaimed Margaret.

"Charles Redman is much attached to Adria. If he choses to please this whim of hers, and take an invalid bride, I think the change would be good for her. He would take her to Italy."

Margaret began to look a little cheered; but, from the time that sly-eyed man's name was mentioned, I became actively suspicious. That Adria Eaton did not love him, I was almost as certain.

Dr. Severn seemed more than ever interested in his niece's recovery. He was with her almost constantly. Margaret told me that the wedding would probably take place; for the doctor had decided upon it, and she had heard Adria express a wish that it should be.

"But, poor thing," said my sister, burying her face in her handkerchief, "it will be more like a funeral than a wedding. When Adria lies asleep, it frightens me to look at her—she looks, almost, as if she were dead."

"Is Mr. Redman near here?"

"Yes. But Adria refuses to see him until her wedding-day. It's strange," added my sister, looking troubled again.

I saw Redman that day—saw him walking in the avenue with Dr. Severn He was listening to the doctor with such sly triumph on his smooth face that I instinctively felt smitten with indignation. From that moment I resolved to see Adria—to stand her friend, indeed.

That evening I had an opportunity for making my request. Margaret said that the ceremony would take place the next evening, and asked me to get flowers from the green-house.

"When I bring them, I should like to take them up to her," I said.

"Why, certainly," she answered.

Procuring the white roses, orange-flowers, and myrtle, I proceeded to Adria's chamber, and lightly knocked at the door. At first there was no answer. Then came a faint "Come in."

The door was ajar. I pushed it open, and perceived that the apartment had but its habitual occupant, Adria. She lay among the pillows, a mere shadow of her former self.

"My sister gave me permission to come in and see you for a moment," I said. "I have brought your wedding-flowers."

I held them to her view. Her face was much emaciated, her eyes large and hollow.

"Roses, orange-flowers. Why are they mixed with myrtle? You should have had cypress instead," she said faintly.

"Cypress at a wedding?"

"My funeral is so near, you know," she answered.

I knelt down by the bedside, and took the frail little hands in mine.

"Adria," said I, "do you think you are going to die?"

"I know that I am," she answered. "The doctor has told me so. I would not have consented to this marriage—But you do not know," she interrupted.

"I wish to know," I replied. "Dear Adria, I have learned to love you in your trouble. Trust me, as a friend, with whatever burdens you."

For a moment she looked at me in wonder, then covered her face with her frail hands, and I saw the great tears trickling through the white, slender fingers. But, as I bent over her, she put me gently back.

"No, no! it is too late now! Let them have it as they will."

"Adria," said I, "you are not going to die. You have a whole lifetime before you. It is this confinement and a heavy heart which is preying upon you."

Again she regarded me with troubled doubt.

"You do not love this Redman?"

She shook her head.

"Then why do you consent to marry him?"

"Uncle wishes me to. I have consented because I thought it did not matter, since I am to die so soon."

"Is there any money in this affair, Adria?"

"Yes; my little fortune—only a few thousand pounds. It was left so that it is not in my control until I am married or of age. I am only 19 now, you know. If I marry Mr. Redman, it will be his, whether I die or not, and I had as lief he would have it as any one. It does not matter to me about the money, and when I am married I think they will let me be in peace."

At that moment I heard a step on the stair. Adria was also much exhausted with talking, and I left the room. But now I knew my ground. I was confident that Dr. Severn wished to obtain some advantage by this marriage. I also was determined that it never should take place. All next day the preparations went on. Meanwhile I decided upon my course. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon a carriage came out, bringing Redman and a clergyman. Soon after the family were summoned to Adria's chamber, where a special licence was read.

The bed was snowily draped, and strewn with flowers. There were orange blossoms in Adria's dark hair as it fell in lovely profusion upon the pillows. She was supported in a sitting posture, and Redman stood beside her, holding her hand, as the ceremony commenced. The clergyman was stationed before them. Dr. Severn and Margaret stood near. The servants were clustered by the door.

As soon as the ceremony was fairly commenced, so that the guilty parties stood fully committed in their intentions, I stepped forward and said, "I forbid the marriage!"

The clergyman paused, and looked at me blankly.

"I forbid the marriage, now and forever!" I reiterated.

"On what plea?" he asked mildly, while Redman and Dr. Severn looked at me with fierce eyes.

"The marriage is enforced contrary to the young lady's wishes. She does not enter it willingly," I said, calmly. "Dr. Severn," I added, as that gentleman turned furiously upon me, "you need not bluster. This girl is the victim of some evil machinations, and, were you her uncle forty times over, I would stand her friend and protect her from you!"

"Adria," he said in a loud voice, turning toward the bed, "speak! Are you willing to marry Charles Redman or no?"

To my inexpressible relief, Adria feebly shook her head. She looked faint, and weakly wiped the drops of perspiration from her brow. I threw open a window, begging Margaret to at once bathe her forehead.

In great confusion, mingled with ill-suppressed oaths, the wedding party dissolved.

My next intention was obstructed by the movement of my enemies.

At dark, Doctor Severn and Redman, after close conference, drove away in the carriage. No vehicle or carriage-horses were within my reach.

As I stood despondently in the stable, a sudden thought came over me. Turk's gait was more gentle than the motion of any carriage. My brave horse should bear Adria from her tormentors. I told Margaret what I wished done. She trembled, but lent her aid. Adria was dressed, wrapped in a cloak, and I brought her down the stairs in my arms. She kissed Margaret from my shoulders; then I placed her on Turk's back.

Never did my pet bear himself with such gentle grace. As I walked at the bridle, carefully watching Adria's face in the moonlight, she assured me she was not getting weary—rather that she seemed gaining strength with every breath of the pure, sweet, open air.

Thus I bore my treasure three miles to the railway station, and thence to the home of my mother.

Six weeks afterward, confidingly, willingly, Adria Eaton became my wife.

Immediately, Dr. Severn sent me a threatening letter, with which I lit a cigar. He did not trouble me, for he had other things to attend to. Redman immediately brought a suit against him for an immense debt. Before the law could take its course the doctor had fled the country.

He died abroad, and Margaret came to us in our happy home for a time, but soon left us to marry the man of her choice—her childhood's love—for whom she had pined the five long years of her marriage. She is very happy.

The Tennysons.

It is more than half a century—the date was 1827—since there appeared in London a modest little volume with the modest title, "Poems by Two Brothers," and the modest motto, "Hæc nos novimus esse nihil." The brothers, as is now well known, were Charles and Alfred Tennyson, though their identity was not established until the publication, three years later, of a volume entitled "Poems, Chiefly Lyrical, by Alfred Tennyson," and another, issued from a different press, of "Sonnets and Fugitive Pieces, by Charles Tennyson, Trin. Col. Cam." In the preface to the "Poems by Two Brothers" it was stated that "the following poems were written from the age of 15 to 18, not conjointly, but individually," and at this early period it was generally thought that Charles showed the greater promise of the two. But the rapidly-acquired fame of the younger brother eclipsed the poetic light of his elder, who, instead of devoting himself to poetry, studied for orders, and in the seclusion of a country parish—he was for many years vicar of Grasby, in Lincolnshire—never rose beyond the rank of a graceful sonneteer. For some family reason he added the name of Turner to his patronymic, and it is this Rev. Charles Tennyson Turner who died at Cheltenham on the 25th of last month. Frederick, Charles and Alfred were the eldest of seven sons of Dr. George Clayton Tennyson, rector of Somerby. Alfred is now in his 70th year and Charles was about two years older.

The Nihilists of Kieff.

The Nihilist society recently discovered in Kieff consisted mainly of men and women of noble birth. One man (Brandtner) turned out to be a subject of Prussia. A body of gendarmes were ordered to arrest the conspirators; and at midnight the descent upon them was begun; but they had made preparation to meet their assailants with pistols. A desperate struggle ensued, in which men and women alike took active part. The Nihilists were finally overpowered and secured, but not before one of the gendarmes had been shot dead and five others wounded.

On the preliminary inquest all the prisoners were identified, except five men whose names and rank could not be discovered. Of the women, three were daughters of military officers, and one was the wife of a surgeon.

The prisoners were accused of having formed a secret society, the purpose of which was armed riot and the overthrow of the present system of government in Russia; and they were also accused of armed resistance to the officers and gendarmes. In the possession of the prisoners were revolutionary pamphlets and false passports.

Four of them have since been tried, sentenced, and executed, and the others exiled to Siberia.

An Elephant's Gratitude.

The Birmingham Gazette says that among the animals belonging to a menagerie that visited Tenbury recently is a fine female elephant named "Lizzie." Nearly five years ago this animal, after a hard walk, was allowed to drink a quantity of cold water, the result being that she was seized with severe illness, and her life was all but despaired of. A chemist of Tenbury being called in, by his vigorous efforts and skillful treatment she ultimately recovered. Lizzie had not forgotten her preserver, and, when she was walking in procession through Tenbury, recognizing the chemist at the door of his shop, she left the other animals, and, going to him affectionately, placed her trunk in his hand. In the evening the chemist visited the exhibition, when Lizzie gave him a warm and most gratifying reception. Gently encircling him with her trunk, she held him for some time captive, to the anxiety of the spectators, and was with difficulty induced to let him go.

The Anglo-Afghan Treaty.

The British have gained every political and commercial advantage for which they entered upon the Afghan war in the treaty signed at Gundamuk by the Ameer and Maj. Cavagnari. The British are assigned the Kuran, Sibi and Pishin valleys, giving them control of the mountain passes leading from India, and will hand the surplus revenues over to the Ameer, who is guaranteed a yearly subsidy of $300,000. The British will remain at Candahar till fall, and will appoint a Resident at Cabul, to which point a telegraph line is to be established. The British Resident is to have an escort for agents sent to the Afghan frontier on special occasions; the Ameer is guaranteed against foreign aggression; British sympathizers in Afghanistan are to be amnestied, and there is to be peace and friendship hereafter between the contracting parties.

Man in the Inter-Glacial Age.

Mr. Sidney B. J. Skertchly, of the British Geographical Society, has been contributing a series of articles to the English Mechanic on the ever-fresh topic of the antiquity of man. His closing essay he sums up as follows: "The question whether man was or was not in existence during the great cycle of the glacial period is settled in the affirmative. The evidence is so clear, and has been obtained in such widely-separated areas, that it would be astonishing it is not universally accepted, did we not know that such has been the history of all scientific discovery. In the year 1833 the evidence of man's cotemporaneity with extinct mammals was as complete as it is to-day, but for thirty years it was disregarded. Can we wonder, then, at the belief in the inter-glacial age of man makes but slow progress?" Following Lubbock's "Prehistoric Man," Mr. Skertchly has these great divisions: First, historic period; second, the iron age; third, the bronze age; fourth, the neolithic or stone age, and fifth, the palæolithic or drift age—the most ancient of all. The first four periods Mr. Skertchly classifies as post glacial; the last he believes to be glacial. This glacial age he subdivides into four periods of excessive cold and ice, represented respectively by the lower-bowlder clay, the chalky-bowlder clay, the purple boulder clay, and the Hessle bowlder clay—the first-named being the earliest. Between these formations Mr. Skertchly places three inter-glacial periods, the early, intermediate and late palæolithic. Accepting Croll's theory of the origin of climatic changes, the glacial period began 200,000 years ago, and ended about 80,000 years ago. This would make the age of the early palæolithic period about 150,000 years, and to this period Mr. Skertchly believes the first recognized traces of man clearly belong.

The Pocasset Tragedy.

The Pocasset tragedy is fast being relegated into that forgetfulness which so soon overtakes even the most sensational crime in this age, but sufficient interest still attaches to it to render the present condition of the unhappy parents a matter of interest. Neither of them manifest any symptom of insanity, and Freeman himself protests against any attempt to secure his acquittal on this ground. He still believes that God called upon him to kill his child, and tries to console himself for the failure of her expected resurrection by a theory that the "sacrifice" was intended to produce a great religious awakening, of which he sees signs in the widespread discussion of his course by the press and the pulpit. But Mrs. Freeman's maternal love has fully triumphed over the fanatical faith that led her to acquiesce in the murder, though she still insists that they were guilty of no crime. Their brethren and sisters of the Adventist faith are utterly bewildered, their dazed condition being well illustrated by the plaintive remark of one of the elders: "I don't understand it. Here is the promise, that if we have faith sufficient we may say to a mountain, 'Be removed,' and it is done. Our faith was equal to that and yet our faith does not avail." Meanwhile much religious excitement is reported as the result of a recent revival at Portsmouth, N. H., and the Pocasset tragedy might have been repeated there had not the crazy father, who insisted that the Lord had commanded him to sacrifice his children, had sense enough still left to beg the neighbors to take them away before he killed them.

High-Priced Trotters.

The first man in this country to pay an excessively fancy price for a trotter was Mr. Robert Bonner, who gave Mr. George Alley $15,000 for Dexter. Mr. Bonner afterward gave $33,000 for Cooley, $45,000 for Pocahontas, $20,000 for Startle, and $15,000 for Grafton.

Large as these sums aggregate, they have been exceeded by Mr. Henry N. Smith, who has paid more money for trotters than any man living. He paid for Lady Thorn, $30,000; for Goldsmith Maid, $35,000; for Lucy, $25,000; for Jay Gould, $35,000. Gould he bought of Fisk, George Hall and Jay Gould. They owned the horse, having bought him from a New Bedford party when his name was Judge Brigham. Tattler he bought of A. J. Alexander for $17,000; Gen. Knox he paid $10,000 for; Rosalind cost him $13,000; Socrates, $26,000; Idol, $7,500; Western Girl, $1,000; Martha Nutwood, $1,500. Daisy Burns he traded Harry Harley for with Commodore Vanderbilt; she stood him in $3,500. What does all that foot up? $204,500 exactly. Goldsmith Maid was on the go, in the cars, for thirteen years, from one end of the country to the other, traveling over 100,000 miles, always taking her regular rest on the cars as if in her box stall. She has netted to her owner over $75,000, after paying all her expenses and giving Budd Doble one-half.

A New Cure for Gout.

Several articles and letters have been printed in the German papers of late lauding the efficacy of the sting of the common bee as a cure for gout. Here is one of the latest of these communications, which appeared only a few days ago in the Augsburg Evening Gazette: "I was lying in bed," says the writer, "suffering from a heavy attack of gout, accompanied with violent pains in my left foot, when I chanced to read in a newspaper an article describing how gout may be cured by the sting of bees. I at once determined to try the remedy, and soon contrived a small box by means of which a captured bee could be applied to the afflicted part. I then let my foot be stung by three bees in succession, each bee leaving his sting behind in my flesh. After a few minutes these stings were extracted; and when the pain caused by them had subsided I found that the gouty pain had also left me. On the same day I left my bed, and on the morrow was able to walk about. For some little time my foot was slightly inflamed, and I experienced some burning sensation; but in four or five days this left me, and I was completely recovered."

LINES—TO THE FIRST FLY OF 1879.

BY BOB BURDETTE.

Dance on my nose with your tickling feet,
Blue-bottled fly!
Sing in my ears with your buzz to greet
Me, as I lie.
You will seek me out in my dark retreat,
With an eager zeal that no screen can beat,
And I try to slap you clear into the sweet,
Sweet by and by.

I haven't seen you since seventy-eight,
Little house fly;
And I see you now with the bitterest hate
You can defy.
Oh, how I hate you, nobody knows,
Author of half of my summer woes,
Oh, how I prayed that you might be froze,
Villainous fly!

All through the winter you [illegible]
Not much, Mary Ann.
Now all the summer you'll do as you please;
That is your plan.
When in the warm afternoons we would sleep,
Near us your wakefulest vigils you'll keep.
Precious is sleeping, but waking is cheap;
Sleep, man, if you can.

Oh, how I wish that my two broad hands,
Spread left and right,
Stretched from the poles to equator's bands,
Giants of might:
Some summer day in my wrath I would rise,
Sweeping all space with my hands of size,
And mash all the uncounted millions of flies
Clear out of sight.

Vain are my wishes, Oh, little house fly!
You're hard to mash;
Strong men may swear and women may cry,
*Teething their gnash!
But into the house your friends you'll lug;
You'll bathe your feet in the sirup jug,
And your cares you'll drown in the baby's mug,
Cheeky and brash.

Still, precious lessons, dear little house fly,
You teach to me.
Hated or loved, you tell me that I
Happy may be.
Why should I care, when I tickle a nose,
Whether its owner's conduct shows
That he likes it or hates it, just so it goes
Pleasant to me.

* This should read "gnashing their teeth," but a little poetic license was necessary to bring it in the rhyme.

And yet it's not all honey.

French Ghost Story.

A young man who had lost his betrothed on the eve of marriage believed he saw her spirit every night in her bridal dress. His friends, to prove to him the folly of his belief, dressed a twin sister of the deceased in a dress precisely similar and placed her at the widowed bridegroom's bed exactly at the hour the spirit came. He looked up, and, crying out, "Ah, ciel! en voila deux!" (Heavens! there are two!) fell back dead on his pillow.—Paris paper.

SABBATH READING.

[illegible]

One day, my conscience smiting me,
I said, "O Lord, I'll follow thee."

But hearts are changeful, and God knows
How oft our love the feebler grows
Through years with blessings filled;
And so one day, it must be told,
I found my heart grown strangely cold,
With gratitude unthrilled.

One midnight, while the household slept,
A shadow o'er the threshold crept,
And settled in the gloom
Above the couch where dainty form
Of baby May, our latest born,
Lay sleeping in the room.

And on my heart a terror lay—
Was it a dream, or would the day
Make true what I would doubt?
The morn that brought the sunshine in Cheered not the room where death had been
And taken sunshine out.

With aching heart and weary tread
I turned from ways which late have led
My feet in paths of pain;
Nor count such grief too hard to bear,
If born of it shall be this prayer
That makes me Christ's again.

To-night I cry, "Christ helping me,
Dear Lord, for aye I'll follow thee."

God Is All and In All.

How grand, incomprehensible, and vast are thy creations, O God! The panorama of the heavenly host of wonders that pass before me as I look toward the blue depths that surround the earth, how sublime! I behold from my window the silent night, and dazzling planets in succession, in a magnificent course, pass from east to west, and disappear below the horizon. Innumerable stars in clusters, and in well-defined constellations, seem to accompany them, and often the ever-changing moon lends variety and beauty to the passing lights. Then, as the grandeur of night passes away, the eastern sky becomes illuminated by the great and life-inspiring sun, that boldly mounts the heavens like a chariot of fire drawn by irresistible steeds. Higher and still higher he ascends, until he gains the zenith of the blue vault of heaven; then, descending toward the western skies, he sinks below the horizon, and the curtain drops upon the stage—the earth—where we have acted each his part in the single scene of a day.

In winter we look toward the south for the principal changes of these wonders, and in summer toward the north. In the winter, when earth is robed in snow, like a cold, lifeless friend clothed in pure white for burial, the stars shine with greater luster, and we look up with never-wearied admiration at the Pleiades, and upon other familiar groups and constellations that we know were watched by the eyes of Christ centuries ago, by Abraham centuries before Christ was born upon this earth, and by Noah long before Abraham, and before Noah by Adam, the first created man. To give greater variety to this changing scenery, a comet flashes across the view with its train of splendor, or a meteor falls like a doomed spirit from the heights of heaven. And so onward journeys the earth, carrying its precious freight through infinite space, obedient to the will of the Eternal Father. All this grandeur leads us to think of the Father, and, in seeking Him, we find Christ, who points us to the Father, and teaches us of his greatness, His goodness, and His mercy. Our minds ascend towards God through the Spirit and on the thoughts of Christ, that lead to him as the sun's rays lead to the sun, for Christ came from God, as the sun's rays come from the sun. His sayings, teachings, promises, become to us a river of living water, upon which we are carried towards the bosom of the Father, into an eternity of spiritual life and blessedness. The stars, the sun, the planets, the earth, the moon, the comets, the meteors, the winds, the waters, the lightnings, and the thunders of the natural world, and Christ and the angelic host of heaven, of the spiritual kingdom, and the host of mankind who are redeemed, all commingle in one vast and harmonious creation, of which God is the central figure, the life and the light.—B. A. Ulrich, in the Standard.

Impossible Things.

To escape trouble by running away from duty is one of the impossible things. Jonah once made the experiment, but it did not succeed. Therefore, manfully overcome the difficulties and trials to which the post assigned you by God's providence exposes you.

Another impossible thing is to become a Christian of strength and maturity without undergoing severe trials. What fire is to cold, such is affliction to the believer. It burns up the dross, and makes the gold shine forth with unalloyed luster.

Still another impossible thing is to form an independent character, except when thrown upon one's own resources. The oak in the middle of the forest, if surrounded on every side by trees that shade it, runs up tall and comparatively feeble; cut away its protectors, and the first blast will overturn it. But the same tree, growing in the open field, where it is continually beaten upon by the tempest, becomes its own protector. So the man who is compelled to rely on his own resources forms an independence of character to which he could not otherwise have attained.

"Soda."

The soda-water days have come, the sweetest of the year; when all go in for soda straight, instead of lager beer. Soda water is simply carbonic-acid gas soaked in water. The carbonic-acid gas is obtained by pouring sulphuric acid over marble chips or dust. The gas is passed through water several times to free it from all trace of the sulphuric acid and is then pumped into a strong steel receptacle, in which is pure water. The soda fountain is generally an elaborate marble affair, costing from $50 to $5,000. Generally a soda fountain in a drug store will pay the rent of the store at least, and sometimes much more. Fountains have from one draught tube and five sirups to six tubes and twenty-two sirups. At some places they have pure fruit sirups, and at others—they say they have. The first patent for soda water was taken out in England in 1807, yet the soda fountain in all its glory is only to be seen in America. In this country there is at least $12,000,000 invested in soda-water manufactories, fountains, etc., and yet you can get a drink for 5 cents. The tariff used to be 10 cents, and then a young man with a party of ladies dreaded the sight of a fountain or the sound of its sizzle, but hard times had the same effect on soda as on everything else. If the price were further lowered to 3 cents there is little doubt but a great increase of consumption and profit would result.—Detroit Free Press.

THE HOME DOCTOR.

A New York physician says that any person who has not been in the water more than two hours may be restored to life by thoroughly warming him. Wrap the body in a blanket or quilt and pour hot water on it, and continue to do so until the subject revives.

Magnesia, which has heretofore been considered a reliable antidote for arsenic poisoning, has been found to be so only when the arsenic is yet in the shape of arsenious acid in the system. It is, therefore, of value only when administered very soon after the swallowing of the poison.

Dr. Warren states: "A simple, easy and effectual cure of stammering" is simply, at every syllable pronounced, to tap at the same time with the finger; by so doing, the most inveterate stammerer will be surprised to find that he can pronounce quite fluently, and, by long and constant practice, he will pronounce perfectly well.

Dr. Jacquier, of Nantes, recommends the employment of oxide of zinc in diarrhea. The formula which he has employed is the following: Oxide of zinc, 54 grains; bicarbonate of soda, 7½ grains; in four packets, one to be taken every six hours. In all the cases which he observed, oxide of zinc produced rapid cure of diarrhea. In fourteen cases observed by Puygantier the cure was even more rapid, since in only one case were three doses of the medicine required. The results are considered to have been more satisfactory inasmuch as in several cases the malady had endured from one to many months, and other methods of treatment had not produced any improvement. Thus he concludes that, although by no means to be held as exclusive treatment, the employment of oxide of zinc deserves to be more generally known as useful in diarrhea.

Cold Rooms and Damp Beds.—As injurious as are hot sleeping-rooms, cold rooms and damp beds are more so. By sleeping therein many persons lay the foundation for fatal constitutional disease. Beds in cold bedrooms are almost certain to be damp. If dry one day they are damp the next. Many a wretched night have we spent in a cold, damp bed, utterly unable to get either rest or sleep, and anxiously longing for the slow-coming morn to deliver us from what seemed, without much figure in the meaning, to be the very jaws of death. The experience of the writer quite a number of years ago, when we taught a district school, and boarded around, sleeping in the "spare bed," will be remembered to our latest day as a period of time in which we suffered more and received more lasting injury than during any other period of our life. Beware of spare beds and cold bedrooms. A person had a great deal better sit up by the kitchen fire and dose in his chair than to commit himself to the horrible embrace of cold, clammy sheets, and run the risk of sowing the seeds of an incurable consumption.

Treatment of Cuts.—In ordinary cuts, cleanliness and care are generally more requisite than skill. If the cut be extensive, or an artery, vein, or any other important part be injured, it becomes a more urgent matter. Accidental cuts from knives, cutting-tools, scythes, etc., are more likely to occur on the face and limbs than on the body. All that is requisite, in general, is to bring the parts together as accurately as possible, and to bind them up; this is usually done by adhesive plaster, when the cut ceases to bleed. Nothing is so good for this purpose as paper previously washed over on one side with thick gum-water, and then dried; when used, it is only to be slightly wetted with the tongue. When the cut bleeds but little, it is well to soak the part in warm water for a few minutes, or to keep a wet cloth on it. This removes inflammation and pain, and also a tendency to faintness which a cut gives some persons. If the bleeding be too copious, dab the part with a rag wetted with creosote. If the wound be large, it should be sewed up. If the blood that issues be very scarlet, it may be concluded that an artery has been touched, and then, whenever the bleeding cannot be stopped, medical aid must be procured; the best method to pursue is to bind up the wound tightly, or to hold a finger strongly against the part that bleeds.

Obeying Orders.

He was weeping softly as he came out to join his companions; a peculiar twitching of his muscles and the careful manner of his gait was painfully apparent to the boys; they knew that he had just wrestled with one of his parents; they had been there and understood the whole business.

"Been gittin' a lickin', Ben?" asked several, sympathetically.

"Yes," murmured he; "I got licked fur obeyin' orders."

"Disobeyin', you mean," cried they.

"No, fur obeyin', I tell ye," persisted he; then, seeing their looks of incredulity, he made this explanation: "When I were comin' into the house my boots were muddy as blazes, and mother had just been scrubbin' the floor; says she, 'Now, Ben, you'd better walk right over that clean floor with your muddy boots.' 'Anything to oblige you,' says I. So I boldly walked across the room, and she lit on me with a bound like a cat on a mouse, and the way she toted me around that room was a caution. I won't obey orders any more."

"Gentlemen of the jury," said Mr Phelps to the twelve men of Worthington, Minn., who had convicted his daughter of selling cider without a license, "all I've got to say is, you're a set of jackasses, and you may wave your ears over that solemn truth." Mr. Phelps was fined $10 for contempt of court.

FARM NOTES.

Hints for the Work of the Month.

[From the American Agriculturist.]

A horse fork should be in every barn. In the hurry of haying, the cost of a horse hay fork may easily be saved in one week, by rapid unloading.

Roots.—Early blood beets, and sugar beets may be sown early this month. Mangels will now require clean culture, and vigorous thinning. Rutabagas may be sown from the 1st to the 25th of this month upon land that has not been prepared in time for earlier crops.

Frequent cultivation is essential to successful corn growing. The cultivator should be kept going this month through the corn and the root crops, about once a week. It matters not that there are no weeds in sight, it is not alone to kill weeds that we cultivate and hoe, but to loosen the soil, and by that means to stimulate the growth.

Summer Fertilizing.—The experience of the past few years has often shown it to be useful to give a light dressing of fertilizer to the corn, just before the last cultivation. This helps the earing, and renders many ears productive that would otherwise be abortive. The fertilizer should be worked in with the cultivator. A mixture of poultry manure, ashes, and plaster will be useful; or the prepared artificial corn fertilizer may be used in place of this.

Fodder Crops.—The rye ground cleared by this time may be immediately prepared and planted with fodder corn or oats, the latter to be followed with late turnips as the oats are cut for feeding; or Hungarian grass may follow the rye, and be cut off in time for sowing rye again next fall. A good plot of cabbages will be found useful for fall and early winter feeding of cows, and, if plants have been provided for, they may be set out on the rye ground, or some other piece of rich, moist soil.

Orchard Grass.—In a late season like the present, early grass for pasture or for cutting is unusually valuable. The great difference between grasses in earliness is strikingly seen when one has a field of orchard grass adjoining one of timothy. Orchard grass is too much neglected, and those who have never grown it may try it with great advantage. That it is the earliest to start in the spring, comes into blossom with red clover, and both are ready for cutting in the best condition at the same time, are by no means all its valuable points.

Curing hay in the cock is preferable to sun drying. The sweating and fermentation improve, and prevent heating in the mow or stack. The writer prefers to put up hay, after the dew is off, in moderately large cocks—four feet wide and high—after it has lain spread in the sun for one full day. It may thus stay safely for a week, if necessary, and a hay cap will protect it from a twenty-four hours' rain. The day it is drawn in, a man should start early and throw open the cocks, to get a final airing for two or three hours before it is taken up.

Corn.—Late plantings of corn may be made up to the middle of the month. Some early sorts, and some new varieties which claim to be extra early, may be tried as an experiment. It will pay very well to make late plantings up to July for fodder, planting in drills three feet apart, with about twelve grains to the foot in the drill. The largest kinds of sweet corn are the best for fodder. Triumph, Marblehead Mammoth, and Stowell's Evergreen are suitable for this purpose. The common opinion, that sweet corn is better for fodder than field corn, is well founded; but there is some difficulty in curing the stalks, which is easily surmounted, however, and which will be noted in season.

Mowing machines are now indispensable. The scythe may be used for cutting about fence corners when the wasteful zigzag rail fence is used; but so far as other uses go it may be hung up out of the way. In choosing a mower, the chief points to consider are, lightness of draught, strength and simplicity of construction. With these, one has economy in use, durability, convenience of handling, and ease in keeping in order—points of the utmost importance. There is one other point worth noting, which is safety in case of a runaway, or when mowing a rough field, and there is danger that the driver may be thrown upon the cutting bar. The cutting bar should always be well in advance of the driver, but never directly ahead of him.

Hay.—Recent investigations threaten to upset some popular notions. It has long been supposed that early-cut hay is more valuable than that cut later. If the judgment of the cows were a test, there would be no question about it. They will leave the riper hay, and even refuse to eat it at all, if they can procure that which has been cut earlier. In the writer's dairy, the milk falls off more than 10 per cent. when the young hay is changed for that cut two weeks later. This is sufficient to support the general opinion in spite of chemical analyses, which go to show that ripe hay is heavier, more bulky, and contains more nutritious substance, than that cut earlier. Perhaps the operations of the chemist can extract more nutriment from ripe hay than can the cow's stomach; but, as young hay feeds more profitably, it seems best to cut early.

The Epicurean Reform.

The 200 horse-flesh shops of Paris are subject to rules of inspection and cleanly order, regularly. "Ah, sir, these shops are easy, but it is those charcuteries (pork-butchers) that puzzle our men," says the Inspector to me. "The best of us, sir, skilled in chemistry and all the alimentary laws, cannot help being taken in on sausages, galantine, fromage d'Italie and the numerous other little dishes our people are so fond of. Pepper, spices and garlic are like charity, sir, in these affairs, and cover a multitude of sins. These disguises are dreadful barriers to us." I feel like telling him Sam Weller's remark about the "weal pie being all werry well when you know the gal wot makes it," but he gives me a list of his experiences in setting detectives to watch for midnight deliveries of bags of dead cats, dogs and rats, destined for the terrible scalding vats and fearful mixing machines which make chopped cat look like minced veal and smashed dog like a chicken pie, in a trice. Experience teaches, says our Latin copy-book. So does hunger. The siege of Paris has elevated the science of cooked cats, dished dog and rat ragout. Few inspectors of food now-a-days would turn up or turn in their noses on a tabby-tart, a doggy-dumpling, or even a rat-pie! I have a lively recollection of mule meat being a tough morsel to swallow the first time I banqueted on it at Vicksburg, when Gen. Pemberton could not go out for better food and Gen. Grant would not come in with worse. But at the second and third orgie I took to the venerable and toughened mule meat as if it were venison without cranberry sauce! I have done worse since in Italy and paid more. A gallant Captain, about the same time as the siege of Vicksburg, and the chief officer commanding the fleet in Mobile bay, did his roast rat every morning and enjoyed it.—Paris letter.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

Use kerosene to clean unvarnished furniture.

Try benzine for removing paint spatters on window glass.

If cheese gets too dry to eat, grate it, pour on brandy, and pack into jars.

Blankets, and, indeed, flannel of any kind, should not be washed with soap which has resin in it.

Cements for joining metals or glass and wood are, made as follows: Melt resin, and stir in calcined plaster until reduced to a paste, to which add boiled oil a sufficient quantity to bring it to the consistency of honey; apply warm. Or, melt resin, 180 parts, and stir in burnt umber thirty parts, calcined plaster fifteen and boiled oil eight parts. Or, dissolve glue in boiling water to the consistence of cabinet-maker's glue; then stir in sufficient wood ashes to produce a varnish-like mixture. While hot the surfaces to be united must be covered with this compound and pressed together.

Breakfast Hash.—Chop into hash some cold meat (corned beef, beef, or mutton, or fowl); season with salt and a little pepper, also a little butter if liked; boil enough potatoes to make, when mashed, twice the quantity of the hash; mash the potatoes to a cream, adding before the mashing a table-spoonful of butter and a teaspoonful of salt; fill an earthen baking dish with the potatoes, rounding it; handsomely in the center of the potatoes make a deep hole large enough to contain the hash; round it all nicely and bake a light brown; garnish with celery tops.

Pouch for Clothes Pins.—One of the latest conveniences which I have noticed for housekeepers is the apron for clothes pins. It is a trivial affair, but, nevertheless, quite useful. It takes nearly one yard of calico to make it, the apron or pouch being fifteen inches in length and nearly as wide. Round the corners at the bottom. At the top, on each side of the front, two inches from the middle, cut out a strip nine inches long and one and one-half inch wide for pockets. Bind them with lighter-colored fabric than the apron, that they may be readily seen. Gather into a band and button at the back, or, if preferred, put on strings and tie.

Washing with Hard Water.—To those who have to use hard water for washing this method may be recommended: Procure a large barrel, set it close to the well, and let some one who is able, if you are not, fill it with water; then put in two panfuls of wood ashes, skim off the coals, let it stand two days at least; wash your white clothes as for boiling, soap them and lay them in a clean tub; have sufficient broken water boiling hot to cover them, pour it on them, and cover immediately with one or two thick woolen blankets, and let them stand until the next morning; then wring them out, and you have a splendid suds with which to wash your colored clothes. Suds and rinse your clothes, also, with the broken water, and your clothes will look as nice and white as if you had used rain-water. This a good way for women who are not strong, as they are not so liable to overwork as if they did it all in one day.

Doing Up Lace Curtains.—Put the curtains to soak in lukewarm water, turning over and clapping between your hands two or three times during the twenty-four hours that they remain in the water. Then if you have a wringer, fold smoothly and put through loosely; repeat for two or three days if very much soiled and smoked. The last time they are put to soak, add to every gallon of water two ounces of pulverized borax, after which put them on to boil in this water. When scalded a short time rinse thoroughly, and make a thin starch, with a trifle of blueing in. Now pin or sew to your carpets some sheets, which done, wring out the curtains, and pin right side down upon the sheets, putting the pins in every two inches. Stretch them evenly, but take care not to draw out of shape. Let them be until dry, when go over with a hot flat-iron, keeping a thin cloth or paper between the iron and curtain; then remove the pins, and your curtains are ready to hang.

The King of the Blacks.

The Zulus are the Celestials of South Africa, the word "Zulu" signifying heaven. Their reputation as a warlike race dates from Chaka, who became early inflamed with the ambition of rivaling Napoleon Bonaparte. While quite a youth he fell in with some English sailors who had been cast ashore in St. Lucia bay, and from them he heard of the victorious career of the great Corsican. He vowed that he would be a conqueror, and at once set to work to fulfill his vow. When, in 1825, he heard for the first time of the overthrow of the French empire at Waterloo, he complacently remarked: "Yes, I see now; there are only two great chiefs in all the earth. My brother, King George, he is King of all the whites, and I, Chaka, I am King of all the blacks."—London Examiner.

OBITUARY.

Gen. James Shields.

Gen. James Shields, whose death occurred recently at Ottumwa, Iowa, was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, in 1810, and emigrated to America about 1826. He pursued his mathematical and classical studies until the year 1832, when he settled in Illinois and began the practice of law at Kaskaskia. In 1836 he was elected a member of the Illinois Legislature, and Auditor of the State in 1839. In 1843 he was appointed Judge of the Illinois Supreme Court, and in 1845 Commissioner of the General Land Office. At the commencement of the Mexican war he was appointed by President Polk a Brigadier General in the United States army, and for his distinguished services during the course of the war was promoted to the rank of brevet Major General. In 1848 he was appointed Governor of Oregon Territory, which office he resigned. In 1849 he was elected to a seat in the United States Senate from Illinois for the term of six years. He subsequently took up his residence in the Territory of Minnesota, and in 1857 was elected to represent the same in the Senate of the United States, when she became a State, in which position he served two years. During the war of the Southern Rebellion he also served as a General in the Union army. He afterward settled in Missouri, and succeeded Senator Bogy in the United States Senate from that State, in the Forty-fifth Congress, his term expiring on the 4th of March last.

Baron Rothschild.

Baron Lionel Nathan de Rothschild, who died a few days ago in London, was the eldest son of the late Baron Nathan Mere de Rothschild, a brother of Sir Anthony de Rothschild, and partner in the well-known banking firm of Messrs. Rothschild & Co. He was born Nov. 22, 1808, and succeeded to the title on the death of his father, June 28, 1836. He was elected to Parliament, in the Liberal interest, for the city of London, in August, 1847, and, though again returned in June, 1849, in July, 1852, and in March, 1857, was not permitted to take his seat until 1858, when the act excluding Jews from the House of Commons was repealed, and a resolution adopted admitting of himself and his co-religionists. He lost his seat as one of the representatives of the city of London at the general election in February, 1874. Baron de Rothschild was interested in the English turf for a great many years, his horses being entered, however, under an assumed name. His horse, Sir Bevys, was the winner of the last Derby. Baron de Rothschild was a grandson of the Meyer Anslem Rothschild, who founded the celebrated family of that name, and whose five sons established banking houses in Frankfort, Vienna, London, Naples and Paris, all of which, except that of Naples, are still existing. The third son, Nathan, the father of the deceased, and the leader of the house, introduced the business of negotiating foreign loans in England. They have negotiated most of the loans of the great powers of Europe for a great many years.

A. T. Stewart's Great Philanthropy.

The fact has just been discovered that the late A. T. Stewart left provision for the development of a great philanthropic enterprise in the shape of a university so munificently endowed that it will furnish the highest education at an extremely low price. It was as a preliminary step to this enterprise that Mr. Stewart purchased the Garden City estate, on Long island, itself about as large as Manhattan island, and all the extensive improvements are designed only to be the surroundings of a great collegiate system. The magnificent cathedral, in whose crypt the merchant's bones were expected to rest, is, of course, to be the architectural monument of Garden City, and around it will be grouped the episcopal residence, a male college, female college, and divinity school. The two main college buildings will be on a vast scale, each with a frontage of 275 feet, and containing 300 private and single bedrooms for students, which, together with the dormitories, will accommodate 500 students within each building. The endowment is so generous that Judge Hilton, who is working out Mr. Stewart's ideas, has decided that the entire expenses of a student, male or female, for board, washing, attendance and tuition, shall not exceed $300 per collegiate year of forty weeks, while, besides this, there will be offered every year as many free scholarships as possible. The institutions, although endowed by the estate of an Episcopalian family, will be non-sectarian in character, and the intention is to make the instruction they furnish of the highest character. The first brick in the male college is laid, and the contract requires the building to be under roof by next January and finished and ready for occupancy the following September, the other buildings to be completed a year later. The development of this great scheme will be watched with interest.—Philadelphia Times.

Burning a Man Alive.

A Druze farmer in Bashan borrowed 600 piastres ($24) of a retainer of Sheikh Shibly. At the end of the year he was unable to pay. The creditor said, "Give me your daughter for the debt, and I will pay you her dowry, deducting the amount of the debt." The farmer consented, and demanded $120 as the dowry. The creditor offered as payment an order on the sheikh. The farmer refused to accept it. The creditor was angry, and day after day insulted the farmer, entering his house and even insulting the harem; this so incensed the farmer that he shot the creditor. The sheikhs then assembled and condemned the farmer to death. "By what death?" asked the sheikh. They all cried, "Burn him, burn him." "Let him be burned then," said the sheikh. They began to gather wood, when one said: "Why gather wood? Let us use the American oil." They then clothed him with a sheepskin cloak, with the wool outside, and poured kerosene oil upon him and set it on fire. He leaped and screamed, and begged for mercy, crying, "Woe is me! Do you not fear God?" When he drew near death, the Sheikh Shibly said, "Stone him with stones." They then stoned him with stones until a great pile of stones was heaped over him. This was done in the presence of the whole multitude of people.—Translated from a Syrian Journal.

Fishing.

I landed my first pickerel the first evening we were on Lake Minnetonka. I am not a skillful fisherman. I told the boys that I could do a little plain fishing, but didn't want to be set down for anything with any kind of fluting, embroidery, knife-plaiting, or anything of that kind about it. I fished from the shore, by the side of a veteran fisher, Mr. A. K. Dunlap, of Titusville. He knows every fish in the lake by name. He can tell by the movement of the line what kind of a fish is at your hook. Something ran away with my line

"It's a pickerel," shouted Mr. Dunlap, in intense excitement. "A big fellow. Take out your lines," he yelled to the rest of them. "Give him plenty of room! Play him," he shrieked at me. "Let him run! Keep your line taut! Don't give him an inch of slack! Look out! Don't let him do that again! Let him run! Now, bring him in this—. Look out! Don't let him do that again."

By this time I was so excited I was on the point of throwing down the pole and rushing out in the lake, intending to run the fish down and kick it to death. I screamed to Mr. Dunlap:

"You take the pole and land him—I never can."

He refused. He turned and hurled his own pole, lance fashion, into the woods.

"Here!" he shouted, rushing down the bank about twenty feet below me, stooping down and spreading out his arms. "Here! Now! Bring him in here through the shoal water! I'll get him! Careful, now! Careful! Steady! Ah—"

And flip, flap, I had him on the shore. He was a beauty. A little sunfish about three and a half inches long.

It was a long time before we said anything. Mr. Dunlap climbed a big birch tree, in the top of which his pole had lodged, and we resumed our fishing. Presently Charley Armknecht coughed, and I said:

"How funny the frogs sound over in the marsh."

And then we laughed a long time at the frogs. A long, long time, and very heartily. They were very funny frogs.

But Mr. Dunlap fished on very silently, and by and by he said the fish wouldn't bite when there was so much noise. So we held our hush and the fish bit. But they didn't bite any of us very badly.

The fishing is excellent almost anywhere in the lake. That evening on the upper lake one of the boys caught nine large pickerel. When we came to count the fish, however, it appeared that we had caught one pickerel nine times. It was a very large fish, and they are going to have its skin dried whole for a spectacle. I caught more fish than any one else in the party, but they were all, with one exception, catfish, and I learned, to my amazement, that I had disgraced myself and the lake. Why isn't a fish a fish, I'd like to know?—Burdette.

Princely Farmers.

The largest wheat grower in California is Dr. H. J. Glenn, whose ranch in Colusa county embraces 60,000 acres, or about ninety-four square miles of good land, nearly all arable. He has this year 45,000 acres in wheat, which, it is estimated, will yield 900,000 bushels, worth, at 85 cents a bushel, $765,000. And yet, with failures of crops, which occur about two years out of five, and the heavy interest he is paying on loans, Dr. Glenn is, perhaps, not so well off as an independent farmer who owns only 100 acres and is out of debt. Nearly all the princely farmers of Illinois of ten years ago have come to bankruptcy, and it will be a wonder if Dr. Glenn escapes that fate. Under the new constitution, the great ranch owners will have their uncultivated lands assessed at the same value as the cultivated—a provision which will force them to break up their estates and sell them out in small farms.—St. Louis Republican.

Eaten by a Horse.

John Coward, a young man, son of the widow Coward, and a member of the mercantile firm of Worthington & Coward, went into the stable where there was an old family horse which had been known to be always as gentle as a dog; but suddenly the beast was seized with a fit of viciousness, by some means or other, and pitched upon young Coward. Before he could get away from the ferocious animal he was almost literally eaten up. The horse had bitten most all the muscle and flesh loose from both arms above the elbow, had also bitten him furiously on the sides, hips and other places. Dr. Coward, uncle of the young man, was summoned, and gave all the surgical assistance and relief possible; but the wounds were of a very dangerous and serious nature, and it was feared he could not survive.—Knoxville (Tenn.) Chronicle.

The French Flag.

Many changes have occurred in the colors of the French flag in the lapse of ages, and the approaching distribution of the new ones gives an interest to a record of the alterations. Under Clovis it was turquoise-blue; from the time of Charlemagne, blue with six red trefoils; Charles V., purple with gold ornaments; Louis XI., azure with golden lilies; Charles VIII., blue strewn with golden lilies, with a white cross; Francois I., half blue and white; Henry IV., plain white; Louis XV., blue, with a white cross bearing lilies; from 1792 to 1814, tricolor; Restoration, white; from 1830 to the present time, tricolor.

THE LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEER.

A Very Practical Talk With One on the I. B. & W., with no "Bigged Nonsense About Him."

But before I could get to this engineer I was speaking of, who had a passenger engine on the Indianapolis, Bloomington and Western, another had already engaged him in conversation. I am always willing to let anybody else make a fool of himself and ask the questions, just so I get the benefit of the answers, so I let him talk while I hung around and listened. This man wasn't like any engineer I had ever made friends with before. He was an awfully practical fellow. The passenger said:

"Yours is a very exciting life?"

"Is it?" said the engineer, with an air of interest.

"Well," said the passenger, quieted a little bit, "I meant isn't it?"

"Oh," was the reply, with a satisfied accent. Then after a pause, "Well, I don't know; do you see anything very exciting about this."

He was lazily stretched out on his cushion, dividing up his paper of fine cut, putting all but one "chew" of it into his vest pocket, and putting the one "chew" into his tobacco-pouch, so that he could show the fireman that this was all he had, when that useful official should ask for it.

The passenger fidgetted a little, but didn't seem to want to give it up. I didn't know how to feel glad enough that I hadn't gone into the catechism business with the quiet man.

"Well," said the passenger, after a little while, "are we pretty near ready to pull out?"

"Pull what out?" asked the engineer.

"Why, the train."

"Train isn't in any thing. Train's all right."

"Well," said the passenger, "I mean, are we nearly ready to go?"

"I am," quiety replied the engineer, "are you?"

"You have a splendid engine there," said the passenger.

"'Taint mine," replied the sphinx "it belongs to the company."

"How much can you get out of her?" asked the passenger.

The engineer looked surprised. "Can't get a cent out of it" he said; "can't get anything out of anybody except the paymaster."

"Well, but I mean," persisted the passenger, "what can she do, on a good road, easy grade, and you cracking on every pound of steam she can carry?"

"It can pull the train," he said, "what would you expect it to do?"

"Well, but how fast?"

"Schedule time," was the reply, "that's all we're allowed to make; must make our time between all stations That's imperative orders on the Indianapolis, Bloomington and Western."

"Well, but couldn't you pull her wide open and—"

"Pull who wide open?"

"Why her; your engine, and give her sand and—"

"Why should I give it sand?"

"To make her run faster."

"Sand does not increase the speed of an engine, steam is the only motive power."

"But you give her sand on a heavy grade, and—"

"Excuse me, I never give an engine sand. The sand is poured on the rail."

"Oh, well, you know what I mean. You give her steam, you know, and—"

"No," he said, "I do not; I merely move the throttle lever, thus opening the regulator valve, and the steam is introduced to the proper portions of the machinery in simple obedience to the laws of physics. I have no control over it beyond regulating the supply."

"Did you ever," said the despairing passenger, "come so near a collision that you had to throw her clear over and—"

"No," the man said very gravely and I never expect to. It couldn't be done. No one man could throw this engine clear over. It weighs thirty-five tons.

"I suppose," the passenger obstinately replied, that when you start out with a heavy train you have to hold her awfully close to the rails?"

"I have nothing to do with that," he said, "the laws of gravitation and friction control all that. I presume my weight on the engine adds somewhat to its pressure on the rail, although of course that adds very little in comparison with the weight of the engine." The passenger wiped the beaded perspiration from his brow.

"Well," said he, how do you like life on the foot-board, anyhow?

"I don't live on the foot-board," said the engineer, "I live at home."

"Well, how do you like running on the road, then?"

"I dont run; I ride."

The conductor came along just here and handed the man in the cab a bit of yellow paper and then shouted "All aboard." The passenger, with a grateful expression of countenance, said, "Thank heaven!" as he went back and climbed on the rear platfrom of the last car, as far away from the engine as he could get, and I heard the engineer, as I turned away, growling about people who always wanted to talk shop." It was a terrible narrow escape for me, but I made it, and I rather enjoyed it. Providence always does take care of the truly good.

Lucky and Unlucky Days

In regard to birthdays the rhyme runs:

Born of a Monday,
Fair in Face;
Born of a Tuesday,
Full of god's grace;
Born of a Wednesday,
Merry and glad;
Born of a Thursday,
Sour and sad;
Born of a Friday,
Godly given;
Born of a Saturday,
Work for your living;
Born of a Sunday,
Never shall want—
So there's the week
And the end on't.

For wedding days the prospects are given as follows:

Monday for wealth,
Tuesday for health,
Wednesday the best day of all;
Thursday for crosses,
Friday for losses,
Saturday no luck at all.

Health Hints.

Biting the lips deprives them of color.

Eyebrows should be brushed or combed daily.

One great source of health in a house is the free use of water.

The fumes of tobacco are deleterious, if not actively poisonous to the eye.

Lime-water and sweet or linseed oil well beaten together is good for a burn.

The best protections against contagion are a courageous spirit and a full stomach.

Just as soon as warm weather begins the careful housekeeper will examine the condition of the cellar.

To avoid the ill effects of miasmi keep good fires in the house during the spring and autumn months.

To cultivate long eyelashes clip their extremities with scissors, and pass a light comb through them daily.

Sleeping with the cover drawn tightly over one's head is frequently the cause of headaches and nervous troubles.

A boil may sometimes be prevented by wetting a stick of caustic at one end and making a circle round the inflamed part.

A kitchen sink needs disinfectants. The simplest is the common sulphate of iron (copperas)—a pound to a pailful of water.

To dissipate impure air in wells throw in water, dashing it against the sides, or else quantities of loose burning straw or lime water.

In attemoting to purify a house it is of little use to attack the atmosphere. It is the source that must be sought and corrected.

A current of hot water should from time to time be sent, even in warm weather, through all the stationary wash basins in the house.

Swallowing a morsel of dry bread, or thrusting the finger well back into the throat will remove any fish-bone or sharp, hard substance.

A room in which a fever patient has been confined may be purified by burning sulphur therein—first removing all the furniture and closing the doors and windows.

To keep the great toe nails from growing in, cut out the center V shape, and keep the center of the nail scraped thin with a knife, thus throwing up the sides of the nail.

Connubial Devotion.

Riding on a railroad car:

Husband—You are quite comfortable dear?

Wife—Yes, love.

Husband—The cushions are easy and soft, ducky?

Wife—Yes, darling.

Husband—You don't feel any jolts, pet?

Wife—No, sweetest.

Husband—And there is no draught on my lamb, is there, angel?

Wife—No, my owuest own.

Husband—Then change seats with me?

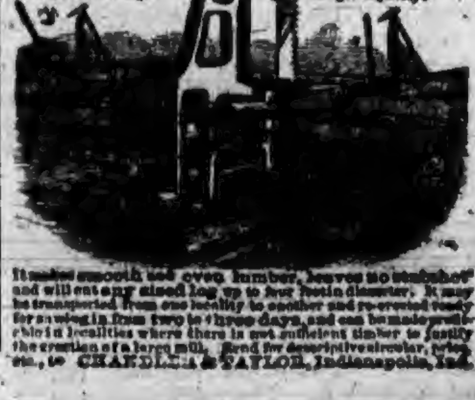
Portable Mulay Saw Mill,



With improvements recently made is unequaled as a neighborhood mill. It can be run by either steam or water power, and is especially adapted to the engines used for threshing.

It may be operated by either two or three men, and will cut as much lumber in proportion to the power and number of hands employed as mills of larger capacity.

It makes smooth and even lumber, leaves no stub shot and will cut any sized log up to four feet in diameter. It may be transported from one locality to another and re-erected ready for sawing in from two to three days, and can be made profitable in localities where there is not sufficient timber to justify the erection of a large mill. Send for descriptive circular, price, etc., to CHANDLER & TAYLOR, Indianapolis, Ind.

Old Settlers' Meeting.

The first annual meeting of the Pioneers association of DeKalb county, met in a grove on Ensley Avenue, between Auburn junction and Auburn, on Thursday, June 19th 1879, pursuant to the constitution. Present, all the officers of the association and executive committee, and also a large number of the citizens of DeKalb and adjoining counties, variously estimated at from 3,000 to 4,000.

The meeting was called to order by the president, Elder S. B. Ward, and after the reading by the secretary, of the programme of exercises of the day, as adopted by the executive committee, the meeting was opened with an address to the Throne of Grace by the Chaplain, Rev. John McCurdy, of Troy township. The orator of the day, Hon. John Morris, now of Ft. Wayne, but formerly a resident of this county, was introduced and addressed the meeting in an eloquent, entertaining and pleasant manner for an hour.

Peter Kiser, of Ft. Wayne, being present, was requested to address the meeting until 12 m., but he considering it an insult to him to be limited, refused to speak. Thereupon a recess until 1:30 was taken for refreshments. The recess taken was most agreeably occupied by nearly all in social greetings, pleasant renewal of old acquaintances, the formation of new ones, and in the partaking of the abundant supply of provisions which nearly every family present brought with them, while a large number retired to the village to partake of the hospitalities of the citizens of Auburn. After reassembling the Hon. Andrew Ellison, of LaGrange county very highly, pleasantly and agreeably entertained the meeting for half an hour. The report of the Secretary and Treasurer were then read and approved. The biographer then read the list of names of the old settlers who have died since the meeting held last September. The following are their names with their age at death, and when they settled in the state, herein to-wit:

Hannah Flint, born Sept 7, 1807, became a resident of DeKalb county March 1839, died Oct. 25 1878.

Lewis Tiffany, born 1806, became a resident of DeKalb county Feb. 17 1842, died Oct. 21 1878.

Charles H. Wanemaker, born June 14 1827, became a resident of DeKalb Co. Oct. 1844, died Jan. 1 1879.

Henry Brown, born 1811, became a resident of DeKalb county Sept. 1837, died March 18 1879.

Peter Simon, become a resident of DeKalb county March 1885, died Nov. 3 1878.

Jane Jones, born May 26 1839, became a resident of DeKalb county 1844, died Jan. 22 1879.

Hannah M. Hathaway, born 1802, became a resident of DeKalb county 1844, died Jan 25 1879.

Richard Parnell, born June 23, 1790, became a resident of DeKalb county Oct. 1842, died Aug. 28 1878.

John Parnell, born April 6 1826, became a resident of DeKalb county Oct. 1842, died Jan. 31 1879.

James Campbell, born Oct 3 1810, became a resident of DeKalb county 1842, died Feb. 28 1879.

Hannah Campbell, born Sept. 23 1814, became a resident of DeKalb county 1842, died Feb. 20 1879.

John F. Coburn, born July 26 1806, became a resident of DeKalb county March 1836, died April 8 1879.

Jesse Hadley, became a resident of DeKalb county 1837, died Feb. 1879.

Jane Barney, became a resident of DeKalb county 1840, died April 22 1879.

Arial Rude, born Jan. 7 1810, became a resident of DeKalb county 1836, died May 3 1879.

Short addresses were then listened to from Col. I. B. McDonald, of Whitley county; Maj. Sprott, of Auburn; Samuel Wasson, of Concord; and J. W. Jeffords, of Waterloo.

On motion the executive committee was requested to report names to fill the offices of the association for the coming year. Whereupon they reported the names of, and requested the re-election of the officers of the past year, as follows:

President,	S. B. Ward,
Vice-president	P. B. Nimmons,
Secretary	W. H. Dills,
Treasurer	Cyrus Bowman,
Biographer and Librarian	J. E. Rose, and the said officers elect the executive committee for the coming year, and thereupon (T. D. Gross, the chairman of the Ex. Com., acting as president for the time being) said report was adopted.

On motion it was unanimously resolved, that the thanks of this association and of the audience present, be tendered to the speakers, Morris, Ellison, McDonald and others, to the choirs of the churches of Auburn for vocal music, and to the Corunna band for instrumental music, and also to Mr. Karns for the use of one of his organs.

The benediction was then pronounced by the Rev. J. Rice, after which the meeting adjourned to meet on the 3rd Thursday of June, 1880, at such place as the executive committee may determine.

As a part of the proceedings of the day, there was called to the stand and introduced to the audience the following persons, Mrs. Margaret Cummins, (a daughter of the late John Houlton, the first settler of the county) the first white child born in the county, April 7th 1836, also Mrs. J. R. Moody (a daughter of the late Abraham Fair) the second white female child born in the county, April 17th 1836, also James Platter the first white male child born in the Co. Oct. '36. There was also presented to view the surveyor's compass and chain, used and owned by the late Hon. R. J. Dawson, in the original survey of the public lands in northeastern Indiana, which were recognized by Samuel Wasson, then a chainman, but who is now the oldest settler of this county. J. W. Jeffords in his remarks exhibited the axe used in chopping the timber for the first house erected in the county, which was John Houlton's, of Franklin township. The axe now weighing 6¼ pounds, but originally between 8 and 9 pounds. He also showed a field hoe which he made 42 years ago at Hamilton, Steuben county.

At 4 p. m. the audience was dismissed, with hopes of many such meetings in the future.

S. B. WARD, Pres't.
W. H. DILLS, Sec'y.

The Fray Continues.

EDITORS COURIER:—A few weeks ago there appeared in the Herald false statements, derogatory to the interest of our town, which I answered in the COURIER the week following. Last week another article appeared in which the author, who signs himself "Citizen," is not content in trying to injure the reputation of the town, but hurls his battery of falsity and slang at me in such a personal manner as to let the whole community know who he is firing his venom at. Now, as I have been assailed in a personal manner for defending the town and institutions in which I feel interested, I shall come out personally, openly and fearlessly to the issue. He tells us in last week's Herald, that the citizens of this town, or at least a majority, approve these statements, which I say is false; there is not a single man that has any principle in our town, who will give his name to indorse these statements, and when he says the statements set forth in the Herald of May 22, are true, I say he can be proven a liar; and if he disputes my word let him try it on. Then he says: "The COURIER man blows his bugle in the defence of the land company like a fawning, cringing cur, begging crumbs from his master's table, fearing the enforcement of the power of which he so graphically speaks," also that he "imagines he carries the brains of the whole B. & O. company in his vest pocket." I wish to inform Mr. "Citizen" and his constituents that I never ate one meal of idle bread; I earn my "crumbs" by the sweat of my brow; I am under no obligations to the land company on any contract; I do not owe them a dollar; I bought my property of them and paid the cash; I have what I own in my own name—not in my wife's name, Mr. "Citizen"—do you understand? I never offered the services of my brains to the railroad company; I render physical services, and with my earnings support my family and pay for my "crumbs;" I have no fear of being discharged to make room for a single man or boy, as long as I do what is right by the company. "Citizen" is dissatisfied because he cannot furnish the railroad and land companies with brains, but they have no use for him; when they employ brains they want a genuine article. When you came to Garrett Mr. "Citizen," your pocket-book and brains were not on an equilibrium; you carried your money in your vest-pocket, and according to your own estimation it would have required a B. & O. camel engine to have brought in your brains. You say your property is not worth 50 per cent. of the original investment. Have you paid 50 per cent. on the property which you imagine you own? You say you have paid your last dollar into the treasury of the land company. When you came to Garrett you ought to have been governed by the length of your purse. The railroad company had to send to Baltimore this month for hands to do their work here in Garrett, and they will give you employment whereby you will be enabled to pay the land company what you owe. You murmuring, dissatisfied hungry "cur," come out from under the table of industry, and do not be lying there growling because the land company does not throw out "crumbs" enough to feed you in your ignorant pride. If there are any "curs" in Garrett, begging for crumbs, it is yourself; I work and pay for what I get. The land company established the town of Garrett for industrious people, who are willing to work; they did not intend it as a home for "paupers;" the county has donated a large farm northeast of here for that purpose. But enough of that. Then he tells us: "We say blow." "Let the land company blow, let 'em kick, etc." After taking up about half a column with such slang, he then extends an invitation to the COURIER man to come again, and to come with some defense. Christ taught his disciples to not cast their pearls before swine. In my first communication to the COURIER, I defended the railroad company by offering to prove its enemy a liar through the testimony of O. C. Clark and B. D. Thomas, two of as reputable men as there is in DeKalb county, who are shipping grain from this market; and if is needed anything plainer than that, I do not know how to give it to him—I can offer no better defense. Why he has called on me to come again, and drew me out personally, when I have offered the evidence of such men, is more than I can understand. He can do the kicking and wrestling himself, that he speaks of, but he must swallow the lie. As long as I live I shall resent all insults, let them come from whatever source they may. There never was a man came to Garrett who made more pretentions and a larger swell than you did, and if you want a plain exposition of facts, I can give it to you. Are you satisfied? Do you wish me to come again? Have you anything more to say about the "literary cuss?" Whom do you think the "cur" is? I will let the public judge.

I remain, yours in truth,
JAS. R. SKILLING.

Spiritualism.

In an article on Mr. Kiddle's book in July Scribner, Dr. Holland writes:

For every man interested in the question of immortality, we have the profoundest sympathy. It is a question which has an intense, abiding interest for every thoughtful mind. At this time, particularly when the immorality of the soul is questioned more sharply than it has ever been before in the history of Christianity, the precious faith of the churches has to be fought for with all the weapons that can be laid hold of. From the fact that there is really no evidence of immortality except the resurrection of Christ himself, and his declarations, many minds have reached about them on every side for everything that offers help. In the desire to know something positively about the matter, modern spiritualism had its birth and has held its life. It promised to do just the thing that millions of minds desired to have done; so that when it assumed to demonstrate the existence of life after death, it had a tremendous audience in readiness for it. The marvel is that there was a man or woman living who was unwilling to hear what it and its promulgators had to say. That it has millions of believers and followers to-day, is, probably, due less to its real, inherent strength, than to the greedy want which it assumes to satisfy,—a want so greedy that it accepts as fact that which only has its lying semblance.

We are not among those who regard what are claimed to be the facts of spiritualism as improbable a priori. No man can read the bible carefully without being educated in a belief in spiritualism. In both the old and new Testament we have multiplied records of the communications of spiritual existences, with men and women in the flesh. The doctrine of demoniacal possession is taught with great distinctness. The ministry of angels, the return to the earth of those long dead, familiar intercourse with christ after his resurrection, all are in the line of phenomena claimed as genuine by modern spiritualists; so that it is not strange that Christian men and women should find themselves educated by the bible itself into a sort of readiness to receive spiritualism. It is, or would seem to be, easy for a Christian to believe that visitants from the unseen world are about him influencing his mind, and endeavoring to make themselves known. That is precisely what they used to do in the olden time. Why should they not do it now as well as they did it then?

* * *

Wade Hampton made a fair point on Mr. Blaine when he said in reply to the complaint that there were too many confederate brigadiers in the present congress, that he regretted there were not more Union soldiers in the two houses, because he had realized that the men who had fought each other in battle had very little difficulty in understanding each other when the war was over.

How a Scotch Detective Found His Man After a Two Years Search.

(Bedford (Ont.) Sra.)

For nearly two years past a young man wearing the garb of a Highland piper has been wandering about in the coal regions of Pennsylvania, playing his pipe in the streets, attending picnics and dances, and apparently depending on his instrument to make him a living. A few days since he was playing in a mining village on the outskirts of Scranton, Pa. A crowd had gathered around him, among them a mine laborer named Braidy. Suddenly the piper ceased the music, and, stepping from the crowd seized Braidy by the shoulder and announced that the laborer was his prisoner. At the same time he produced papers which he said was his authority for making the arrest. Braidy seemed entirely overwhelmed by the arrest, and made no opposition to the authorities when it was revealed that the piper was a detective. For two years he had been on the track of his prisoner, who is charged with having murdered a wealthy man named Findlay in Scotland, in January, 1877. Braidy was in the employ of Findlay. Early one morning the latter was found dead by the roadside, his skull crushed with a club. Braidy had been discharged the morning before for drunkenness. He had been heard to make a threat that he would get even with Findlay. He was nowhere to be found, but was traced to Glasgow, where it was believed he had taken a vessel for America. William Male, detective, was employed by the relatives of the murdered man to come to this country and search for Braidy, who it was thought would bring up in the Pennsylvania coal regions, where he had friends working. One of Braidy's peculiarities was his love for the bagpipe, so the detective, being a piper, adopted the disguise of a Scotch piper and played about the coal towns in the hope of some day attracting the attention of the man he was seeking, he being sure from information he had received that Braidy really was somewhere in the regions. The ruse succeeded after two years of patient trial. Male is now on his way to Scotland with the alleged murderer.

The Cure for Gossip.

What is the cure for gossip? Simply culture. There is a great deal of gossip that has no malignity in it. Good-natured people talk about their neighbors because, and only because, they have nothing else to talk about. As we write, there comes to us the picture of a family of young ladies. We have seen them at home; we have met them in gallaries of art; we have caught glimpses of them going from a bookstore or a library, with a fresh volume in their hands. When we meet them they are full of what they have seen and read. They are brimming with questions. One topic of conversation is dropped only to give place to another in which they are interested. We have left them after a delightful hour stimulated and refreshed, and during the whole hour not a neighbor's garment was soiled by so much as a touch. They had something to talk about. They knew something and wanted to know more. They could listen as well as they could talk. To speak freely of a neighbor's doings and belongings would have seemed an impertinence to them, and, of course, an impropriety. They had no temptation to gossip, because the doings of their neighbors formed a subject very much less interesting than those which grow out of their knowledge and culture. And this tells the whole story. The confirmed gossip is always either malicious or ignorant. The one variety needs a change of heart, and the other a change of pasture. Gossip is alwyas a personal confession either of malice or imbecility, and the young should not only shun it, but by the most thorough culture relieve themselves from all temptation to indulge in it. It is a low, frivolous, and too often a dirty business. There are country neighborhoods in which it rages like a pest. Churches are split in pieces by it. Neighbors are made enemies for life by it. In many persons it degenerates into a chronic disease, which is practically incurable.

Delaware Peaches.

Delaware, the land of peaches! the land where during two months of the year the air holds the fragrant aroma of this king of the fruits! Peaches, peaches everywhere—in baskets, in crates, in boxes, in wagons. At every station of the railroad that traverses the spine of the Delaware water-shed one sees those peculiar vehicles generically known as peach wagons, square, cumbersome, and roomy, unloading their lucious contents. At the more considerable stations all is noise, hubbub, and confusion. One by one the peach wagons come rumbling up to the waiting cars, each one striving to get in first, so as to unload and home again. At the cars is a very babel of voices calling for manifests, numbers, and what not, commingling with the squealing of mules, the shouting and swearing of teamsters, and the cracking of whips. Along the roads in all directions rumble the peach wagons, each in a little cloud of dust, like a miniature thunder-storm, each wending its way and converging to a center represented by the nearest railway station. The traveller on the railroad passes long trains of freight cars, hanging around and trailing after which is a lucious odor of most lucious fruit.

In New York the Delaware peach is rarely seen at its best; the fruit is picked while yet hard, and so shipped, ripening in the cellars of the commission merchants or on the stalls of the venders; but when they are allowed to ripen to full maturity in the broad and native sunlight of their southern home, when they swell with the last few hours of ripening, the blush side turning a delicate velvety crimson just mottled with a few dark spots, when they soften, not to flaccidity, on the trees, turning the last drops of sap to nectareous juice, then the Delaware peach is a thing hardly to be sufficiently admired, charming alike with its beauty, its odor, and its taste.—Howard Pyle, in Harper's Magazine for July.

A Trick of the Clairvoyants.

In drawing out the facts of personal or family history, clairvoyants do not always ask direct questions, but rather make statements with an implied interrogation, to which the victim, oftentimes entirely unconsciously, responds by word or look or gesture, or perhaps by all three; and, at a later stage of the interview, these secret facts are artfully given back to the victim, who has no recollection of having previously imparted them, and will not believe that he has done so, but prefers to believe that he is in the presence of Divinity.

It is not only possible but easy for a practical adept to draw out in this way minute and elaborate details of secret family history. A few years ago, while connected with one of the public institutions of this city, I made a number of experiments in this line. I told the patients afflicted with various forms of nervous and allied disorders, not to tell me about their symytoms, nor give me any facts in their cases, but to let me tell them; and then I would proceed to indicate, after the manner of a clairvoyant, the locality of their maladies, and the history of their troubles. In the majority of cases I was successful, and made out the diagnosis to the satisfaction of those who sought my advice, and with good reason, for nothing that I could do prevented them from telling me, although I asked them no questions; unintentionally and unconsciously, they would guide me at every stage of the interview. By a little practice any one could easily acquire this art; and long study, such as professional clairvoyants bestow upon this subject, develops great skill in thus managing and deluding the unwary and non-expert.—Scribner for July.

A Story for Moderate Drinkers.

An old friend of the late Judge Fletcher, of Boston, related to the writer, many years ago, the following characteristic anecdote: Mr. Fletcher, when a young man, boarded in the old Exchange Coffee House. Without much consideration he had fallen in with the drinking fashion of the day, so far as to have a glass of spirits and water brought to his room every night, to be taken on going to-bed as a "night-cap." One night an unusual press of company prevented the barkeeper from carrying up Mr. Fletcher's usual night-dram. The Squire didn't regard it as quite the thing for him to go to the bar and get his grog; and so he went to-bed without his 'night-cap.' But to sleep he could not. All night he tumbled about for lack of his accustomed drink. And as he did so, his active and discriminating mind worked most diligently. Next morning, on getting up, weary and worn by his hard, restless night, Mr. Fletcher went directly to the barkeeper: "Mr. ——, you didn't bring up my brandy and water last night, as a consequence, I have slept little or none all night."

The bar-tender was very sorry. This neglect should not occur again. "Not so," rejoined Mr. Fletcher. "Never bring me another drop of liquor, unless I order it. If it has come to this, that I can't sleep without the help of a tumbler of toddy, it is high time that I stopped drinking and broke up the dangerous habit."

From that day Mr. Fletcher became a thorough-going temperance man.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

THE suspension of Neil, McCallum & Co., wholesale dealers in leather and findings, New York, is announced. Liabilities about $140,000.... Two vessels with several cases of yellow fever on board have recently arrived at New York, and some uneasiness is felt thereabouts lest the contagion may spread.

FIRE destroyed the residence of Samuel Miller, near Montoursville, Pa., the other night, and Mr. and Mrs. Miller were fatally burned.... Jealousy caused James P. Dougherty, of Frankford, Pa., to fatally shoot his wife and himself.... Ella Duer, the Maryland young woman who shot her girl friend some time ago, through "jealousy," has been convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to a fine of $500.

THE WEST.

THE Galena Gazette announces, on what it claims to be trustworthy information, that "it is the purpose of Gen. Grant, upon his return to this country, to settle down in his old home at Galena and remain there quietly until the cold weather may induce him to take his family South."....William Carey, of Chicago, has been sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment in the penitentiary for the murder of his brother-in-law.

THE War Department has ordered Gen. Miles to fit out an expedition to go north of the Missouri river and drive back the hostile Indians from Sitting Bull's camp. This move will precipitate the international question as to the status of the hostiles....A crowd of 150 persons assembled at Boswell, Ind., to witness and participate in a shooting tournament. A thunder-storm coming up, they took shelter in a lumber-shed. The shed was struck by lightning, instantly killing two men and fatally injuring three others, while quite a number were more or less severely injured....Nine persons, seven of them belonging to one family, were recently drowned in Dakota Territory. The party were emigrating from Mills county, Iowa, and camped one night on the banks of Beaver creek. A cloud-burst caused a sudden rise and overflow of the stream, and before the unfortunate emigrants could escape they were overwhelmed and drowned by the rushing torrent.

SAUNDERS KELLY and William Adams, of Delavan, Minn., were killed by well-damp. Kelly descended the well, when he was overcome by damp. Adams followed to assist him and met the same fate.

JUDGE DRUMMOND, of the United States Circuit Court, at Chicago, has decided in a long-pending patent suit that the process of canning, preserving and packing meat was not patentable. In this view Judge Blodgett concurred. The question goes at once to the United States Supreme Court.

THE SOUTH.

A PARTY of ten convicts at work on the Cape Fear and Yadkin Valley railroad, in Chatham county, N. C., recently made a desperate break for liberty. They were fired upon by the guards, with deadly effect, four of them being shot stone dead and the others badly wounded.

ADVICES from Frankfort, Ky., indicate a probability that troops will be sent to Breathitt county immediately. The trial of the desperadoes will be held soon in that county. A number of their adherents have been sending letters to Gov. McCreary regarding the same, threatening to annihilate the troops if sent to protect the court. It is stated the Governor has concluded that there is necessity for the immediate presence of troops.... Three illicit stills were found in Georgia a few days ago, and a fight between the moonshiners and revenue officers ensued. One of the former was killed and several captured....The loss in a recent Mobile (Ala.) fire reached $125,000.

GENERAL.

RETURNS to the Department of Agriculture indicate an increase in the area planted with cotton of somewhat over 2 per cent. The average condition is 96. It was 90 last year. The average condition of winter wheat for June is 90, against 98 last year. The acreage of spring wheat sown is about 4 per cent. increase over that of last spring.

ADVICES from the Mexican frontier bring news that our sister republic is in the enjoyment of an old-fashioned revolution. Negrete, the General-in-Chief of the Army, has "pronounced" against Diaz, and the latter has taken the field to suppress the rebellion, leaving the Chief Justice, Vallarta, as administrator of the Government. It is also reported that Diaz has removed Trevino from his command upon the frontier.

THE proceedings and findings of the court-martial in the case of Col. D. S. Stanley and Col. W. B. Hazen, of which Gen. Hancock was President, have been made public. The court found Stanley guilty of conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, and sentenced him to be admonished in general orders by the General of the Army.

THE Allan Line steamship Sardinian has just made the fastest ocean passage on record. She sailed from Londonderry Friday, June 6, at 4:40 p. m., and passed the Belle Isle lighthouse Wednesday, June 11, at 7 p. m., five days and thirty minutes from land to land; she landed the mails at Rimouski Friday, June 13, at 1 p. m., arriving at Quebec at midnight the same day—seven days, seven hours and twenty minutes out from Derry.

POLITICAL.

THE New Hampshire Legislature has chosen Henry W. Blair (Republican) as the successor of Mr. Wadleigh in the United States Senate, for six years from the 4th of last March.

CALIFORNIA Republicans were in convention at San Francisco for three days last week, making up a ticket for State officers. The result of their labors was the nomination of George C. Perkins for Governor, John Mansfield for Lieutenant Governor, D. M. Burns for Secretary of State, D. M. Benfield for Comptroller. The platform adopted reaffirms the principles of the Republican party; denounces the attempt of the Democracy to interfere with the purity of elections; sustains the President's veto policy; pledges the party to a faithful application of the new constitution and support of progressive education; opposes Chinese immigration and land monopoly.

WASHINGTON.

THE House Elections Committee has decided that the Iowa members of Congress are to retain their seats. There will, however, be four separate reports from the committee. Springer holds that neither the October nor November election was valid, and that there was no election. Colerick declares that the November election was proper, and will write the report representing that branch of the Committee. Keifer believes that the October election was proper, and will submit a report, which the Republicans will sign. Phister thinks that the October election was proper, but arrives at this conclusion from different reasons.

THE death sentences of the Washington murderers—James Peyton and Louisa Wallace, both colored—have been commuted by the President from hanging to imprisonment in the Albany (N. Y.) penitentiary.

THE Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that he will redeem, at once, without rebate of interest, all the outstanding 5-20 bonds, consols of 1867 and consols of 1868, called, to mature July 3 and 4 next.

FOREIGN.

THE London Times attributes the sudden rise in the price of silver to a report from Odo Russell, the British Minister at Berlin, concerning the suspension of silver sales by the German Government. The Minister says that financial men in Germany believe the Government is preparing to adopt the double standard of coinage, as it exists in France.... An agreement concerning the contingent occupation of Roumelia by Turkish troops has been reached by the signatories of the treaty of Berlin. The Governor will only be allowed to call for the support of Turkish forces when a majority of the international commission—that is, a majority of the powers—have given their consent.

DE LESSEPS announces that a "first subscription of 2,000,000 francs, in shares of 5,000 francs each," has been made in Paris for his Panama canal project. "It will now be possible," he says, "to obtain concessions and commence the undertaking."....A committee of the British Parliament has resolved that the electric-light system is sufficiently developed to allow its being economically used for public, but not for domestic purposes.

THE death of John M. Langston (colored), United States Minister to Hayti, is announced. He died at Port au Prince, of yellow fever.

AN international boat-race between Hanlan, of Canada, and Elliott, of England, was contested on the river Tyne, in England, in the presence of 100,000 spectators, on the 16th of June. The Canadian had a walk-away, much to the disgust of the Britishers. The distance rowed was three miles, which was covered by the winner in twenty-one minutes and one second, thus beating the best previous time over a minute....News comes from South America that Gen. Goby has deposed the President of the republic of Paraguay, and seized upon the Government himself.

EIGHTEEN persons were killed in the recent riots in Calatabiano, in Sicily, and sixty wounded. Seventy arrests were made....There has been some eccentric weather in Europe lately, as well as in this country. Great floods are reported in Poland, destroying railroads and suspending traffic....Prof. Rosenkrantz, the celebrated German philosopher, is dead.

ROME dispatches report violent earthquakes in the vicinity of Aci, Italy. Several persons were killed, and the inhabitants of the district were fleeing en masse.

THE British steamer Thessaly, from Havre for Bombay, has been wrecked 100 miles from Aden. No lives were lost. The Thessaly was an iron vessel of 1,920 tons burden, and was built in 1877....Information is received through the cable dispatches of the death in South Africa, at the hands of a party of Zulus, of the French Prince Imperial, Eugene Louis Jean Joseph Napoleon Bonaparte, son of the late Emperor Napoleon III and the Empress Eugenie. The young Prince, it will be remembered, accompanied a column of British troops sent to reinforce Lord Chelmsford's beaten battalions in Zululand, and when he met his death was one of a party of officers who had set out on a reconnoitering tour, and who fell into an ambush of savages. It does not appear that any member of the party except the Prince Imperial was killed. He was stabbed in seventeen places by the assegai which the Zulus use as their chief weapon, and it was with great difficulty that his body was subsequently recovered....At a review in Madrid an ammunition wagon exploded, killing two soldiers and wounding a number of soldiers and spectators.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

THE Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill was passed by the Senate, on the 13th inst., with a number of amendments, which necessarily sends it back to the House.——The House passed the bill, prepared by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, allowing any telegraph company to land ocean cables on the coast of the United States, subject to the terms of such grants as have been heretofore made by Congress. The bill is designed to open the way for an increase of telegraph facilities between America and Europe.——There were two caucuses of the Republican Senators during the day. Both were devoted to an interchange of views concerning the proper course of action to be taken in regard to the pending appropriation bill, and at the latter an important agreement was reached. It was agreed with substantial unanimity that the passage of the Army Appropriation bill in its present terms should be opposed by the Republican party in the Senate, unless the majority consent to the addition of a proviso to the sixth section declaring that it shall not be construed to prevent the use of troops to execute any existing law. The Judicial Expenses bill was discussed very briefly, but, as it also contains clauses in the nature of conditions precedent to the use of the money which it appropriates, the caucus agreed with absolute unanimity that passage should be opposed, unless these conditions are eliminated.

In the Senate, on the 14th inst, the Army Appropriation bill was reported back from the Committee on Appropriations, with sundry amendments, and was placed on the calendar. The Supplemental Judicial bill was debated without action.——In the House, a bill extending until Oct. 1, 1880, the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1877, in regard to the grasshopper sufferers, was passed. The Legislative Appropriation bill was received from the Senate, and, together with the Senate amendments, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. A bill was passed authorizing a commission to inquire into the practicability and desirability of constructing a bridge or tunnel across the Detroit river, near Detroit. The bill prohibiting Government employes from making contributions for political purposes again came up, but the Democrats refused to allow an amendment including Congressional employes in this inhibition, and the Republicans consequently filibustered to prevent action on the bill.

The Senate, after debating and slightly amending the Supplemental Judicial Appropriation bill, finally passed it, on the 16th inst., by a strict party vote.——In the House, Mr. Cox introduced a bill to protect certificates of naturalization. Mr. Samford introduced one to prohibit an increase of the interest-bearing debt of the United States, and Mr. Young (Tenn.) introduced one granting a pension of $20 a month to the widow of the late Lieut. Hiram Benner. On motion of Mr. Ryan, a bill was passed for the relief of settlers on the Osage trust and diminished reserve lands in Kansas. On motion of Mr. Washburn, the bill was passed allowing pre-emption settlers twelve months after date of filing their entry to complete their residence.

The Senate was engaged in debating the Army Appropriation bill on the 17th, and the House spent the day in discussing the bill to prohibit political assessments. An effort was made in the House to take up the bill in relation to juries, but the Republicans blocked business by declining to vote, thus leaving the House without a quorum.

The Senate was the scene of a long and hot debate on the 18th, the Army bill constituting the bone of contention. The debate culminated in a personal altercation between Messrs. Conkling and Lamar, which for a time produced considerable of a sensation about the Capitol. Mr. Conkling delivered a bitter speech, in which, referring to the course of the Democrats in regard to the Appropriation bills, imputed to them bad faith. Mr. Lamar rose at the conclusion of Mr. Conkling's remarks and said that so far as any intimation of bad faith to him was concerned, he had lived in vain if he was not superior to such a charge from such a source. "It is not my purpose," he said, "to indulge in personalities, but I will say to the Senator that if he intended to intimate that anything I have done was not in good faith, I pronounce his statement a falsehood, which I repel with all the unmitigated contempt that I feel for the author of it." Mr. Conkling, who had been walking slowly back and forth behind the Senate, advanced to his seat and said: "Mr. President, I was diverted during the commencement of the remarks, the culmination of which I heard, from the member from Mississippi. If I understand the member right, he intended to impute, and did in plain and unparliamentary language impute, to me an intentional misstatement. [Pausing.] The Senator does not disclaim that?" Mr. Lamar—"I will state what I intended, sir, so there can be no mistake." The presiding officer (Cockrell) called Mr. Lamar to order, and Mr. Conkling proceeded: "Whether I am willing to respond to the member from Mississippi depends entirely upon what that member has to say, and what he did say, and for the time being I do not choose to hold any communication with him. I understood the Senator to state, in plain, unparliamentary language, that the statement of mine to which he refers was a falsehood. If I caught his words aright, I have only to say—this not being the place to measure with any man the capacity to violate decency, to violate the rules of the Senate, or to commit any of the improprieties of life—I have only to say that if the Senator, the member from Mississippi, did impute, or intended to impute, to me a falsehood, nothing except the fact that this is the Senate would prevent my denouncing him as a blackguard and a coward. [Applause and hisses.] Let me be more specific, Mr. President. Should the member from Mississippi, except in the presence of the Senate, charge me by intimation or otherwise, with falsehood, I would denounce him as a blackguard, as a coward and a liar. The rules and proprieties of the Senate are the only restraint upon me. I do not think I need say anything else, Mr. President." [Applause and hisses.] The Chair demanded quiet in the gallery. Mr. Lamar—"I have only to say that the Senator from New York understood me correctly. I did mean to say just precisely the words and all that they imported. I beg pardon of the Senate for unparliamentary language. It was very harsh; it was severe; it was such as no good man would deserve and no brave man would wear." [Renewed demonstrations of approval and disapproval.]——Another effort was made in the House to take up the bill prohibiting political assessments, but the Republicans renewed their filibustering, leaving the House without a quorum.——The Legislative Appropriation bill was passed in both houses.

The Senate remained in continuous session, without making any progress in legislation, till 11:30 in the forenoon of the 19th, when an adjournment was ordered, to allow the new legislative day to begin at 12. When the Senate was again called to order, a discussion arose on the question of dispensing with the reading of the journal, which, owing to the all-night session, the clerks had not been able to fully prepare. Several attempts at a vote were made, the Republican Senators declining to vote. Finally Mr. Carpenter suggested an agreement for adjournment, saying that if opportunity was given his side to discuss the bill before the Senate, he had no doubt a vote could be reached by 5 o'clock the following day. Mr. Withers, on the Democratic side, favored the proposal, and, on motion of Mr. Thurman, the Senate adjourned at 3 o'clock p. m.——In the House, Mr. McMahon submitted the conference report upon the Judicial Expenses bill. Section 2 prohibits the making of any contract or the incurring of any liability under the provisions of the Revised Statutes authorizing the appointment or payment of general or special Deputy Marshals for services in connection with elections on election day. After some discussion, the report was adopted—yeas, 102; nays, 79.

PERSONALS.

EX-QUEEN ISABELLA of Spain holds court in a quiet way in Paris.

THE exodus of fashionables from New York to Europe is great.

A PREACHER down in Georgia is the proud father of thirty-two children.

NAOMI, the giddy young thing, was but 580 years old when she married.

PROF. WISE and niece will make that balloon journey to the North pole together.

MARQUIS LORNE is writing a book about Canada, to be illustrated by his wife.

THEODORE TILTON has provided a regular allowance for the support of his wife.

THE "Mutual Friend," Frank Moulton, is visiting Europe on a business errand.

MRS. OLE BULL is translating Norwegian novels at her home, in Madison, Wis.

MRS. LAURA FAIR, the California murderess, has invented a baby carriage and sold the patent for $14,000.

BILLY EMERSON, the negro minstrel, registered himself at a Philadelphia hotel: "billy emerson, san francisco." But he gets a salary of $500 a week.

REV. ORION CLEMENS, brother of Mark Twain, and lately expelled from an Iowa church for heterodoxy, was formerly an editor. That accounts for it.

THE town of Albert Lea, Minn., was named after Col. Albert Lea, the first white man who traversed that part of the State, and who is still alive—though living in Texas—at the age of 80 years.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON lectured in Boston, a few days ago. He showed a giving away to old age, and his utterance was often indistinct. He read his lecture while seated, his daughter guiding and prompting him whenever he lost his place.

WM. LLOYD GARRISON'S son, Wm. Lloyd, is in the wool business in Boston. Another, Wendell P., is connected with the New York Nation. A third son, Frank, is with the publishing house of Houghton, Osgood & Co., New York. His daughter married Henry Willard, Esq., a railroad manager, of New York.

THE following United States Senators received only an academic education, never having attended college: Morgan, of Alabama; Walker, of Arkansas; Eaton, of Connecticut; Bayard, of Delaware; McDonald, of Indiana; Kellogg, of Louisiana; Hamlin, of Maine; Chandler, of Michigan; Ferry, of Michigan; Windom, of Minnesota; Saunders, of Nebraska; Rollins, of New Hampshire; McPherson, of New Jersey; Conkling, of New York; Thurman, of Ohio; Pendleton, of Ohio; Wallace, of Pennsylvania; Butler, of South Carolina; Bailey, of Tennessee; Harris, of Tennessee; Edmunds and Morrill, of Vermont; Cameron, of Wisconsin—24. Senators Jones, of Florida, and Bruce, of Mississippi, are self-educated men.

A Brass Brick Sold for Gold.

An uncommonly smooth trick was played upon Lawyer Callahan, of Fayette county, Mo. He was victimized by the "bullion game," a dodge long known but one that has not been successfully applied for many years. T. G. Clark, a trusted employe of the Co-operative Claim Association of St. Louis, approached Callahan with the whispered statement that he knew a party who knew another party that had a bullion brick worth $6,000. Callahan nibbled at the bait. Clark introduced the man from whom he had obtained the secret. Callahan actually tugged at the line. Ellison, the second person in the approach, introduced the lawyer to Capt. Algero, the owner of the brick, who said bluntly that the treasure was gotten during the recent train robberies. Callahan bit outright. He drew $1,500 in gold from his bank and passed it to Algero, receiving the coveted bullion. He did remember that "all is not gold that glitters," but as a similar if not the same brick was analyzed in his presence, there was no thought of swindle. But Callahan soon learned that his brick was brass from the center out. It was an excellent imitation of a valuable ingot, however. Callahan felt sick at the stomach. He thought he would sneak off and say nothing about the affair, but decided to have all the parties to the sale arrested.

Transfusion of Sheep's Blood.

At St. Luke's Hospital, Friday evening, an operation was performed in the presence of several surgeons and interested witnesses upon William Boeckler, a young man who has been sick for a week with severe hemorrhages, which gives every promise of saving his life and effecting his complete restoration to health. The patient had been suffering with daily hemorrhages which reduced him from a strong and vigorous man in less than a week to so emaciated a condition that unless something was promptly done his death would have resulted in a few hours at the farthest. He was so weak that the usual remedies utterly failed to stop the bleeding caused by quinsy. Dr. Dedolph, who was in attendance, after the failure of all other attempts to save his patient, decided to attempt the transfusion of blood into Boeckler's system taken from a sheep. Friday evening Drs. Dedolph, Stone, Stamm and McDonald met at St. Luke's Hospital, and performed the experiment. The sick man looked like wax, and he was so weak as to be hardly conscious. A live sheep was brought in, and, when all was ready, a tube was inserted into the carotid artery in the animal's neck, and then into a prominent vein in the sick man's right arm. The blood spurted through the inclosure, and was permitted to continue till Boeckler commenced to breathe short and fast. Then the tube was removed. All of the while the patient's condition was carefully watched, and it is estimated that about six ounces of the blood of the sheep passed into his arm. He soon after commenced to revive, and last evening, at a late hour, was feeling much better. The physicians see no reason why he should not completely recover. The operation is unusual, but is not regarded as a remarkably-delicate one. It is the first of the kind performed in the State, and probably the first west of Chicago, as far as any record is to be found.—St. Paul Pioneer-Press.

A Dark Deed Avenged.

Troy Dye and Edward Anderson were recently executed at Sacramento, Cal., for one of the most diabolical murders recorded in the annals of crime. A. M. Tullis, the murdered man, was a wealthy orchardist, possessing a large estate on Grand island, in the vicinity of Sacramento city. The crime was committed on the night of Aug. 1, of last year. Its object was to enable Dye, in his capacity as Public Administrator, to get hold of Tullis' estate, the latter's heirs living at a distance. At the time of his death Tullis was the largest fruit-grower on the Sacramento river, having one large orchard and interest in two others. His gains in the fruit season were at the rate of $1,000 a day, and he had accumulated from $80,000 to $100,000 before his body was found, cold and stiff, in his orchard, on the morning of Aug. 2. When Dye, as Public Administrator, applied for letters of administration, he rated the estate at $50,000, his object being to secure all over that amount. The killing of Tullis on any other ground being objectless, the theory was formed, soon after the murder, that either his relatives had committed the crime to secure the estate as his heirs, or that Dye had done the deed to take possession as Public Administrator. As Tullis' relatives—a brother and a nephew—were from 800 to 3,000 miles from the scene, suspicion fastened on Dye, who was discovered to have been in the neighborhood of Tullis' ranch the night of the murder. He was arrested on Aug. 12. As he had up to that borne an irreproachable reputation, his arrest was a shock to the community. Two days later he made a confession of the crime. The murder, he said, was not committed by him, but by Clark, his partner in a saloon venture, and by Anderson, a former employe in Dye's butcher shop, Dye having other occupations besides that of Public Administrator. Anderson, being arrested, also made a confession.

Remedies for Hydrophobia.

A Parisian veterinarian has recently announced his discovery of a certain antidote to the virus of rabies. To prove its value he inoculated sixteen dogs with the virus, abandoned eight of them to nature and placed the remainder on active treatment. The first eight shortly became rabid and died; the others are still alive and apparently in sound health.

In connection with the question of hydrophobia, L'Italia Agricola recalls a circumstance put on record by Dr. Maraschetti, an Italian surgeon at Moscow. While traveling in the Ukraine, in 1813, there were introduced to his notice fifteen persons who had just been bitten by a dog that was undoubtedly rabid. As the doctor was preparing his remedies he was waited on by a deputation of respectable persons, who requested that a peasant of the neighborhood, whose skill in curing hydrophobia was in high repute, might be permitted to undertake the care of the patients.

Maraschetti consented, on condition that he should be allowed to be present and personally supervise the measures adopted by the coutryman. The latter gave fourteen of the patients a decoction of broom-flowers to drink, and twice a day he carefully examined the interior surface of the tongues, to see, as he expressed it, "whether any buttons containing the poison had formed." Where these appeared they were at once opened and cauterized with a red-hot iron. The whole of these fourteen patients recovered, and Maraschetti saw them three years afterward in perfect health.

The fifteenth patient, who was put under ordinary treatment, developed hydrophobia at the end of the seventh day, and died.—Hartford Times.

OMAR KINGSLEY, a circus rider, died lately. He formerly performed in skirts, and was known to the public as Ella Zoyara. An effeminate form and manner enabled him to sustain the deception perfectly, and many stories, probably fictitious in the main, were told of his receiving sentimental overtures from men who saw him ride. His marriage to a daughter of Bob Stickney was about the first public revelation of his sex.

A FAMILY of four adults, in Northbridge, Mass., have drank enormously of cider since last fall, the quantity being estimated at forty to fifty barrels. They had been unable to sell it at a fair price, and so used it themselves. During the spring and latter part of winter it was very hard, and the drinkers were intoxicated much of the time. Six weeks ago the mother died in a fit, and later one of the sons died in a similar way, while the father has delirium tremens.

THE Louisville Courier-Journal has been investigating the condition of the public schools in Kentucky, and reaches the startling conclusion that over half the children of school age are without instruction of any kind, while the schools are in many cases poor and the terms brief where they are kept up at all. The leading paper of the State has the frankness to confess the disgracefulness of the showing, and calls for immediate and thorough reform. It lays down this platform, and a new era for Kentucky will open when the State grows wise enough to accept it: "In each one of the 6,000 school districts there must be schools for whites and schools for blacks, which shall, under good teachers, be kept in operation not less than nine months in the year."

ST. LOUIS hopes to increase its cotton receipts more than 100,000 bales next fall by new railroad connections now being established with Texas. The St. Louis Compress Association and ex-Gov. Hubbard, of Texas, are the prime movers in this enterprise, which contemplates draining the trade of Northeastern Texas into St. Louis, by building a narrow-gauge line from Texarkana, the present terminus of the Iron Mountain road, to Waco—a distance of 230 miles. The Texas roads have discriminated against St. Louis in favor of New Orleans and Galveston, and have kept rates so high that the towns of Texas which are to be reached by the new line are glad to help build it to break down the monopoly. St. Louis imagines that its new venture is to become the trunk line to Texas, and that it is ultimately to be completed to the Rio Grande and form part of the southwestern route to the Pacific.

A CHICAGO court has just rendered a decision in a life-insurance case that will not commend itself to the holders of policies. A man took some laudanum to relieve pain, but got an overdose and was killed. The company in which he was insured refused to pay over the amount of the policy, taking refuge in the plea that the policy stipulated that it should be void if the insured died by his own hand, voluntarily or involuntarily, sane or insane. The widow brought suit against the company, but the court instructed the jury that the accidental taking of too much opium, though taken to alleviate pain and not with suicidal intent, came within the limitation stated, and a verdict was accordingly rendered in favor of the company. The case will be carried to a higher court, however, where this decision may be reversed. If it stands, it will be hard work for a man to die in such a way that an insurance company can't find sufficient ground to contest the payment of his policy with a good chance of success.

MR. MILLER became interested in Halleck, a convict in the Ohio State prison, and, by earnest efforts, obtained his pardon. That was three months ago. Halleck found a temporary home in the Miller family, and his reformation seemed complete. He has now eloped with Miller's wife, and Miller says that he was never so astonished in his life. Mr. Delaine, of New Orleans, was equally surprised by the elopement of his daughter, Eugenie. He forbade her to marry young Bascot, and, lest she should disobey, started to take her to Chicago, where he intended to leave her in charge of a vigilant aunt. He saw the girl bid Bascot farewell on the levee, and put her aboard the steamer, carefully locking her in a stateroom. When he was ready to go to bed he looked in to see if she was in much distress, but she was not there at all, having escaped through the window, rejoined her lover and got married. The sight of a real gypsy, with black hair and yellow skin, affected Jennie Reed sentimentally, and the young man, who had strolled into Cazenovia, N. Y., with his band of horse traders and fortune tellers, lost no time in wooing her. Her father tried to stop the nonsense, but she was bound to elope, and did. A young Indian was similarly successful with a white girl at Avalanche, Minn. She invested him with all the romantic qualities of the noble red man of the books, and eloped with him to his wigwam.

Economy in Dress.

To be sure, these are hard times, and prudence is needful; but, my dear ladies, that is poor economy which leads you to buy cheap goods simply because they are cheap.

In the long run this plan does not pay. If you buy but little, buy good material. Everybody should contrive to have three dresses in wear.

If it is important to have one really good dress, it is equally important to have a good second best to save it.

Many poor women destroy a best dress by wearing it at unsuitable times, simply because they have no other presentable one in which to go out.

A richer neighbor could save her silk on a rainy day by wearing a coarser and more suitable dress.

We know a lady who, on a small stated income, manages to dress handsomely on all occasions, going out a great deal in fashionable circles. It takes science, but she is equal to it; she buys one good dress a year, this she has made up in the prevailing style, and sets it aside as her very best for dinner parties, sunny Sabbaths, and the like.

The last year's best dress is remodeled into an excellent second best, which is most used of the set. It serves for afternoon wear, for general street wear and dull Sundays.

Then comes the third best, which is made, most likely, of several old dresses, ripped apart and turned to the best account.

This is for very common use, but looks very well even in the street, for the materials of which it is made were of the best in their day, and such goods have a perennial youth.

The other accessories of her toilet are always elegant. She never buys cheap lace, which wears out in a season, but procures the real, which lasts for years.

Again, she saves all her pieces—every scrap of silk, satin, or velvet—and is never at a loss for the materials for a bright-colored bow or a tasteful head-dress.

Delicacy of Mint Scales.

The fine gold-weighing scales made in Philadelphia for the New Orleans mint are marvels of mechanical invention and accurate workmanship. The larger of the two has a capacity of 10,000 ounces troy, or about 686 pounds avoirdupois, and, when loaded to its full weight, will indicate a variation of 1-1,000 part of an ounce, or the 1-1,000,000 part of its weighing capacity. Another pair of scales is the one intended for weighing gold only. It has bearings composed of the finest agates, which have been ground with wonderful precision. So delicate is this machine that it will give the precise weight of a human hair, and is susceptible to the slightest atmospheric changes. Millions of dollars' worth of precious metals will be weighed annually upon these scales.—New Orleans Times.

"GENTLEMEN of the jury," said Mr. Phelps to the twelve men of Worthington, Minn., who had convicted his daughter of selling cider without a license, "all I've got to say is, you're a set of jackasses, and you may wave your ears over that solemn truth." Mr. Phelps was fined $10 for contempt of court.

AUBURN COURIER.

THEO. REED,
ROB. J. LOWRY. } Editors.

The trades unions of the various cities of this country have definitely decided to devote the next Fourth of July to a grand demonstration for the eight-hour-a-day movement. The report that there is to be a general labor strike at that time, or any other time this summer, is denied.

James Gordon Bennett has purchased a half interest in 1,048 acres of land between Yonkers and Williamsbridge, north of Jerome Park, for $170,000. The region is known as the Sawmill River valley, and it is reported that Bennett proposes to erect 4,000 small homes thereon for persons of moderate incomes.

Texas has enacted a local-option bell-punch law. Each county in the State may decide, as heretofore, whether alcoholic beverages shall or shall not be sold within its borders, and, should the verdict be in favor of the sale, then the county authorities may decide upon the number of places to be licensed and provided with bell-punches. The Galveston News estimates that 200 counties will adopt the bell-punch system, and that the number of punches required will be about 4,000.

Russia seeks other worlds to conquer. Consequently she intends to provide herself with the largest telescope in the world. Prof. Newcomb, of Washington, has received a letter from Otto Strune, Director of the Pulkowa Observatory in Russia, announcing that the Russian Government has voted 250,000 rubles for the construction of the largest telescope in the world. The object glass will be about three feet in diameter. It is expected that Russia will send this object glass to America to have it ground and finished.

Another "learned blacksmith" comes to supply the place made vacant by the death of Elihu Burritt. His name is Robert D. Coggeshall, his home Newport, R. I., and he has spent all his life on his native island, except the four years that he served in the army during the war. He was a poor boy, was given only a common-school education, and has had to work hard at his trade for a living, but he early developed a great love for geology, and has found time to pick up a most astonishing amount of knowledge about his favorite science. He is now past middle life, but still works in his shop every day, going home frequently in the summer to meet in the evening somebody interested in geology who has come to Newport for rest and has heard of the self-taught scientist.

On the 24th of last month Queen Victoria completed her 60th year, an age which has been exceeded by eleven only of the sovereigns of England, dating from the Norman Conquest, namely: Henry I., who lived to the age of 67 years; Henry III., who lived 65 years; Edward I., who lived to be 67 years old; Edward III., 65 years; Queen Elizabeth, who reached 69 years; James II., 68 years; George I., 67 years; George II., 77 years; George III., 82 years; George IV., 68 years; and William IV., who lived 72 years. She has reigned forty-two years on the 20th of June next, a period which has not been exceeded by more than four English sovereigns, namely: Henry III., who reigned fifty years; Queen Elizabeth, who reigned forty-five years, and George III., sixty years.

The Hon. Edward W. Stoughton, United States Minister to Russia, has been interviewed in regard to the Nihilist troubles. He declared that these troubles have been grossly exaggerated, and that nearly every material statement made about them is absolutely false. Many of the letters dated in Russia were not written in that country, and contained statements which he knew from personal knowledge to be false. He further declared that it was not true that the Russian people were deeply infected with Nihilism; it was not true that whole troops of students had been arrested by the police and sent off to Siberia or tortured in dungeons; it was not true that whole regiments of the army, with their officers, were tainted; and it was not true that any women of respectability had been found among the Nihilists.

On the 3d of April last, a mason of Buhlenhause, in Germany, hired a young girl of 11 to take care of his three children. The next day the youngest, an infant of five weeks, died suddenly, without any apparent malady. Suspicion rested on the girl, and it was found that two children which she had previously taken care of at Berghulen and Sontheim had also died suddenly. Autopsies were made of the two infants, and their skulls were found broken. The girl then confessed that, being tired of their crying, she had knocked their heads against the wall. As the heads were covered with caps, the marks were slight and not noticeable, particularly as but a slight blow would be required to fracture the soft skull of an infant. The culprit denied killing the child at Sontheim. Being under 12, she is not amenable to law, and will simply be placed in a House of Correction.

A reporter has been examining a hotel register at West Point, and found, under date of May 26, 1839, the name of "J. B. Magruder, Washington, D. C.," afterward a distinguished Confederate General. Under the date of May 29, 1839, is the entry "U. H. Grant, Georgetown, Ohio," and underneath "Fred'k T. Dent." This brings up the old matter of Hiram's change of name, and the following explanation is ventured: It is said of Gen. Grant, when he first left his Ohio home and reported at West Point, that, upon signing his name, "U. H. Grant," in the academic register at the Adjutant's office, he was informed there was no appointment for any candidate of that name, but that there was one for "U. S. Grant." This mistake in an initial was, doubtless, due to a misunderstanding on the part of the Congressman of his district in making out the appointment. The future General and President replied that the change of an initial made no particular difference to him.

The route of the Panama ship canal, as selected by the congress at Paris, is to extend from the Gulf of Limon on the Atlantic side to the Bay of Panama on the Pacific side. This is the Panama-Aspinwall route. As originally planned the canal was to follow the course of the Chagres river as far as Matachin, a distance of about twenty-six miles. The Obispo river was to be utilized to Paraiso, and a channel cut through the mountain ridge to Rio Grande river, which flows into the Bay of Panama. The highest point to be cut through is 262 feet (this contemplated a canal with locks). The length of the proposed canal will be about forty-five miles on one line, and forty-two miles on the line surveyed by Commander Lull in 1875. The project will be under the management of M. de Lesseps, and the canal, if constructed, will be at the sea level, in accordance with his views on that point, if, we suppose, the money is forthcoming to build it. It is questionable, in view of the vast amounts of money involved, whether railway transit would not be cheaper. In these days of improved machinery, transferring cargoes is a very minor item in freighting goods.

"Down Fine."

"Get your ticket at the wagon!" screamed the doorkeeper of the circus yesterday to a young man with a girl on his arm who had a handful of small change. "This is the third time you have come here without tickets, when you know I can't take money."

The young man and his girl fell back, and as they did not go near the ticket-wagon, and yet seemed very anxious to see the circus, a curious-minded citizen edged around and inquired of the young man:

"Why don't you buy tickets if you want to go in?"

"'Cause I'm short!" was the whispered reply. "I didn't 'low enough for incidentals when I was figgering on the cost of this thing, but I don't want the gal to know it!"

"How much are you short?"

"Only 5 cents. I figgered that ten shillings would pay all expenses, but I got left. We spent 10 cents for peanuts, 10 cents on the street cars, and 5 in candy. I had just $1 left to pay our way in, when she got a peanut shuck in her throat and I had to buy a glass of lemonade to wash it down. Didn't do it, though, till I had pounded her on the back more'n fifty times and tried to pull one o' them fire hydrants up by the roots!"

"I'll lend you 5 cents to make up your $1," said the citizen.

"You will? By gosh! but that lets me out! I'd made up my mind to tell the gal that the tigers had got loose and the hyenas had run mad, but she's long-headed and might not have believed it. Thankee, sir, and the fust time I'm in town I'll pay it back. Hang it, I orter figgered on 'leven shillings, 'stead of ten, but you've made me happy for life. Come, Bets!"—Detroit Free Press.

Ventilating Ships.

The ventilation of ships has of late years been attracting considerable attention, the more so because of the rapidly increasing ocean travel. Many plans for ventilating ships have been devised and tried, few of them with success, on account of the obvious difficulties to be overcome. A recently-perfected apparatus invented by a physician for the above purpose has just been examined by a board of Government experts, who find that the principle upon which it is constructed is the only true method of securing perfect ventilation in ships. The apparatus is a copper cylinder attached to the ship's rudder, extending seven feet below and five above the water-line. It is fitted up with two sets of valves opening into pipes running to all parts of the ship. These valves are so arranged that the motion of the ship in rising and falling with the waves pumps the foul air out of the ship. There is one objection, however, urged against the apparatus. It is thought that in the tropics, where the water is calm and where ventilation is most needed, it may fail to work, but a test will probably open a way to overcoming this difficulty.—Baltimore News.

POLITICAL NOTES.

Daniel Webster delivered an oration on the completion of the Bunker Hill monument that almost lifted his vast audience from the ground. Every sentiment uttered by him evoked the most heartfelt applause. Without comment we submit a single paragraph from this grand oration: "If men would enjoy the blessings of republican government they must govern themselves by reason, by mutual counsel and consultation, by a sense and feeling of general interest, and by the acquiescence of the minority in the will of the majority, properly expressed; and, above all, the military must be kept, according to the language of our bill of rights, in strict subordination to the civil authority. Wherever this lesson is not learned and practiced there can be no political freedom. Absurd, preposterous is it, a scoff and a satire on free forms of constitutional liberty, for frames of government to be prescribed by military leaders and the right of suffrage to be exercised at the point of the sword."

The Albany Argus has an article in regard to Blaine which contains much more truth than poetry. We copy its conclusion: "There is no man in the United States who is so much distrusted. There is no man who is regarded with so much interest. The people look on him as one who has flung character to the winds, and they are curious to see how far and how long he can get on without character or without even the pretense of character. He is fond of taunting rebels, but they have him at a disadvantage; they never stole anything. He is fond of taunting rebels, but they have him at a disadvantage; they had real convictions. He is fond of taunting rebels, but they have him at a disadvantage; they put up their lives and all for the things they believed, and, going into public life poor, emerged poorer and without dishonor. He is fond of taunting rebels, but they have him at an advantage; nobody believes they are for sale. He is fond of taunting rebels, but they have him at a disadvantage; nobody says, 'They are smart, but no dependence can be placed on them.' A performer without conscience or respect, Mr. Blaine is the most brilliant exponent of the venality of a venal party in a venal age, and that is all he is."

The issues on which the Republican managers have elected to go to the country, says the Washington Post, would not be changed in any particular if submitted for revision to the shrewdest politicians in the Democratic party. "The people will be asked to decide whether the Democratic republic which the fathers founded shall continue, or a centralized despotism be erected on its ruins. That is the sum of all the issues, and it stands out in such bold relief that it cannot be disguised. If systematized and statutory packing of juries is to annul the right of trial by jury, if the civil power is to be permanently relegated to a position subordinate to the military arm of the Government, if the Department of Justice and the vaults of the treasury are to be placed at the disposal of campaign committees, to furnish men and means to control elections—if all or any of these abominations are to be engrafted, as permanent features, on our system of government, the work of the fathers will be destroyed, and the most odious of all despotisms will take the place of constitutional government. In arranging these issues the Republican managers show their estimate of the intelligence and patriotism of the voting masses. It would be as reasonable to expect the black men of the United States to vote themselves back into slavery as it is to call on the white men to vote away their fundamental rights, and brand the republic as a failure. The sophistries which Republican orators have woven in intricate webs and hung around the ugly facts of the situation will be of no avail. The gleam of the bayonet and the mailed hand of tyranny are not to be thus hidden. The unerring instinct of the people could be trusted if they were far less intelligent than they are."

Senator Thurman, in the debate on the bill to repeal the jurors' test oath, paid his respects to Conkling in this fashion: "We know that the jury laws as they now exist are used for partisan purposes. We know that as they are administered they are a disgrace to the so-called administration of justice. We are in dead earnest that that evil shall be remedied, even if it be necessary to suffer the mortification of the taunts of the Senator from New York. I hope we can survive plenty of that kind of medicine. Even if it be necessary to do that, we as practical men are willing to see that mere sophistry at this end of the avenue shall not be re-echoed from the other end of the avenue. That is all there is of it. If the Senator from New York thinks that God has crowned him with such surpassing intellect, and that the study of the law has made him the very embodiment of the code of Justinian, Coke's Institutes, all the English statutes, and the American statutes, too, that he has breakfasted on Blackstone's Commentaries, taken lunch on Kent, dined on Story, and taken as a slight refection before he retired to bed John Marshall's decisions, let him live in that happy atmosphere of self-esteem; I will not attempt in the slightest degree to mar one single particle of his self-satisfaction. I even agree that he may loom over me, a much older lawyer than he is, like one of those genii in the "Arabian Nights," who, when the cork was taken out of the bottle, rose out, away up to the clouds, to the utter amazement and astonishment of all beholders. Let it be so as long as he pleases, but he shall not prevent me as a practical legislator from attempting to remove the pebbles that he throws in my path when I have a march to make."

The Boston Post says: "The next Presidency is not to be contested on the Ohio idea, the New England idea or the Southern idea, but upon a fundamental, national idea which will overpower all others. The country will insist that there shall be a free ballot, that the people shall not be cowed by Federal soldiers or United States Marshals, but that the sovereigns, not their servants, shall rule. They will demand, too, that full and fair expression shall be given to the ballot after it has been cast without being counted out by infamous Returning Boards or the decrees of Electoral Commissions. These two things go hand in hand. Free elections and full force to the popular will, as determined thereby, will constitute the battle cry of the next campaign. All minor issues will have to give way. Facts and circumstances are more potent than party leaders, and will brush aside all attempts to avoid or change the real issue. The untrammeled right of the people to elect their own rulers was wantonly invaded in 1876. The machinery under which it was done then the Democrats now insist shall be given up. The party which by its use succeeded in then thwarting the popular will refuse to surrender it, and threaten to stop the wheels of the Government if they cannot be allowed to retain it. Whatever the result may be at this session, and whatever turn things may take at Washington, the real issue is one for the people, and they alone can settle it. Congress will do little more than make up the case. The people have got to settle it at the polls. Collateral questions, however important, will have to bide their time. The Ohio idea will have to stand aside. So with all sectional issues. The Republicans cannot force Southern questions into the foreground should they attempt it. The Southern people have none to push forward, and no disposition to bring them to the front if they had."

The Republican Platform for 1880.

The truth of the proverb that politics makes strange bedfellows was well illustrated recently when the Hon. John B. Haskin, the freest from political complications of all our anti-Tammany leaders, opened a correspondence with John Sherman, by means of which the latter formally announced himself as a candidate for President. He took that occasion also to define what he calls "the true issue for 1880." His platform is a revival of sectional hate, sweetened with cant phrases, as follows:

> What I would aspire to in case public opinion should decide to make me a candidate for President would be to unite in co-operation with the Republican party all the national elements of the country that contributed to or aided in any way in the successful vindication of national authority during the war. I would not do this for the purpose of irritating the South or oppressing them in any way, but to assert and maintain the supremacy of the national authority to the full extent of all the power conferred by the constitution.

Stripped of its disguises, the plain meaning of this programme, which has now become the leading idea of the Republican party, is to wipe out State lines entirely, to divest the States of the rights secured by the constitution, and, in place of a union of States and people, to establish a consolidated government, in itself the first step toward an imperial republic.

The whole line of policy of the Republicans since the civil war has been in this direction. All the political legislation, beginning with reconstruction, has exhibited the same spirit. The election laws, the jurors' test oaths, and the use of the army to overthrow State Governments, to make Legislatures to order, and to consummate the Presidential fraud, are conspicuous examples of a systematic scheme to destroy the constitutional rights of the States, and to subordinate their local and rightful authority to the arbitrary will of the Executive.

Hence the tenacity with which the Republican leaders cling to the use of the army at the polls, and to Davenport's invention for depriving naturalized citizens of their votes. Give them an army of Supervisors and Deputy Marshals, who may receive $50 each for ten days' service, with power to make arrests without process on the eve of an election, and who may steal the papers on which thousands of votes depend, and the way to success is easy.

In 1870 thousands of troops and two ships of war were ordered to this city to overawe our people, and thus to control the election. But for the prompt decision of the local authorities we might soon have had repeated here the outrages that were perpetrated in Louisiana, South Carolina, and other States. The experiment failed, because Grant did not dare to rouse the sleeping lion at the North. In 1878 the same party resorted to another process, more insidious, but none the less an invasion of the jurisdiction and authority of the State.

The issue made up by John Sherman was adopted by the Republican Convention of Ohio, and will doubtless be followed elsewhere. In the midst of bankruptcy and distress, with millions of idle hands and the people crying out for relief, the leaders of this party have nothing better to offer in the way of statesmanship than a renewal of animosity between the North and the South, and a revival of the passions that were supposed to be buried with the Rebellion.

The laws generally are obeyed in every part of the Union. The people, North and South, crave for peace and for an end of sectional agitation. The condition of public affairs is sufficiently bad, without the aggravation of an element which disheartens effort and throws backward every advance toward improvement. For fourteen years the same cry, in a variety of forms, has been renewed, and it remains to be seen with what effect it can be renewed now.—New York Sun.

One hundred and eighty-three cotton-mills have been built in the South since the war.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

Use waste paper for cleaning stoves, tinware, knives, spoons, windows, mirrors, lamp-chimneys, etc.

An excellent wax varnish for furniture is made by dissolving, over a gentle heat, three ounces of wax in one quart of oil of turpentine.

Dissolve four or five pounds of washing soda in boiling water and throw down the kitchen sink to prevent the pipes stopping up with grease, etc. Do this every few weeks.

Sweet oil is recommended for polishing pianos. Apply with a chamois skin and rub with different skins as they become saturated with the oil. It requires one or two hours of hard rubbing to restore an instrument to its original luster.

Feathers should be very thoroughly dried before using them. If feather beds smell badly, or become heavy from want of proper renovation of the feathers, or from old age, empty them and wash the feathers thoroughly in a tub of suds, spread them in the garret to dry, and they will be as light and good as new. Never lay the pillows or feather ticks to dry in the sun; lay them in a shady place, where the wind can purify them. Heat makes feathers rancid.

Pot plants that become unthrifty and sickly may be revived by planting them in rich mold in a sunny spot, after trimming, after the season becomes permanently warm. Thus they will often grow into a vigorous state during July and August, and be ready for repotting. Oleanders, oranges, lemons, camellias, azaleas, among hard-wooded plants, may be made healthy in this way. They must, however, be protected from the effects of sweeping prairie winds.

Tomato Catchup.—A bushel of ripe tomatoes cut up and cooked thoroughly; strain through a sieve when cold: add three quarts of vinegar, one pint and a half of salt, three ounces each of whole cloves and allspice, three ounces white and black pepper, one and a half ounces cayenne pepper, twelve onions boiled whole in it for several hours, watching and stirring for fear of burning. It need not boil hard, but simmer steadily. When cold bottle, after removing the onions when they have well flavored the mixture; keep in a cool, dry place.

Bleaching a Straw Hat.—1. If your hat is badly sun-burned soak it in sour milk a few days. 2. Wash your hat clean in lively soap-suds with either a flesh or a tooth-brush, then rinse. Have a tight barrel or box ready. Drive a nail in one side to hang your hat on. You should sew a thread through the rim to form a loop to suspend it by; have your cover ready; take an old dish; put in some live coal (stop your nose if you are not fond of the perfume); then throw on some stick sulphur or brimstone previously pounded in small lumps. Five cents' worth would be enough, I should think. 3. First scrub it well in water softened with borax, using very little soap; then rinse it in borax water, using a tea-spoonful of powdered borax in a basin of water; bleach it in the sun for two or three days; and, if the hat is very yellow, a little lemon juice rubbed on will prove effective.

Cleaing the Hair.—1. Make half a pint of soap-suds with pure white soap and warm water, on rising any morning; but before applying it brush the whole scalp well while the hair is perfectly dry, with the very best Russia bristle brush; scrub back and forth with a will, let not any portion of the surface escape. When brushing the top and front, lean forward, that the particles may fall. After this operation is finished, strike the ends of the bristles on the hearth, or on a board, next pass the coarse part of the comb through the bristles; next brush or flap the hair back and forth with the hand, until no dust is seen to fall; then with the balls of the fingers dipped in the soap-suds, rub the fluid into the scalp and about the roots of the hair; do this patiently and thoroughly; finally, rinse with clear water, and absorb as much of the water from the hair as possible with a dry cloth, then (after allowing the hair to dry a little more by evaporation, but not to dry entirely) dress it as usual, always, under all circumstances, passing the comb through the hair slowly and gently, so as not to break any one off, or tear out any one by the roots. 2. Ammonia should not be used on the hair; it injures the gloss and softness, causing the hair to become harsh and dry. The best way to cleanse the hair and keep the scalp healthy is to beat up a fresh egg and rub it well into the hair, or, if more convenient, rub it into the hair without beating. Rub the egg in until a lather is formed; occasionally wet the hands in warm water, softened with borax; by the time the lather is formed the scalp is clean; then rinse the egg all out in a basin of warm water, containing a table-spoonful of powdered borax; after that rinse in one clear, warm water.

Got Any Nails?

He was just full enough not to know a grindstone from a ribbon block, and he came sailing along Fourth street, tacking from side to side like a ship going against the wind. He struck a dry-goods store at last, and stumbled in, and a pretty girl clerk came to wait on him. "Hic," he said, "you got any nails?" The girl was a little bit scared, but she told him no; that was a dry-goods store, and they didn't keep nails in stock. Then he went out and started ahead again, but took a creel in himself, and turned and got into the same store again. "Hic," he said, "you got any nails?" This time the girl was a little provoked. "No," she said; "a hardware store is the place to get nails; we don't keep them." Out he went again, and started off as before, but got turned again, and came back to the same place the third time. "Hic," he said, "you got any nails?" Now the girl was mad, and snapped out, "No, we ain't got any nails; you're drunk, and you want to stay away from here." "Hic," he answered, "you ain't got no nails?" "No, we haven't." "Well (hic), if you ain't got no nails, how the deuce do you scratch your head?" The policeman took him off before her answer was sent in to his conundrum.—Cincinnati Saturday Night.

Investigation by experts of the books of County Treasurer James Reynolds, of Knox county, covering his four years in office, is finished. A report was made March 12 disclosing a shortage for 1877 amounting to $1,451, which was paid back by Reynolds. In April another report for 1878 was made, revealing $2,500 more. A final report is now made public covering the years 1875 and 1874. It shows a discrepancy of $6,993, making a gross total of $10,973.80. Deducting the amount covered into the treasury leaves $9,121.98 due the county.

Isaac Draper, of Sullivan, who thought he had reason to suspect his wife's fidelity, pretending to be away, watched his residence. Seeing his wife meet Wm. McCrory, about whom and his wife a previous scandal had existed, Draper rushed out of the alley and fired seven shots at McCrory. The latter fired two in return, and then engaged in a hand-to-hand struggle, in which McCrory's skull was cut, and one shot took effect in his breast, passing under the ribs and touching his heart. McCrory will die.

AUBURN, INDIANA, JUNE 26, 1879.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

The banking house of John S. Williams, at LaFayette, is closed for repairs. Liabilities $74,000. John will want an office worse than ever now.

At Dayton, Ohio, a Miss Von Blummen, recently walked one hundred miles in twenty-six consecutive hours, on a track requiring thirty laps to the mile.

The New York Sun, says: "If Mr. Tilden is nominated, it will be because the people want him, and will have no other man." Then he will not be nominated, because the people do not want him, and will have some other man.

Hayes has concluded that Mr. McCreary, of Iowa, is not the man he was looking for, to fill a vacancy that has not yet occurred in the office of judge of the circuit court of the United States. Considerate Hayes. This time the senate done the vetoing.

Henri Waterson of the Courier-Journal, was sober one day last week, and attempted a graceful apology for his vile attack upon Hon. T. A. Hendricks. Henri finds that Kentucky is bound to stand by Hendricks, and he is trying to get out of the way of the crushing machine. Had not some of our democratic editors over here in Indiana better begin to taper off a little?

Another Napoleon has died beyond the bounds of France. Napoleon I., the founder of the family, died a prisoner on the British island of St. Helena, in the South Atlantic Ocean; his son Napoleon II., died in Austria; his nephew, Napoleon III., died an exile in England; and the would be Napoleon IV., a grand nephew of Napoleon I., died in Zululand.

If Johnny Bull has any more belts to dispose, of it is only necessary to say the word, as America stands ready to enter any contest that may be proposed. The season of '79 has showered honors upon America's representative across the water; first Parole the fleet footed running horse was victorious, then Hanlan paddled his own canoe, and now Weston walks away with the Astley belt. Hurrah! for the American eagle, he is soaring high these days.

The president has fallen into the knack of the things so well, that he has a pigeon-hole fitted up in his secretaire marked "Possible Vetoes," another, "Vetoes in Case of Emergencies," and still another, "Veto Blanks, to be filled in by Mrs. Hayes in case of sickness." —Exchange.

In another appartment nearer at hand, pigeon-holes are labelled "Florida appointments," 'Louisiana appointments,' "South Carolina appointments," "Appointments for thieves," the latter is the same used by Grant.

The Press would have the people believe that Auditor Robbins appointed the new trustee of Franklin township of his own free will and accord. We do not believe such was the case. Auditors are not usually so anxious to assume responsibilities that can be avoided by delaying the matter a day or two. We surmise that the appointment was brought about by the pressure of innumerable small-bore politicians, in order to secure a majority of the township trustees and elect a republican county superintendent of schools.

Under the leadership of Professor Jordon, late of Butler University Ind., the following gentlemen sailed form the port of New York on Saturday last:

David S. Jordon, Indianapolis, Ind, Charles H. Gilbert, Indianapolis Ind, M G. Clifford, Indianapolis, Ind, Wm. W. Spangler, Auburn Ind, J. H. Manzy, Rushville, Ind, Charles Nash, Constantinople Turkey, D. R. Mills, Cologne Germany. Their chief objects are a geological survey of Switzerland (the Alps) and a visit to the principal places of note in England, France, Germany and Italy. The party will return to the United States some time in September or October next.

America is ahead again. The great pedestrian contest for the Astley belt and the championship of the world, was begun at Agricultural hall, in London, Eng., on Monday, June 16th, at 1 a. m.; the contestants being John Ennis, of Chicago, Ill.; E. P. Weston, of Providence, R. I.; "Blower" Brown and R. Harding, England. A dispatch from London at 11 o'clock last Saturday night, says: "The great contest is finished, and Weston is being proclaimed, with shouts and cheers, the champion of the world. Weston completed his 550th mile at precisely at 11 o'clock, thereby winning the belt, his bet and the championship. From 2 o'clock this afternoon until 8, Weston accomplished the astonishing feat of making five miles an hour. During these six hours the excitement was something wonderful, and the plucky hero of the hour was greeted with shouts and cheers as he boldly plodded along against time."

—Mr. Jerome Showalter and Miss Clara Wheelock, will be married at the Presbyterian church this evening, at 9 o'clock. Don't mention it.

That the Tilden boom, like the Grant boom, is bound to fail, is evident from the free expression of the democratic press of the west and south of which the following from the Holly Springs (Miss) Reporter is a sample.

"That was a wise thing in the Ohio democrats to nominate General Ewing for Governor. His currency views are sound, and if the Tilden bondholding faction of New York will just give him a fair chance he will be elected. It is to the interest of Mr. Tilden for General Ewing to be defeated, and we have no doubt his 'bar'l' of money will be used against him. The defeat of General Ewing in this race will strengthen Mr. Tilden's chances for the Presidential nomination next year, and the old gentleman of Gramarcy Park generally puts his money, when a canvass is in progress, where it will do the most good for himself. So look out in Ohio."

If there is any foundation for such surmises, (and there may be,) Tilden neither deserves a nomination or election by the democratic party. Uncle Sammy's personal grievance is a delusion and a snare.

Kentucky is solid for Hendricks, notwithstanding the opposition of the Courier-Journal. A special dispatch from Louisville, to the Indianapolis Sentinel, says:

"The recent strong indorsement of Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, for the presidency, by Governor McCreary, of this state, finds a most cordial response, not only among the masses of the Kentucky democracy, but also with many of the most prominent and thoughtful of the politicians of the common-wealth. There can be no question that Mr. Hendricks was the first choice of the Kentucky democracy in 1876, and had the voice of the state had free expression at St. Louis, instead of being suppressed by certain parties for a financial consideration, as is openly and generally charged and notoriously believed, that expression would have been in favor of Mr. Hendricks. To-day Kentucky is for him as unanimously and resolutely as Indiana, and Kentuckians now having a better understanding of the status of certain wire manipulators in this city than they had in 1876, will not again be suppressed or sold out. The democracy of Indiana and the nation may assuredly depend upon this. The recent assault made by Mr. Tilden's organ here upon governor Hendricks was a most providential stroke in favor of Mr. Hendricks as it revealed to Kentuckians the true inwardness of the very small and weak clique that has essayed to run the democratic party of Kentucky, and has strengthened the determination of the party to put its heel upon these trading demagogues."

Tilden's Cowardice Saved the Radical Party a Terrible Thrashing.

The disclosures of John F. Mines, as recently published in the New York World, extracts from which are given below, are of great moment to the American people, though given to the public at a late day. It will be remembered that just prior to the terminus of the Grant administration, Gen. Stewart L. Woodford was appointed United States District Attorney at New York City, and was holding that position on the 4th of March 1877. Some time after Hayes had been seated, Mr. Mines was sent by a leading New York newspaper to interview Gen. Woodford concerning some matter of public interest, and being an old and intimate friend of the General, was invited into the private office, where an interview of an hour's duration took place, during which Gen. Woodford said;

"In regard to my acceptance of the District attorneyship. I can explain that by letting you into the secret of a little bit of history which may astonish you as it certainly would astonish the quiet citizens of New York. You know how much excitement attended the decision of the Electoral Commission that Mr. Hayes had been elected President in place of Mr. Tilden.

Threats were made here and at many other points that Mr. Tilden would be inaugurated on the 4th of March in spite of Grant and his army, that the Custom-houses would be seized to create a revenue, and that the democratic President would be seated by a grand popular uprising.

New York, it was plain, would be the central point of the new revolution. Mr Tilden would take the oath on the steps of the city hall at the hands of one of the democratic judges, and simultaneously the custom-house and the Sub-Treasury wolud be seized. Boasts were made that the business men of New York would make no opposition, but acquiesce in the situation from fear of their homes being given over to an incendiary mob."

"Do you think, General, there was any truth in these rumors?"

"I am afraid there was only too much truth in them. I know that President Grant and his advisers were very much afraid of the result. But Grant, though he was anxious, never hesitated about the course he was to pursue. He had determined to use every soldier and sailor and gun at his command to put down anything like a democratic rebellion.

I was sent for to Washington, and there consulted with the President and Cabinet and his military advisers in regard to the situation. Grant told me frankly that there might be trouble here; that he was seriously anxious in view of the great irritation of the public mind; that he was determined to secure the inauguration of Mr. Hayes at all hazards. He then asked me to accept the position of United States District Attorney at New York and insisted that it was my duty to do so. He freely admitted the possible perils of the position, and that I might be placed so that my nerve and judgment could alone avert trouble, since any attempt to inaugurate Mr. Tilden must be crushed out on the spot. Under these circumstances, and by the advice and solicitation of Senator Conkling, I accepted the appointment, received my instructions, and have had a very quiet and peaceable time ever since."

"But yet you think there was real danger? How could you have helped it if it had come? I don't see what the district attorney had to do with it."

"The danger was real—I can assure you of that. I believe that during the month that closed the Administration of Grant and opened that of Hayes the country stood on the brink of a civil war more terrible than that which we passed through, and it would have drenched the whole north in blood. If Mr. Tilden had listened to his more energetic advisers and insisted on attempting to assume the reins of government, we should have had war in these streets, and I should have been compelled to take an active part in it. No doubt there was a plan to inaugurate Mr. Tilden in this city, but his natural timidity and irresolution would not let him assent to it."

"But, General, suppose that, Mr. Tilden had been inaugurated at the City Hall—what could you have done about it here in a democratic city?"

"My plans were all laid systematically, you know my old habits of system, and approved by President Grant. We had quietly taken some very effective precautions beforehand. You smile, because you will never realize how near you were to a grand explosion, and that all the materials for a coup d'etat were lying loose around you—while good honest citizens went to bed unmoved at night, thinking that all the talk of resistance was mere campaign thunder. I confess that I do not want such another experience. I believe that we were in more danger of bloodshed than in the month that preceded the fall of Sumter.

But you have asked what I intended to do in case Mr. Tilden attempted to carry out his coup d'etat and have himself inaugurated on the City Hall steps or elsewhere in this city. My orders and intention were to seize him at once under a warrant charging him with high treason to convey him secretly and securely on board a government vessel lying in the East River and ship him to Fort Adams or some other secure point where he could undergo his trial. The first thing that any body knew of it, he would have disappeared, and the suddenness of the blow would have either disheartened his followers and taught them a salutary lesson of respect for the law, or it would have been the first blow of a terrific conflict between the law and its violators."

"Do you really believe, General, it would have been possible to arrest; Mr. Tilden?"

"I don't believe it—I know it. Of course it could not be done by calling out the regulars from Governor's Island and marching them up to Gramarcy Park, but it would have been done so quietly and effectively that all resistance would have come too late. Just as sure as he had dared take the oath of office he would have been whirled through these streets and landed in a gunboat. When he had got through with his trial for treason he would have been sick of playing president. While I was in Washington I had a long talk with Secretary Robeson on this subject —(you don't know him, do you? He's one of the best fellows in the world)— and we made all the arrangements for the use of his boats and men, not only to secure Tilden, but to overawe the mob by the gunboats and to shell them out if necessary. Robeson is very genial, but he is not a man to be trifled with, and we worked together admirably. Under our plans any resistance by Mr. Tilden would have been utterly impossible. As for the custom-house and sub-treasury, they were prepared for resistance and could have been strengthened by a sudden reinforcement of regulars so as to resist any mob. Regulars and marines inside the walls and a shell or two outside would have scattered an attacking party like chaff. Perhaps it was this knowledge of what the navy could do in the way of dispersing mobs that kept down the evil-disposed throng at Washington and New York.

"You see now how near we all were to trouble, and you can understand why I accepted this proposition at the time. Grant felt that he knew me and that I would carry out his orders under any and all circumstances. It was a time that might call for sharp and sudden work on the Atlantic line, and Grant, like a prudent General, made his preparations accordingly. Troops were quietly brought from the West and the south and massed at Washington, Fort McHenry and in our harbor, and you will remember that complaint was made in democratic newspapers about this matter and about the gunboats at Washington and New York. Republican newspapers laughed at it, of course, and most people did not know what to believe. If they had known how close the truth was their fears might have brought about the catastrophe. In that event the navy could have attended to the Atlantic cities, but a rising at the west would have been even worse in reality than in the anticipation. Thank God, Tilden was a coward and the whole thing blew over."

There it is, "thank God, Tilden was a coward," which he was. Then it was that Tilden should have been a Jackson, with bravery and cool courage in the defense of the right. Tilden had no right to consult his personal feelings, he sought the suffrage of, and was elected by the sovereign people; his duty was fidelity, not treachery and cowardice. The diabolical plot of Grant and his followers to set aside the verdict of the freemen of America by kidnapping a representative of the people, places the republican party lower in the scale of infamy than ever; even Mexico has not been able to equal such despotism. It seems to be the determination of the republican party to continue in power in America, though it be at the cost of many valuable lives, such being the case the sooner the terrible crisis comes the better; and when it comes, fraud, perjury, despotism, thieving, conspiracy and all the first principles of the republican party of to-day, will sink into oblivion, patriotism will once more rule supreme, and the star-spangled banner will again be the ensign of liberty.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. Sherar, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y. 6-eow 6-m.

Commissioners' Sale of Land.

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of an order of the DeKalb circuit court, in the case of Mariah Dixon and others, against Sebastian Tustison, I, as the Commissioner in said cause, will on the premises herein described, on

Saturday, July 26th, 1879,

at about one o'clock p. m., offer for sale the following real estate to-wit:

The east fraction of the south west quarter in section fourteen, (14), in township thirty-three, (33), north of range fourteen, (14), east, (except the right of way of the Baltimore, Pittsburgh and Chicago railroad company,) also the south fraction of the north west quarter of the same section, containing one hundred and thirty and 75-100 acres more or less. For any sum not less than two-thirds of the appraised value, on the following terms, to wit: One third of the purchase in hand, and the balance in three equal annual payments, with six per cent. interest, waiving valuation laws.

THE GENUINE
DR. C. McLANE'S
Celebrated American
WORM SPECIFIC OR VERMIFUGE.

SYMPTOMS OF WORMS.

THE countenance is pale and leaden-colored, with occasional flushes, or a circumscribed spot on one or both cheeks; the eyes become dull; the pupils dilate; an azure semicircle runs along the lower eye-lid; the nose is irritated, swells, and sometimes bleeds; a swelling of the upper lip; occasional headache, with humming or throbbing of the ears; an unusual secretion of saliva; slimy or furred tongue; breath very foul, particularly in the morning; appetite variable, sometimes voracious, with a gnawing sensation of the stomach, at others, entirely gone; fleeting pains in the stomach; occasional nausea and vomiting; violent pains throughout the abdomen; bowels irregular, at times costive; stools slimy, not unfrequently tinged with blood; belly swollen and hard; urine turbid; respiration occasionally difficult, and accompanied by hiccough; cough sometimes dry and convulsive; uneasy and disturbed sleep, with grinding of the teeth; temper variable, but generally irritable, &c.

Whenever the above symptoms are found to exist,
DR. C. McLANE'S VERMIFUGE
will certainly effect a cure.

IT DOES NOT CONTAIN MERCURY in any form; it is an innocent preparation, not capable of doing the slightest injury to the most tender infant.

The genuine DR. McLANE'S VERMIFUGE bears the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS. on the wrapper.

—:0:—

LIVER PILLS

are not recommended as a remedy "for all the ills that flesh is heir to," but in affections of the liver, and in all Bilious Complaints, Dyspepsia and Sick Headache, or diseases of that character, they stand without a rival.

AGUE AND FEVER.

No better cathartic can be used preparatory to, or after taking Quinine.

As a simple purgative they are unequaled.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The genuine are never sugar coated.

Each box has a red wax seal on the lid, with the impression DR. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS.

Each wrapper bears the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS.

Insist upon having the genuine Dr. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, prepared by Fleming Bros., of Pittsburgh, Pa., the market being full of imitations of the name McLane, spelled differently but same pronunciation.

Auburn Courier.

Local and Miscellaneous

—New-mown hay.

—Circuit court is still in session.

—The new moon indicates a dry month.

—Tom Cuppy and Jack Ralston will buy your grain.

—Read the new advertisement of Messrs. Root & Co.

—Kin. Lanning has opened a new hotel. Lodging free.

—The Auburn cornet band—that is to be, will be a good one.

—The boy that engineers the street sprinkler deserves a chromo.

—We know a young lady in this village whose "goose is cooked."

—John Sugars and family spent a few days in Summit this week.

—Geo. H. K. Moss visited Fort Wayne during the early part of the week.

—The Northern Indiana Editorial Association meets at Syracuse to-day

—Who stole Wright's whip and lap-robe from his stable Saturday night.

—Geo. Weamer, of the Republican, has finished his little visit and is again at home on duty.

—Sell your grain to Cuppy & Ralston, after July 1st. You will find them at the Eel-river elevator.

—Give Cuppy & Ralston a call before you sell your grain. They want a chance to make a bid.

—W. W. Hoffman is at Bloomdale, Ohio, where he will take charge of the station for a short time.

—Notice the new advertisement of Root & Company, of Fort Wayne, in this issue of the COURIER.

—We had a circus in town Tuesday—a bona fide, live circus—but it didn't stop; it went right through to Garrett.

—Tom Hanna, of the wholesale boot and shoe house of Carnahan, Hanna & Co., Fort Wayne, was in the city Tuesday.

—Ensley's new wind-mill on the east side of the public square, has attracted considerable attention. It is a good one.

—Our regular quarterly statements for job-work and advertising will be presented next week. "Be ye also ready."

—W. H. Coombs, of Fort Wayne, of the law firm of Coombs, Morris & Bell, spent Tuesday in this place. He was courting.

—Last Sunday was the longest day of the year. How happy the fellow must have been who spent it with his sweetheart.

—The mem'ers of the carunna band have a reputation for gentlemanly deportment on all public occasions. They deserve it.

—It is pretty generally understood that Cuppy & Ralston will pay as much for grain as any other buyers in DeKalb county.

—Fort Wayne proposes to outdo all previous efforts on the Glorious Fourth. She is already preparing to cut a great big watermelon.

—A loose convict was roaming around the streets a day or so ago. From appearances he had been out about an hour and a half.

Lee Hollopeter is a proud, proud man. Well, he is. A little girl claimed its quarters at his house last Tuesday morning;—yes, it did.

—Sheriff Leas made a curtailed trip to Fort Wayne last Friday. He was long enough, however, to make a horse-trade with Judge Morris.

—George Grund, the good-natured tonsorial artist at Sam. Pommert's shop, doesn't take a back seat to anybody on the hair-cutting business.

—Billy Ryan came down town Monday afternoon without any shirt; said he forgot it. Fortunately, however, he had his coat and pants on.

—Messrs Cappy & Ralston take charge of the Eel river elevator again, on the first of next month, and will be glad to meet their old friends.

—Misses Anna Williams and Celia Rank attended the old settlers' meeting in a body, and express themselves highly gratified with the proceedings.

—After the first of July, Cuppy & Ralston will have charge of the elevator at the Eel River depot, and will pay outside figures for all kinds of grain.

—Dave Hampton and Tom Mays figured conspicuously in the circus crowd at Garrett last Tuesday. They went to see the animals—nothing more.

—McQuisten & Ralston have the boss beef-cutter. If you think we are giving you "taffy," step into their store and "see how the old thing works yourself."

—Col. I. B. McDonald, of Columbia City, called at the COURIER office last Thursday. He delivered a brief but happy address at the old settlers meeting.

—Fix up your dilapidated side-walks, quick; the town board has made a tour of inspection, and will pass an ordinance at once requiring new walks wherever needed.

—There will soon be a sale of real-estate for corporation taxes due the town of Auburn, if the delinquents do not pay up at once. Take our advice and save costs.

—Tom Sprott, the only original Tom, passed through this native vale on his way from the north, Tuesday morning. He was going to Fort Wayne; Auburn was too small fry.

—J. C. Loveland, of the Headlight, paid a visit to our quill department Tuesday afternoon. He says he is going to attend the editorial convention at Syracuse to-day or bust.

—Mrs. W. J. Austin took her departure last Saturday, accompanied by her little boy, for her old home in Richmond, this state, where she is now visiting relatives and friends.

—A base soda-water swindle was last Saturday perpetrated on Billy Shaffer, the accommodating clerk at Davenport's drug-store. Sherm. Hollister knows considerable about it.

—The Eel-River railroad will sell excursion tickets between all stations, July 3 and 4, at one single fare for the round trip; tickets good to return on regular trains of July 4 and 5.

—That grave-yard melody, sent in a few days ago, can't appear this week. Our poetry typo is dead; got an overdose last week. We will endeavor to replace him, however, without delay.

—We owe Frank Leas for the pleasantest drive of the season, behind his little sorrel trotter, one evening last week. We passed everything on the road, and didn't exert ourselves, either.

—We are under obligations to Mr. L. Spangler for the names of the parties who accompany his son of this place, on a trip through Europe, the particulars of which are given in another column.

—Tiffin (O.) Herald: "Charles Cook has returned from Auburn, Ind., where he has been engaged in the railroad business, and will now remain here as a fixture at the C., S. & C. passenger house.

—Late Wright, the lumber and lime man, left last Monday for Greenville, Mich., where his wife is now visiting. He will also take in the pineries and purchase a stock of lumber before returning.

—Wheat along the line of the Saginaw road, is looking fine, and similar reports come from various points in the county. A few more such days as these will do the business, and then the farmers must toil early and late.

—In the vacancy made by Charley Cook's departure, Toby Rush manipulated the quill at the junction depot of the B. & O. He served his apprenticeship in just three days, and then laid off for his summer vacation.

—Circulars are out for a grand blow-out at Pleasant Lake on "the day we celebrate." There will be a walking match, dance, boat-race, and other refreshments; and the boys say, that everybody will have a g. g. t.

—G. W. Dawne, who lives near the northern line of this county, was a visitor at our office last Thursday. He is a firm, level-headed democrat, who appreciates his home paper and circulates it amongst relatives and friends.

—Dr. Sears, homeopathist, who came here a comparative stranger but a short time ago, is receiving his share of the people's patronage. He has been a close student, and is, withal, an unassuming and pleasant gentleman.

—The Hon. Peter Kiser was on hand last week, at the old settlers' meeting, with his little traditional scrap-book. He was of course anxious to talk, but as they limited him to twelve minutes, he got his back up and subsided.

—The Adventists say that this mondane sphere will be numbered among the things that were, after July 11. Young folks contemplating matrimony are advised to jump in at once; there's no telling where you'll meet again.

—List of unclaimed letters remaining in the post office at Auburn, for the week ending June 21, 1879: Lovina Ober, James Smith, Fannie Stroh, Wm. Skelley and Anna E. Shepler.

JOS. RAINIER, Postmaster.

—As a rope-splicer, an expert, thoroughbred weaver of severed ropes, Goop Ralston claims to have no living equal. All parties needing repairs of this kind can get it done by him, on short notice and in a systematic manner, "free gratis without money."

—Misses Sadie Hollister and Susie Parrish relieved the monotony of our item factory, a few days since, by a pleasant visit. We expounded the mysteries of the printing-office to them, and they will doubtless soon start up an opposition paper.

—David McNabb, proprietor of the heading factory at the junction, sneaked off last Saturday to Cleveland, Ohio, all by "hisself," and he came back Tuesday double; that is to say, he now wears the matrimonial halter and is no longer his own boss.

—Jay Eastman, of the C. O. D. store, is looking for a corn doctor. We would refer him to Dr. Spooner, who, though not a specialist in that line, can "knock the stuffin' out of 'em." He pulled one for us, not long since, in a systematic manner and without pay(n).

—Some of the Garrett boys got on their ear and came down Sunday last to clean up the COURIER establishment, so we are informed. Sorry we were not in, as we're open for all engagements of that kind. Send us a postal next time you hanker for a fracas.

—Miss Jennie McClellan, the young lady who delighted the audience at the commencement exercises, Wednesday evening, by her superb musical treats, both vocal and instrumental, resides in Waterloo, and is a friend of Miss — Stratton, of this city, both being graduates of the musical conservatory of Fort Wayne.—Wabash Courier.

—The boss of the boot up-side down informs us that money is not only "the root of all evil," but it is also the direct agency which furnishes the locomotive power to the female equine quadruped—or words to that effect. We'll accept all the "agency" that runs in on us.

—I. N. Cool, the Ninth-street livery man, is up to his eye-brows in business. He sold a car-load of Cincinnati buggies between Friday noon and Wednesday night, and now hankers for more. They are manufactured by T. T. Haydock, and are made from good material.

—When a man sneaks off to his office and stays two days and nights without going home, with his shirt nearly tore off of him, what would naturally be inferred?—Kendallville Standard.

We can draw but two inferences. He either had the jim-jams, or his other shirt was in the wash.

—Out in the grove last Thursday, at the old settlers' meeting, a youngster from the backwoods, who had lubricated his interior anatomy with a few quarts of "fightin' licker," used his chin too vehemently and got a beautiful 'old settler' on his nasal prominence. He settled.

—The outside of Thursday evening's (we think it was Thursday evening's) Fort Wayne Sentinel, of last week, was printed on Thursday,—nothing strange about that, is there?—but the inside was dated the day before—Wednesday. Mr. "Make-up" must have been out late Wednesday night.

—The baby show at Fort Wayne, last Friday, was a big thing. Every mother expected her kid to lug off the first prize, and as a result there were a numerosity of irate females. The Sentinel says the exercises were agreeably interspersed with music, both instrumental and chin.

—A great many mercantile houses in neighboring towns are advertising and talking about "five-cent counters" and "ten-cent counters." This is all very well to make a display, but most of our merchants here can keep track of their nickels and dimes without the aid of a "counter." The COURIER office can.

—We have about eight hundred subscribers, (besides those that have paid) that will owe us $2.00 each on subscription, on the first of July next. There are many of our subscribers who can pay at one time as well as another, and we would be much obliged to that class if they would favor us now.

—We notice that Johnny Leasure, of Auburn, has acquired the habit of making occasional visits up this way, lately. Why is this thus, John, Jo-John?—Headlight. Stand up, John, if you are not busy—that is, if you are at Leasure—and state to the jury whether or not this grave charge is founded on fact.

—On the day of the old settlers meeting, the COURIER office was favored with some excellent music by the Corunna cornet band, for which the members of that organization have our thanks. Come again gentlemen, walk right into the sanctum and make yourselves at home; you will always be welcome.

—For liberality, Cal Husselman, the milk-man, beats 'em all. He not only furnishes rich milk and first-class dairy butter, at reasonable rates, but donates to his customers plenty of sour milk for culinary purposes, and semi-occasionally "sets up" first rate ice cream, free of charge. Who wouldn't buy milk of Cal?

—Charley Cook, the genial boy who has been in our midst since September last, having been tendered a better position at his home in Tiffin, Ohio, sailed for that point early last Saturday morning. She—or rather, we—will miss his raidant smile in his accustomed haunts, and he will doubtless find it essential to his happiness to make us at least a semi-occasional visit.

—Mr. I. N. Cool left for Cincinnati yesterday to purchase another car-load of fine carriages and buggies, which will be here in a few days. Those wanting good substantial buggies will do well to wait until he arrives. Mr. Cool unloaded a car load last Friday, 16 in number, and they are about all disposed of, which indicates that they take well with the people.

—To kill worms on cabbage, take 8 gallons of soap-suds, 8 ozs. capsicum, 8 ozs. saltpeter. Then dissolve 4 ozs. borax in one pint of warm water and add one pint of coal oil; after the coal oil is cut, mix all together and apply to 300 or 400 plants. The above is highly recommended by a gentleman who has tried it. The same mixture will prevent curculio from injuring plums.

A little boy was told by his grand mother to turn down a leaf in the family Bible every time he told a lie. At the end of the week the old lady asked him how many lies he had told in the seven days. He silently handed her the holy book. She turned over page after page and at length she said angrily: "Why, you little brat, you've lied all the way from Genesis to Revelation, and half way through the Psalms." The boy couldn't help it, for he was the son of a stalwart republican.

—Three maidens (?) from—who knows where?—spent a portion of last Monday in this place, on their way to—give it up again. Two of the la—females were white, to all appearance, and the other was the black sheep of the flock—a full-blown nigger—who seemed to act in the capacity of "foreman" of the gang. They got on a beer bum down at the Saginaw depot and skipped out at 6:50 for the north pole. They were evidently circus women, and were naughty, naughty girls.

—"Times are hard, Mr. Editor, and I must curtail expenses, so you will please discontinue my paper," said a careful and economical farmer recently, and relieved of the awful burden of paying for a newspaper for his family, he went out and invited four of his friends in to take something, two of whom took whisky the same as himself, and the other two took cigars. Expenses 50 cents, or three months subscription.

—Joe. Loveland, of the Head Light thinks that "with 40 bands to draw from at home, the county seat would be compelled to rely on Corunna and other small towns for music, as there is not sufficient musical talent in Auburn to build a first-class band, judging from past efforts in that direction." Now Joe, your Jo-aking again. Auburn proposes to have a band all the same, the musical talent of Corunna, Wa— or Spencerville (beg pardon) "and other SMALL TOWNS," to the contrary notwithstanding.

—The following persons were appointed by L. J. Blair, to serve as assistant marshals at the old settlers meeting, which was held in Auburn last week, viz: Nelson Ulm, Samuel Wasson, Jeremiah Rhodes, John Plather, J. J. Gaunshauser, Samuel Headly, Geo. Egnew, Andrew Casebeer, Samuel Learned, Willard Eddy, John Stearns, Wm. Haynes, J. R. Cosper, Jonathan Boyle, William Smith, Timothy Aldrich, R. G. Coburn, Samuel Long, W. I. Work, Joseph Shrvock, Ira West, J. M. Goetschius, A. Buss, Philip Gushwa, Henry Feagler, Adam Hartle, Alonzo Lockwood.

—An editor who will cast personal slurs, through his publication, on any person against whom he may have some trifling grudge—and an imaginary one, at that,—is a dishonor to the craft. When both parties have access to a newspaper, and carry on an open controversy, personal abuse is certainly disgusting enough; and where the act of one person is a real and not a fancied grievance to another, the latter may be justified in publishing the former, if he gives his reason for so doing; but this is a horse of another color. The case which has inspired these allusions is, as we regard it, a particularly mean one; though the shoe may be put on by whomsoever it fits.

—The business of the First National Bank of Auburn is in a flourishing condition, as will be seen by the quarterly report published in this issue of the COURIER. In comparing the present report with that of last quarter, we find the following:

DEPOSITS	APRIL '79	JUNE '79
Subject to check	$9,853 92	$15,751.85
Demand certificates	4,440.90	7,426.51
Time "	1,900.00	3,100.00
Totals,	$16,194.82	$26,278.36

Showing a total increase of deposits in three months, amounting to $10,083.54. This we consider an excellent showing, considering the difficulties growing out of the Hazzard crookedness.

—The Auburn Courier sighs for a brass band. It says that almost every cross-road town in the country has one and "sweet Auburn" must go to the rear. It won't be "sweet Auburn" during the time the new band does its practicing. A tom-cat fight is softest music, to a new brass band getting ready for its first public appearance.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

We are willing to take our chances on the "tom-cat" melodies, just the same, and we are going to do it; we need not necessarily be bored with the usual discords of a "new brass band," either, for a number of the gentlemen who will constitute the band are already proficient musicians. "Sweet Auburn" is determined to stay in the rear no longer, as regards this band business, and don't allow it to slip your memory for an instant.

MR. EDITOR.—I see by the last Waterloo Press that C. Kelly Baxter is still pursuing his occupation of lying as usual. He intimates that I, as president of the Editorial Association, had the regular session postponed, in order to go to St. Louis, and the man at the head of the Steuben Republican echoes the same in almost the same words. They are a very worthy pair, and it gives as much pleasure to say that they both falsify most egregiously. I was in St. Louis when a request came from the secretary, stating that he was advised to have it postponed, and Bro. Stoll also wrote me to the same effect, and desired me to have it announced officially. I had no desire personally to have it postponed. When Miller, of Angola, learns "the ways that are dark" of C. Kelly Baxter, he will know as much as I do, that C. Kelly Baxter is the biggest liar in four counties.

T. C. MAYS.

The Fort Wayne, Jackson & Saginaw railroad will run special trains on the fourth of July, and carry passengers at half fare. The trains will run as follows:

Henry Waterson denies having received $100,000 for the influence of the Courier-Journal in 1876, in favor of Tilden, and relates the following to show the absurdity of the charge. He says:

"One Sunday night, 'over the Rhine,' in Cincinnati, a little group of newspaper writers and reporters were whiling away the leisure of the happy hours by discussing the problem touching the use which might be made of one hundred thousand dollars, supposing such a miracle should happen to a member of the company. Each mind took the journalistic bent. One would start a morning daily; another would start an evening daily; a third an illustrated paper, and so on. Finally, poor old General Willich stamped the nib of his cigar upon the edge of his mug, and as the ashes sparkled like snow-flakes in the moonlight and the orchestra floated off into the mazes of the 'Beautiful Blue Danube,' says he: 'Wel, oph ever I get un hundret tousand dollars, der newspaper peesnes may go to h—, und I shell chust go to Europe!'"

Token of Respect.

Among the nations of antiquity, an offering of perfumes was regarded as a token of the most profound respect and homage. At the present time, a present of a box of Dr. Price's exquisite odors, would not only be regarded as a token of respect, but enjoyed, to the last drop, with the greatest pleasure.

Stave and Heading Bolts.

John B. Gough on Temperance.

The American Temperance Publishing House, No. 29 Rose Street, New York, has just issued three of Mr. Gough's Lectures on Temperance.—

No. 1. "Our Battle Cry: Total Abstinence."

No. 2. "The Power of Appetite."

No. 3. "The Only Remedy."

In sending out these lectures, this house is doing a great good by giving to the thousands who have never had the pleasure of listening to Mr. Gough's words of eloquence the opportunity of reading them, and to those who have heard him it is unnecessary for us to urge them to send for and circulate them. They are printed in neat pamphlet form of 24 pages each, and contain Mr. Gough's portrait and autograph, which alone are worth the price asked for them. Price, 10 cents each, $1 per dozen. The three lectures are also published in one pamphlet, price 25 cents Address.

Resolution of Respect.

It is with sincere regret that we are called upon to chronicle the death of our beloved teacher, Thomas Johnson, whom it has pleased the Almighty to remove from our midst. By his death we have lost a kind teacher, the neighborhood a good man, his wife a kind husband and his two little children an indulgent father. Therefore,

Resolved, That we, his Sabbath-school associates, will ever pray that the kind God above will be a Husband and Father to his bereaved family.

In the days of useful manhood,
As a flower fresh in bloom,
He, our friend, was taken from us—
Laid within the silent tomb.

But if we would heed God's teachings—
Look afar with trusting heart—
We may hope to meet up yonder,
Where we nevermore will part.

AN OLD LOVE LETTER.

BY OSCEOLA.

The musty sheet before me lies,
With age and usage wore;
But still I trace, with eager breath,
Those lines—the same as yore.

"Your darling," and "I'll be at home
Next Sunday eve at nine,"
Are words as plainly visible
As any on the line.

She was at home, but where was I?
Two thousand miles away,
Writing her to "Pray excuse me,
For I couldn't come that day."

I wrote her a cold, cold letter,
Declaring her false to me;
"That she my name need never lisp,
And me no more she'd see.

"On that chap with a black mustache
Her smiles might all be spent,
And although my heart was breaking,
Time, of course, would heal the rent."

* * * * * * * * *

Twenty long, long years have passed,
And still I love as ever,
But she within her grave doth lie,
Down by the sparkling river.

That fellow with a black mustache—
I judged her wrong, you see—
Was her brother just come home
From a trip across the sea.

And so I sit—an old, old man,
My form with age is bent—
And read again those words of love,
For time ne'er healed the rent.

WHEELER'S RANCHE, IOWA.

THE AMETHYST NECKLACE.

"There, take her out into the sunshine, Jane, my little blue-eyed rosebud!"

She was a 6-months-old baby, with a complexion like peach-blossoms, and golden brown hair, parted away from a pure forehead, where the blue veins shone through the transparent skin like lines of sapphire.

"She is outgrowing that amethyst necklace," continued Mrs. Morgan, thoughtfully; "we must have another link of gold put on."

"Oh, a mother's love! How it softened the fire of those haughty eyes, and turned the proud lines around the mouth to caressing smiles. Mrs. Morgan's fashionable acquaintances would scarcely have known her now, as she watched Jane sauntering out upon the lawn with her infant charge. She was a very handsome woman, dark-eyed and olive-cheeked, with shining curls of raven hair, and a step like a Queen.

"How close it is!" she murmured, half aloud, pushing aside the lace draperies that veiled the wide-open window.

She rose, and, throwing a costly lace mantle over her shoulders, went out into the summer glow of the June afternoon, her fingers between the leaves of the book she had been dreaming over. As she passed the diamond sparkle of a large fountain, whose liquid streams rose into the air with a low, musical murmur, a sudden rustle and footstep startled her.

"A 6-penny-piece, pretty lady—only a six-pence to cross the poor gypsy's hand, and I'll tell you the sweetest fortune that ever fell to mortal lot."

She was a smoke-dried, swarthy-looking old creature, with piercing black eyes, and a sallow skin, half-hidden by the faded scarlet cloak whose hood was twisted round her head. Mrs. Morgan drew her skirts haughtily away from their chance contact with the gypsy's travel-soiled garments.

"Beware, woman!" she said, contemptuously. "We do not tolerate trespassers on the lawn."

"It's only a little I ask, pretty lady; 'tisn't much to the likes of you. Let the old gypsy tell the fortune she sees in that lily-white hand, all sparkling with stones like drops o' dew."

Mrs. Morgan's aristocratic features hardened. She drew back with a gesture of disdain. Then she said, angrily, "If you do not immediately leave me, and cease this importunate clamor, I will summon the attendants to turn you from the grounds."

"Turn me from the grounds!" echoed the hag, while her wrinkled face grew even a shade sallower.

"Yes; and have you lodged in the county jail as a vagrant. I shall not nor will not be annoyed in my own park with the impertinence of a miserable beggar-woman."

"Very well to talk of jail and vagrants, my pretty lady," retorted the gypsy, half-stifled with rage; "but you'd better not anger me, I can tell you! Ay, you may look at me! Look, and look as if you could strike me dead, for there are dark days in store for you. I see it in the glistening spots of your eye and the lines about your rose-red mouth. A time will come when you will wish you had spoken a trifle kinder to the 'miserable beggar-woman.' Remember what I say to you, lady! My words don't often fall to the ground, like the dead leaves off yonder blasted tree!"

Saying which, she vanished through the dense wall of blossoming shrubs. Mrs. Morgan was alone, with a singular thrill, half of superstitious fear, half scorn, at heart.

"Pooh!" she said; "what nonsense, paying attention to an old gypsy's angry vituperation."

Then Mrs. Morgan sat down on a rustic seat, where a spreading linden threw a circle of shade on the grass, and began to read.

Nearly an hour had she been reading, when Jane rushed out from the house, excitedly crying: "Oh, Mrs. Morgan, I have lost her! She's gone! What shall I do—what will become of me!"

"Gone! My baby gone?"

A scream of agony came from the mother's heart. Then she tried to speak, but couldn't. A thousand-pound weight seemed to press her tongue down. The green seemed to sway around her, and she lay motionless on the ground.

"It's just as I've told you," whimpered Jane, as the servants carried the screaming lady into the house. "She wanted to tell my fortin', and said we must have a teacup turned upside down; and when I come back from fetchin' it, they were both gone—the old woman and the blessed baby, which she offered to hold for a minute. It wasn't my fault—I'm sure it wasn't!"

All, all in vain were those months of eager search and keen disappointment—those flattering hopes and sick fears. And years crept by, each one drawing a deeper shadow over the occurrences of the past, and Mrs. Morgan had the certainty at last that she was a childless mother.

* * * * *

The dull December rain-drops were pattering steadily against the window of the close and gloomy room where Madame Severe's half-dozen pallid apprentices were gathered around a long table, heaped with lace and ribbons, and costly dress materials. There was a rustle of stiff silks at the door, and in sailed Madame Severe—a portly, arrogant woman, elaborately rouged, and decorated with much heavy jewelry.

"Nearly finished the lace skirt, Miss Judson?"

"Nearly, ma'am."

"Well, you may leave it for Sarah. And do you immediately go to Mrs. Morgan's, No. 16 Harley street."

Miss Judson looked shrinkingly out at the gusts of rain that drove fiercely against the window, beside which she was working.

"Through all this rain, madame?"

"Certainly," returned the portly dame. "I don't suppose you are going to dissolve for a few drops of rain."

Miss Judson rose timidly, and began to put her worn shawl and bonnet on, while Madame Severe talked only as a garrulous woman can talk.

"You must be very expeditious, Miss Judson. Time is money, you know. Take the measurements accurately—no blunders, mind, for it won't pay to offend Mrs. Morgan. She's among our very best customers. Now, quick about it!"

How keenly the wind blew—how heavily the currents of rain swept against her tender form, rendering all her attempts to keep warm worse than useless. It was small wonder that Anna Judson paused, sick and disheartened, to lean feebly against a lamp-post and take breath, before she was half through her dreary journey. Her eye turned instinctively down the close and narrow street of tumble-down houses opposite, a familiar and well-known location to Anna Judson.

"I must rest a moment," he murmured, and, shivering, leaned her frail weight on the friendly lamp-post.

"I wonder how Mother Hagar is getting on; I'd like to see the poor old creature who ha been so very, very kind to me.

Scarcely had tne thought suggested itself to her mind, before she crossed the street, and was gliding down the desolate and almost deserted purlieus to which she had been accustomed from a child. A few steps, and a dismal alley-way came to view in all its filth and dinginess. She turned into it, and ran hurriedly pp two or three flights of wooden stairs, which led to the very top of an old house. In the corner of a dark, dismal room stood a pallet bed, upon which was stretched a gaunt figure, with saffron-like skin, and matted iron-gray hair.

"Anna!—is it you, darling?" came the feeble voice.

"'Tis I, indeed, Mother Hagar!" responded the child, not without pressing her kind lips on the shriveled forehead of the sick woman. "Are you better to-day, mother?"

"Better!" echoed the hag, with a bitter laugh. "No, child, I never expect to be better any more. I am dying, I tell you!"

"Dying!" and Anna threw herself on her knees beside the pallet bed. "Oh, no, Mother Hagar, don't talk so! It makes me sick to imagine I'm losing the only friend I ever had in the world—the only person who loves me!"

"You are right, so far," said the dying woman, with a low groan, "for I do love you as my own child. But, for all that, you ought not to sorrow much for me; indeed, you wouldn't if you knew the grievous wrong I did you."

"You are light-headed this morning, Mother Hagar," Anna soothingly said.

"Perhaps I am; it don't matter much," the old woman responded, in a feeble voice. "But how does it happen that you are not at work to-day?"

Then Anna spoke of Madame Severe's injunctions, and her intended visit to the house of a Mrs. Morgan, in Harley street.

"Morgan—Mrs. Morgan!" repeated the woman, raising herself on her elbow. "That's strange—very strange that Anna should be going to work at Mrs. Morgan's, and I here on my deathbed. The priests are right—there is a something stronger than fate!"

"Mother Hagar, what are you talking of? I can't understand you this morning."

"Listen, then, child," said the old woman, in quick, convulsive gasps. "You've never been there before; it's a fine house, I've heard. You shall wear the gay gold necklace you have seen me looking at sometimes—the one with the amethyst clasp. It was a baby's necklace once, but it will be a pretty bracelet now for your slender little arm."

And she drew a quaint, old-fashioned ornament from beneath her pillow—a slender chain formed of links of wrought gold, with a superb purple stone blazing on the chased clasp—and fastened it around Anna Judson's wrist.

"But, Mother Hagar," remonstrated the astonished girl, "I ought not to wear this jewel; it is not in keeping with the rest of my dress."

"No matter—no matter! There will come some good from you wearing it. If they ask any questions, say you wore it round your neck when you were a baby."

She sank back, pale and haggard.

"Go, child—go!" she managed to articulate, pressing her hand tightly over her heart. When the door closed, she muttered to herself: "Did I not love the child so well I might take the sweet revenge in my coffin along with me, for I am dying—dying! But wrong enough already have I done her. No one can say that Mother Hagar is not even with the proud lady who would thrust the old gypsy into a prison to rot—ha! ha! Her threat came home to her well!"

Then the old gypsy sank away and died.

* * * * * * *

The fire blazed brightly in Mrs. Morgan's exquisite little dressing-room, where the windows were curtained with folds of cherry damask, and the foot sank half-ankle-deep in the rich, soft carpet. Mrs. Morgan, habited in the deep mourning she had never laid aside since a great life-sorrow shaded her existence, sat in a luxurious chair before the grate, musing over some half-read volume of romance. Close by the window stood another, a handsome brunette, with rosy cheeks and almond-shaped eyes. She was anxiously looking up and down the street, playing with her dark curls rather impatiently.

"Oh, here she comes at last; I thought she would never be here," said the spoiled beauty; and in a minute or two Anna Judson was ushered into the room.

"You are late," said the brunette, petulantly. "I shall certainly inform Madame Severe of your tardiness. But, good gracious, how wet she is! Don't come near me!"

But when Mrs. Morgan saw the frail little creature, her heart melted within her.

"Come to the fire, dear," she kindly said; then to the disdainful brunette, "Bring me a glass of wine, Nellie!"

"Upon my word, Aunt Morgan," said Nellie, shrugging her shoulders and speaking in an audible whisper, as Anna gratefully took the glass of port wine, "you couldn't make any more of that dressmaker girl if she were a Princess."

"My dear," said Mrs. Morgan, in an undertone, "a kind word or deed is but a trifle to us; yet how much good it may do Heaven only knows; and how much evil it may avert! If I had spoken less harsh once—Yet it is useless to repine now."

She looked with gnawing lip into the coral glimmer of the grate. Meanwhile, Anna rose in her quiet way, and began to remove her drenched shawl and bonnet. As the folds of the coarse tartan fell from her arm, the violet sparkle of the amethyst streamed on Mrs. Morgan's eye. With a faint scream, and deadly pallor, she arose.

"Child, where did you get that bracelet?"

The girl looked from Mrs. Morgan's pale face to the gleaming jewel, in mute surprise.

"Aunt Constance, are you mad?" exclaimed the brunette.

"Where did it come from? How did you get it? Speak, or my brain will burst!" reiterated Mrs. Morgan, breathlessly, grasping the little, shivering creature's arm.

"Mother Hagar—that is," stammered Anna, remembering the message of the hag—"it is a necklace I used to wear round my neck when I was a babe."

"Turn—let me see your face!" gasped Mrs. Morgan. "Who are you? Oh! who are you?"

Anna told the brief story of her sad life—how she had been brought up and apprenticed to Madame Severe by an old woman, who was no relative, but whom she had learned to call "Mother Hagar." When she had finished the strange history, Mrs. Morgan folded the weak, weary little seamstress in her arms, murmuring, through happy sobs and hysteric bursts of tears, "My daughter! My own lost love!"

Later in the day, Mrs. Morgan's carriage was drawn up in front of the narrow alley, and the pale lady in black ascended the creaking stairs to Mother Hagar's room. But death, the destroyer, had passed the threshold—of which the reader is aware—and sealed the eyelids into everlasting stillness. Mrs. Morgan was too late.

There, on the narrow pallet-bed, with the cold, gray shadows of the grave drooping over her rigid face, and hands folded on her pulseless breast, lay the grim old gypsy woman, who, years before, foretold the dark days that had so surely come. And the wrought links of the golden necklace, clasped with amethyst, were all that bridged over the great gulf of years that had lain between Mrs. Morgan and her lost child.

Even so slightly gleam the threads of destiny through the warp and woof of our daily life.

The Man from Maine.

A man from Belfast, Me., went down to Boston the other day. There he met an innocent-appearing young man, who called him by name, began glibly inquiring for well-known residents of that place, and put on such an appearance of innocence as to completely deceive the Maine man. The innocent young man professed to be the lucky drawer of a lottery prize, and invited his acquaintance to go with him while he got the money. The young man led the way to a room in the alley-way leading from Court street to Cornhill. Having secured the prize, the young fellow commenced to gamble with his money, and soon induced the Belfast man to loan him considerable money on bank checks which he drew. The game was worked so smoothly and plausibly that several hundred dollars of the Maine man's cash was transferred to the lottery-dealer's till, the till being at last closed and the money declared forfeited. The Belfast man, being a man of nerve, proceeded to knock down the lottery dealer, wrench open the drawer, and transfer the contents to his pocket. A confederate, who came to the rescue, was also knocked down. The Belfast man then, finding the door fastened from the outside, kicked it open and gained the street. During the day he met the innocent-looking young man, to whom he returned the amount that he had staked and lost, retaining $70 in excess of his disbursements, found among the funds he had clutched. This he took home with him to Maine, and has safely invested it.

Didn't Know It Was Loaded.

At Burrillville, R. I., Alonzo Anthony was fatally shot by James Driscoll, who "did not know the pistol was loaded, and snapped the cap, holding the weapon at the man's head, intending to frighten him." At Ridgeway, Ill., Mason Evans "supposed that an old pistol was unloaded, and, pointing it at his wife, pulled the trigger, shooting her through the head." At Norwich, N. Y., William J. Hopewell "took down a broken musket, believing it empty, and was horrified when it was discharged, killing his sister."

TYPICAL OCCURRENCES.

TWO CINCINNATI brothers began to spar playfully. One forgot that he held an open knife in his hand, and a blow severed the other's jugular vein.

"OH, you can't shoot," said a man tauntingly to a 10-year-old boy, who was playing with a gun, in Charleston. The boy thereupon shot the man through the heart.

GEORGE HOOVER, of Millville, Ind., married a second wife within six months after the death of his first. The Dunkard church, in which he was an elder, deemed his precipitancy a serious offense, and expelled him. The punishment had so great an effect on him that he has become insane.

AS MRS. HONORA LACY was driving from Wilmington, Del., to her home, in Chester county, Pa., the contents of the carriage, cotton and straw, were ignited by a match, and instantly the whole interior of the vehicle was in a blaze. The horses were frightened and ran away, and before they stopped Mrs. Lacy was literally roasted alive.

THE courtship of Miss Allen, by Adam Wilkerson, at Marshall, Tex., was distasteful to her family, and the task of driving the suitor away was assigned to her brother. Allen walked into the room where the loving couple were sitting, pointed a pistol at Wilkerson, and told him to get out. Wilkerson drew a pistol and declared his intention to stay. The firing was simultaneous, and Allen was killed.

A WOMAN in Los Angeles, Cal., became possessed of the notion that her little girl might, by slow starvation, be brought to such a physical condition that she would be translated to the spirit world without dying. With that end in view she fed the child on fruit only, steadily diminishing the quantity until the victim was horribly emaciated. Neighbors then interfered, much to the displeasure of the mother, who declared that the little one had reached a point where visions of spirit-life betokened the nearness of the expected change.

AS SHERIFF LUND, of Valencia county, New Mexico, was conveying to Santa Fe a desperado named Romula Baca, guilty of thirteen, and just convicted of two murders, in an open mail coach containing the Sheriff, prisoner, one passenger and the driver, Baca, sitting hand-cuffed on the rear seat, dexterously removing the cuffs, suddenly seized a pistol and bowie-knife in the Sheriff's belt, shot the driver dead, cut the Sheriff and passenger so as to disable them, and drove off with the coach team, mail and baggage.

MOYERS had just completed a prayer in a Methodist meeting at Parkersburg, Va., when a messenger told him that Galvin and Andrews wanted to see him outside of the church. He went out, and renewed an old quarrel with the two men. They proposed a fight, and Moyers agreed, stipulating that he should encounter only one at a time. The trio went to a field near by, followed by the whole congregation, and the struggle was begun by Moyers and Andrews. While they were fighting, Galvin sneaked behind Moyers and stabbed him fatally. Galvin narrowly escaped lynching.

ABOUT the 10th of December last a young man, son of a professor in the gymnasium at Darmstadt, in Germany, walked with his betrothed, a young and pretty girl, to a pond some two miles off in the adjoining woods; there they tied themselves together and jumped in, intending to end their troubles in suicide; however, the icy-cold water brought the gentleman to his senses, and he contrived to free himself and scramble out, leaving the poor girl, in spite of her cries, to drown, which she did. He was recently tried and sentenced to three years and nine months' imprisonment for the offense.

SOME roguish boys were playing "tick-tack" on the front door of Lawyer O. K. Chance's house, in Monticello, Minn. Mr. Chance pricked his ears, seized his revolver and ran out into the street in his night clothes, firing a hot shot at what he took to be his annoyers. The shot passed through the right arm of Miss Lizzie Hitten and lodged in her breast. Miss Hitten, an estimable young lady, sank into the arms of her escort, while Chance—who'll probably find himself anything but O. K. hereafter—went growling off to bed. In the morning he was aroused by the Sheriff, who invited him to step around and await the result of the young woman's injuries.

THE failure of a jury to convict the Yoakum brothers of murder, at Bakersfield, Cal., displeased the populace. A mob broke into the jail at night, and one of the prisoners was quickly hanged to the bars of his cell, a noose being thrown over his head, and the rope through the grating. Then the lynchers went to the other's cell door, and found that he was fettered to the floor. As they were unable to enter, they tried to lassoo him, as they had done with his brother, and then choke him to death by pulling at the rope; but he dodged the noose successfully. So they killed him with their revolvers, firing so recklessly that two of their own number were accidentally wounded.

A COUPLE stopped at Richmond, R. I., to get married. They were met at the railway station by a clergyman, to whose house they had intended to go, but it was found that only five minutes remained before the train that they wanted to take would be due. They decided to have the ceremony performed right there. Time was expended in making out the papers, and the station master shouted "Only one minute left!" before the tying of the knot had commenced. "Stand up, quick," said the minister. Then the whistle of the approaching locomotive was heard. "You take each other for better or worse?" the minister cried. "I pronounce you man and wife." The train dashed up, and the man and wife jumped aboard.

LONDON papers say that Prince Bismarck is declining in reputation and rapidly decaying in physique, corpulence rendering his huge form more unwieldy than ever. Puffy and unhealthy is the look of his flesh. No Kissingen can avail against that enormous appetite, which consumes largely of everything, but especially of bread, cheese and beer.

THE 6:28 TRAIN.

BY BOB BURDETTE.

It was during the reign of the good Caliph, when Abou Tamerlik came to the city of Bagdad, threw his grip-sack on the counter, and, as he registered, spoke cheerfully unto the clerk, saying:

"A sample-room on the first floor, and send my keyster up right away, and call me for the 6:28 train east in the morning."

And Basler el Jab, the clerk, looked at him, but went away to the mirror and gazed at his new diamond.

And Abou Tamerlik hied him forth and went into the booths and bazars and laid hold upon the merchants, and enticed them into his room, and spread out his samples, and besought them to buy. And when night was come he slept. Because, he said, it is a dead town, and there is no place to go.

And, before the second watch of the night, Rhumul em Uhp, the porter, smote on the panels of the door and cried aloud:

"Oh, Abou Tamerlik, arise and dress, for it is train time."

And Abou arose, and girt his raiment about him, and hastened down stairs, and crept into the 'bus.

And he marveled that he was so sleepy, because he knew he went to bed exceedingly early and marvelously sober.

And, when they got to the depot, lo! it was the mail west, and it was 10:25 p. m.

And Abou Tamerlik swore and reached for the porter that he might smite him, and he said unto him:

"Carry me back to my own room, and see that thou call me at 6:28 a. m., or thou diest."

And ere he had been asleep even until the midnight-watch, Rhumul em Uhp smote again upon the panel of his door, and cried aloud:

"Awake, Abou Tamerlik, for the time waneth, and the train stayeth for no man. Awake and haste, for slumber overtook thy servant, and the way is long and the 'bus gone!"

And Abou Tamerlik rose and dressed and girded up his loins, and set forth with great speed, for his heart was anxious. Nevertheless, he gave Rhumul em Uhp a quarter, and made him carry his grip, and he cursed him for a driveling laggard.

And, when he was come to the train, it was 11:46 p. m., and it was a way-freight going south.

And Abou Tamerlik fell upon Rhumul em Uhp, and smote him, and treated him roughly, and said:

"O pale-gray ass of all asses, the Prophet pity thee if thou callest me once more before the 6:28 a. m. east."

And he gat him into his bed.

Now, when sleep fell heavily upon Abou Tamerlik, for he was sore discouraged, Rhumul em Uhp kicked fiercely against the panels of his door, and said:

"O Abou Tamerlik, the drummah, awake and dress with all speed. It is night in the valleys, but the day-star shines on the mountains. Truly the train is even now due at the depot, but the 'bus is indeed gone."

And Abou Tamerlik the drummah swore himself awake, and put on his robes, and hastened to the depot, while Rhumul em Uhp the porter went before with a lantern.

For it was pitch dark and raining like a house afire.

And when they reached the depot it was a gravel train going west, and the clock in the steeple tolled 2 a. m.

And Abou Tamerlik fell upon Rhumul em Uhp the porter, and beat him all the way home, and pelted him with mud, and broke his lantern, and cursed him. And he got him to bed and slept.

Now, when Abou Tamerlik awoke the sun was high, and the noise of the street car rattled in the street. And his heart smote him, and he went down stairs, and the clerk said to him:

"O Abou Tamerlik, live in peace. It is too late for breakfast and too early for dinner; nevertheless, it won't make any difference in the bill."

"And Abou Tamerlik the drummah sought Rhumul em Uhp, the porter, and caught him by the beard, and said unto him:

"O chuck el edded pup! [which is 'Thou that sleepest at train-time'] why hast thou forgotten me?"

And Rhumul em Uhp was angry, and said:

"O Abou Tamerlik the drummah, hasty in speech and slow to think, wherefore shouldst thou get up at daybreak, when there is another train goes the same way to-morrow morning?"

But Abou Tamerlik would not hearken unto him, but paid his bill, and hired a team and a man to take him to the next town. And he hired the team at the livery stable, and he cursed the house that he put up at.

Now, the livery stable belonged to the landlord, all the same. But Abou Tamerlik the drummah wist not that it was so.

No Smoking in Here.

"You can't smoke in here," said a John street conductor to a countryman, who was pulling away vigorously at a 5-cent cigar in a car half full of ladies.

The man didn't seem to hear.

"I say," cried the man of the bell-punch, in a louder key, "if you want to smoke come out here on the platform."

"All right," returned the passenger, and he stepped out. "Didn't think it would hurt nothin'," he said, apologetically; "seein's there ain't any straw in the car to catch fire."

"But there are ladies there."

"Oh, yes; didn't think nothin' about that. Might get ashes on their gowns and spile 'em."

"It isn't so much that," explained the conductor, "but ladies object to smoke."

"Well, I didn't ask any of 'em to smoke, did I? They needn't object before they are invited."

"You don't understand. Smoking is disagreeable to ladies."

"Best reason in the world why they shouldn't practice it. Catch me smoking if it was disagreeable to me!" And he tranquilly puffed away at his 5-center."—Cincinnati Saturday Night.

A FACE AGAINST THE WINDOW-PANE

BY HATTIE E. S. CRESSY.

In a time-worn cottage over the way,
Both in sunshine and in rain,
One may see a maiden's face
Pressed against the window-pane,
Watching,
Oh, so dolefully watching,
For a glimpse of her loved one's form again,
Who, three long, weary summers ago,
Left her to cross the billowy main.

Pale,
Yes, paler grows
This lovely rose,
For her heart is breaking yearly.
Never a word
Has she heard
From the one she loves so dearly.

Other lovers have hoped and wooed in vain,
For the maiden's heart is on the main,
And she knows no emotion, save that of pain,
Since her heart's own lover comes not again

Still there quivers the faintest hope,
Deep, deep down within her heart,
That she'll yet meet her love again,
No more to part,
And still out through the window pane
She looks, but oh! she looks in vain.

"I'd forget him, dear lady;
He's not worthy of thee;
His heart's as deceitful
As his pet, the sea;
I have just returned
From the sea, lady mine;
Thy lover is married,
And lives on the Rhine."

These words were sung
'Neath her window, one night;
But long 'ere it was light—
'Ere Sol had hung
His lantern in the sky—
This maiden of the weeping eye
Was gazing through the window pane,
Toward the dark and restless main
Again!

Threatened Extermination of the Wild Pigeon.

Sportsmen are waking up to the fact that the indiscriminate and wholesale slaughter of pigeons is rapidly thinning out the species. Sporting papers are full of complaints about the manner in which netters and trappers capture and kill the birds at their nestings in Michigan and elsewhere. It is suggested that a law be passed by all States in which the pigeon brings forth its young, prohibiting the killing or trapping of the birds for three years. It is claimed that this would give the flocks a chance to recuperate to such an extent that similar laws would not have to be passed for years afterward. As a substitute for the pigeon during the years that pigeon-destroying is barred, the marsh blackbird is suggested. This bird is very abundant on the Calumet, Kankakee, and Illinois rivers. It is claimed that they are great corn and grain destroyers, and that they could easily be spared. To show the way in which sportsmen themselves massacre pigeons, 14,000 birds have recently been caged for slaughter at Peoria. The Illinois State Sportsman's Association is holding its great annual shoot there this week.—Chicago Journal.

SABBATH READING.

The Blossoming Staff.

A SCANDINAVIAN LEGEND.

The gray old father's task was done.
And forth he went at set of sun—

His task of penance, prayer and fast;
And through the dark stone porch he passed—

Ayliffe, the priest, austerely meek;
His form was bowed, his brow was bleak;

Like February gleams, his glance
Lit up his withered countenance.

His ass he saddled and bestrode,
And down the linden alley rode.

The rosy evening blushed and smiled
From cloudy pillows heavenward piled;

And all the lovely upland lay
Bathed in the soft, warm light of May.

Beauty and peace were everywhere;
The scent of flowers made sweet the air;

And the stern father almost felt
His wintry heart within him melt.

He muttered, "Pleasures are a net
Which Satan for the soul hath set;

"And love and beauty lure to win
The heart of man to deadly sin."

He crossed himself and grimly frowned,
And in his saddle turned half round.

His stout old oaken staff he plied,
And thwacked the ass's sounding hide

He passed the coppice, crossed the ledge,
And rode unto the water's edge.

All in the sunset's mellow gleam
He wound along the winding stream.

Under the ruddy sky it rolled,
A glorious river red as gold.

He paused beside the glimmering brink;
The ass put down his head to drink,

When lo! upon the wave, a bright,
Strange being floated in the light.

Her face was fair, and, round her bare
White shoulders, flowed her amber hair;

Her hand upon a harp she laid,
And, on the water, sat and played

A wild, low, pity-moving strain,
Full of deep yearning and sad pain.

Its tender cadence almost stole
A passage to his secret soul.

"Avaunt, thou water-witch!" cries he;
"Try not thy wicked charm on me!"

She said, "I wield no wicked charm;
I have no power to work thee harm.

"Exiled from heaven, I weep and wait,
A spirit most disconsolate."

"Thou evil one! I know thy race,
Banished forever from God's grace."

She clasped her slender hands in woe:
"O not forever! say not so!

"Here for our sin, with sad desire,
We pine in wood, or flood, or fire,

"Till Christ, in pity, shall restore
Our souls to bliss forevermore."

"To heaven and mercy," said the priest,
"Ye are no more than this poor beast."

"Ah, woe is me! and can it be Christ died for thee, and not for me?"

And Ayliffe answered, cruelly,
"Christ died for me, and not for thee."

He shook his staff; "This rod I hold,
This sapless staff, so dry and old,

"With fresh young leaves shall bud and bloom
Ere you in God's great heaven find room."

Then far away her harp she flung,
Despairingly her hands she wrung,

Bowed low her sorrowing heart, and swept
Her long hair in the wave and wept.

Ayliffe the withered staff upraised
His beast to smite, when (God be praised!)

A pitying angel stooped unseen,
And touched the rod, that it grew green.

Like boughs in springtime thrilled with heat,
It put forth blossoms fresh and sweet.

His bosom shook with sudden fears;
It froze with awe, it thawed to tears.

And straightway from his withered heart
Young buds of love began to start,

And pity's gracious blossoming,
As when the woods are warm in spring.

And Ayliffe went. "Behold," he said,
"God hath rebuked my sinful pride!

"By this green token thou mayst see
Our Savior died for thee and me."

Then joyfully the river maid
Took up her golden harp and played.

Solemn and soft its music rang,
And all night long she sweetly sang:

Sang in her starry solitude,
"Oh Christ is dear! Oh God is good!"

I know that Ayliffe joyed to hear,
"Oh God is good! Oh Christ is dear!"

His staff he planted by the river,
To bloom and blossom green forever.

Deep in the sands it rooted stands;
Aloft its leafy top expands.

Now nightly those who tread that shore
Strange music hear, and evermore

The whispering boughs this truth recall,
That Heaven's great love incloses all.

Moody's Opinion.

Mr. Moody is satisfied that tabernacle work outside the churches in the large cities is a mistake, since it has often happened in his experience that the converts have not attached themselves to any church. It is better, he believes, to address small audiences in the churches where the results of his work will be more certain to remain. Mr. Moody will pass the coming summer at Northfield, and early in the autumn will go to St. Louis, where he will remain six months, having the aid of Mr. Sankey, who returns from England. Mr. Moody was recently in Boston, and at a reunion of Christians he said if he understood this Christian life it was a battle. He had been in the fight twenty-four years. He started with the idea that after he was converted all he had to do was to fold his arms and "float right along into heaven." But he soon found that the Old Man was not dead in him; that the flesh still lived, and that the world and the devil were yet alive. From his experience and from careful reading of the Bible he had learned that when a person is converted he has only enlisted; the weary marches, the hard fights, the wilderness, the deserts, and the mountains are all before him.—New York Tribune.

The Scarred Face.

When I was crossing one of the mountains of California last summer, in a stage-coach, the driver said to me, "Pretty soon we will see 'Mountain Charley.' He is generally about the door of his cabin when the stage goes by."

In a few minutes we came to a small house in the forest, and in the dooryard stood a rough frontiersman, whose eyes and face were so disfigured that they presented a terrible appearance. Mountain Charley (as the people call him) had a fight with a grizzly bear many years ago. The poor man will carry the scars of that terrible fight to his dying day.

As I looked at the marks of the bear's claws on Mountain Charley's countenance, I thought how sin in the same manner leaves its scar upon a person's character. For example, a boy is detected in telling a lie. He is very sorry for it, and begs his parents to forgive him. He asks God to forgive him, too, but for a good while there is not the same confidence in that boy's word that there had been before. He still carries for some time the scar of that falsehood.

I knew a young man, who, under strong temptation, helped himself to some of his employer's money. Bitterly he suffered for his sin against God's commandment. Probably he has never touched a single dime dishonestly since he repented of that first transgression, yet he brought on himself great shame and suffering. His character got an ugly scar which will require many years for him to outgrow.

Rev. Dr. M—— was an excellent and useful minister, but in his early life he had injured his health by habits of licentiousness. God's grace made Dr. M—— an instrument of great good to others, but it did not get the bad effects of early sin out of his bodily constitution. He carried the scar until the last day of his life.

These cases and many more I might name are warnings to the young. Sin is a ferocious "beast of prey." If sin does not destroy the character and the soul outright, it maims the transgressor, and leaves a terrible scar. King David was once tempted to sin, and fell. The 51st Psalm shows the bruises of that fall. Joseph was also tempted. He stood true to conscience and to God, and we discover no scar of wrong-doing on his noble and beautiful character.—Rev. Theodore L. Cuyler.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

UNCLE SAM has paid $535,368,727 in pensions since he went into business, $355,480,664 of the amount being on account of the last war.

NEW HAMPSHIRE'S manufactures last year amounted to over $96,000,000, among them being $30,588,500 worth of cotton goods, $11,709,000 of boots and shoes, and $9,222,000 of woolens.

THE average salary of Methodist ministers in fourteen Southern conferences is said to be $572, and the average amount paid $438. In Northern conferences the average is $700, and the deficiency in payments about 12 per cent.

THE yield of petroleum from the Pennsylvania oil fields during March and April was 25 per cent. greater than during the corresponding months last year, and about three times as great as seven years ago. It has now reached 1,500,000 barrels a month, a daily average of 50,000 barrels.

THE returns of emigration from the Mersey during the month of April show an enormous increase. It appears that 65 vessels left the Mersey with 10,917 passengers, of whom 5,348 were English, 58 Scotch, 1,546 Irish, 3,809 foreigners, and 156 whose nationalities were not known. Their destinations were 8,931 to the United States, 1,723 to British North America, 48 to Australia, 110 to South America, 39 to the East Indies, 12 to the West Indies, 9 to China, and 44 to the west coast of Africa.

THE French savans have been calculating the probable business to be transacted through the Panama canal when completed. M. Levaseur puts it at 5,000,000 tons annually at present, and that it will be 7,250,000 by 1897. M. Cerisole puts the amount at 6,000,000 tons, and computes at $3 per ton, $18,000,000 revenue from tolls. The two statisticians estimate the value of the tonnage at $260,000,000, and $360,000,000 for the United States, and that it will gain one-quarter of European trade with China, Japan and Oceanica. The Suez canal was opened at the close of 1860; in 1871 but 765 vessels passed through, making gross receipts to the amount of $1,830,455; in 1874 the vessels had increased to 1,264, of 2,421,803 tons. The expectations for the American route are double the amount realized by the African after it had been some time in use.

Germans on Thrones.

During the last fifty years, the St. Petersburg Gazette remarks, all the newly created thrones in Europe, or those in which the male hereditary succession had from any cause lapsed, have been filled by Princes of German dynasties. A Prince of the house of Saxe-Coburg was elected ruler of the newly formed kingdom of Belgium, after he had shortly before refused the title of King of the Hellenes, which had been offered him. Princes of the same house married the Queen of Portugal, Maria II. da Gloria, in the year 1836, and Victoria, Queen of England, in the year 1840, and their sons have become the heirs to the thrones of those states. All attempts to fill the thrones of Spain and Roumania with rulers not proceeding from German dynasties have proved a failure. Both King Amadeus, of Savoy, and Prince Couza, a born Roumanian, were after a brief period of rule, compelled to leave the countries of which they had become the sovereigns. The throne of Greece was first occupied by a Prince of the Bavarian dynasty, Otto I.; and after his dethronement by George I., a Prince of the Schleswig-Holstein-Senderburg-Glucksburg line. The present ruler of Roumania is a Prince of the house of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, and the new Prince of Bulgaria is also of German origin. Fifty years ago the privilege of filling vacant or newly created thrones belonged almost exclusively to France and Austria; several thrones in Italy were held by Bourbons and Hapsburgs only twenty years ago. The Gazette adds that it must be admitted that the German Princes have understood their mission in the countries which they were called upon to rule better then the Bourbons and the Hapsburgs, as is shown by the histories of King Leopold of Belgium, Ferdinand of Portugal, Prince Albert, King George of Greece, and Prince Charles of Roumania.

THE LATE GEN. SHIELDS.

Interesting Reminiscences of the Old Veteran.

Gen. Shields once had a difficulty with Abraham Lincoln, which resulted in preparations for a duel. Shortly after his return from the Mexican war, a newspaper in Illinois, where he lived, published an article that displeased him very much. He called upon the editor, and said it was offensive, and insisted upon knowing the name of the author. The editor asked time to consider, and meanwhile consulted Mr. Lincoln, informing him that the writer of the article was a young woman. "Oh, I'll settle that," said Lincoln. "Tell Shields I am personally responsible for it."

This was enough for Shields, and he immediately challenged Lincoln to mortal combat. Broadswords were chosen as the weapons most likely to place them on an equal footing. The proceedings were conducted with great secrecy, and, in order to have the amusement to themselves a brushwood copse was chosen for the encounter. But friends had followed unobserved, and came up in time to catch the belligerents in the act of clearing a space for the fight by hewing down the brushwood with their swords. The ludicrousness of the thing was soon made apparent, and the affair ended in good humor.

There was a great deal that was good in Shields. He was downright. He sympathized with Irish liberty, though he came to this country when 9 years of age. He was not drawn into any of the military movements against England, because he looked upon them with the vision of a practical soldier. He wanted to see clearly more possibility of success than was ever made apparent to him. He was approached unsuccessfully for the purpose of getting his aid in several movements, the result of which proved the excellence of his judgment. Yet his military education, aside from that he got in the wars, was self-education. He never attended any military school.

He was fond of telling how he got the nine bullets that he carried in his body from the battles of Cerro Gordo and Chepultepec. The doctors, in order to clean the wounds, passed a handkerchief clear through his body.

He used to tell a story of a forlorn hope that he led during the Mexican war in order to relieve some English ladies, who were suffering privation and indignities in the City of Mexico. With a small company of kindred spirits, he penetrated to the heart of the city and released the sufferers, who were quartered in the American camp until the city was taken, and they were restored to their homes. Gen. Scott reprimanded him for this, but in such a slight way that it did not prevent his promotion.

Early in the late war, Gen. Shields' friends sought to raise an Irish brigade for him. Chief Justice Daly and others were foremost in bringing him out and organizing the brigade. He arrived late from California, with the understanding that he was to be given the command. Meanwhile Thomas Francis Meagher had been acting as General, and, although he gave Gen. Shields a grand dinner and reception, showed no disposition to give up the command. Shields was much disappointed, and by no means appeased with the command of a brigade under Banks, that was given him. He gained, however, the credit of winning about the only battle credited to Banks—the battle of Winchester. He had a pet project of capturing Stonewall Jackson, but complained bitterly that, just as his plans were about maturing, he was ordered, by Gen. McDowell, to retreat.

Gen. Shields was five feet eight inches in height, of compact build, and in his youth had dark hair. His eyes were dark and piercing, and gave him a wild look to strangers. He was very attentive to women, and fond of paying them compliments. He made long visits to friends in New York and throughout the country. He was once dining at the house of a prominent citizen of New York, whose wife, a member of a staid old Dutch family, did not relish Gen. Shields' reticence about his domestic relations. She took occasion to speak out bluntly on one occasion, proposing "the health of Gen. Shields and his wife." Some of his military associates present were quite surprised to learn that he was married, but the good matron carried her point, and in this semi-public way took the opportunity to warn some of her maiden lady friends not to lose their hearts. Gen. Shields leaves a wife and family at Carrollton, Mo. One son is 19.

He was a man of great physical endurance, and yet did not seem to take care of himself. He would eat and drink almost anything, and work as long as there was work to do. As a conversationalist he was a marvel. He seemed to remember everything he ever read. He was fond of Burns, and was born sufficiently far north in Ireland to have some of the air of Scotland wafted over to him. He had no petty national feeling that would prevent his admiring a poet of another nationality.

Swimming Extraordinary.

The six days' swimming contest at the Lambeth Baths, London, was brought to a conclusion on the night of the 24th of May (Saturday), at half-past 10 o'clock. It resulted in the victory of the channel hero, Capt. Webb, who succeeded in swimming altogether a total distance of seventy-four miles. Webb's performance must be regarded as a remarkable one, and another exemplification of the extraordinary power he possesses of being able to stay in water longer at a time than any other living swimmer. On the first two days he remained in the water fourteen hours each day; on the third and fourth days he averaged a little under thirteen hours; on Friday he took but little rest, and on Saturday he was in the water from half-past 11 in the morning until half-past 11 at night. No changes took place during Saturday in the position of the swimmers. Webb swam on quietly during the day, and Fearne, the only man able to make the semblance of a struggle with him, was too far behind to cause any interest to be taken in his exertions. A bouquet was given to Webb in the water, and at the termination of the proceedings he was presented with a medal. The following was the final record of the full distance performed by each man: Webb, seventy-four miles; Fearne, sixty-two miles thirty lengths; Beckwith, forty-two miles twelve lengths; Taylor, twenty-six miles eight lengths; Rowbottam (retired early in the week), ten miles.

HOME DOCTOR.

DRINK cayenne-pepper tea for a cold.

MAY-WEED blossoms, put into alcohol, make a superior liniment.

IN cases of ivy poisoning, bathe the parts with sweet spirits of niter.

RUB sprains, bruises or lameness with a paste made of salt and the white of an egg.

FOR burns, bind on moistened baking soda. It will give prompt and permanent relief.

IVY POISONING.—1. A decoction of the fresh bark of witch hazel (Hamamelis Virginiana), applied as hot as it can be borne, never fails to cure in two or three applications. 2. Take the common smartweed which grows around farmhouses and make strong tea of it; drink it freely, and also bathe the parts afflicted with this tea. 3. One-half ounce of salts of tartar, dissolved in two ounces of water and applied to the affected parts several times daily, will effect a cure.

ESMARCH'S TREATMENT OF CANCER.—Give Fowler's solution, one drop three times a day for three days, then increase the dose by one drop every three days till intolerance of the remedy follows. Apply the following locally: Arsenious acid and muriate morphia, each 0.250 gramme; calomel 2.00 grammes; powdered gum-Arabic, 12.00 grammes; mix. At first sprinkle only a little upon the ulcer, gradually increasing the quantity to a teaspoonful. This overcomes the odor, causes a hard eschar to form, and healthy granulation takes place.

MASTICATION AND DIGESTION.—All know that a lump of ice in a glass of water melts very slowly; but, if divided into pea-sized pieces and stirred round, it is melted with many times greater rapidity, each piece being dissolved from without inwards, and the surface exposed to the water being multifold greater. So it is with the food in the stomach, the juices of which develop for the purpose of reducing it to liquid form, to prepare it for yielding its nourishment to the system; the more numerous the pieces, and the smaller, the greater will be the amount of surface exposure, and the more rapidly will it be dissolved; hence the reason for chewing the food well.

LINIMENT RECEIPES.—1. For a family liniment for general use in all cases where liniment is desired, sprains, boils, sore-throat, headache, earache, etc., etc., take chloroform, iodine, oil of origanum, spirits of ammonia and tincture of opium, equal parts; cork tight, and shake well. 2. One ounce oil sassafras; one ounce oil hemlock; one ounce oil cedar; one ounce camphor gum; two ounces cayenne pepper; one ounce laudanum; three quarts alcohol. To be used where any liniment may be applied. Dose, one to two teaspoonfuls in half-tumbler water. 3. Alcohol, one ounce; spirits turpentine, sulphuric ether, chloroform, laudanum and gum camphor, of each half an ounce; oil of cloves, one-fourth ounce. This liniment is also good for internal pains, as colic, pain in the stomach, etc. Take from ten to thirty drops in sweetened water, and repeat every twenty to thirty minutes until relieved. 4. One egg beaten light, half a pint spirits turpentine, half a pint good apple vinegar. Shake well before using.

AGUE CURE.—A never-failing remedy for ague in the breast is to wear a very small bag filled with alum. It must be worn continually while nursing a child. A neighbor has practiced it for the period of twenty years, and is now nursing the sixth child. After the birth of this last child, she did not at first think of using the alum until reminded of it by her husband one day, when she immediately had a bag made, holding about a large thimbleful of the alum, and attached it to a string, suspended it about her neck, slipping it down next the skin between the breasts. She now washes in cold water, and does all manner of imprudent things, such as hanging up clothes, bare-headed, bare-armed, but has had no return of ague. A number of others to our knowledge have used it with the same good results. This simple remedy is indeed worth being known by the masses of the people, when we consider how much some women suffer with this distressing and sickening complaint.

A Nihilist Outrage.

A Russian merchant has been the victim of one of the most diabolical of Nihilist outrages. Paul Fufajeff received a notice signed by the "Revolutionary Committee," in which a subscription of 40,000 rubles "for the use of the secret National Government" was demanded of him, the sum to be deposited by him at a certain place indicated by the 2d of May at the latest, under penalty of death in case of default. Fufajeff remained undecided whether to pay the money or hand over the anonymous letter to the police. At 10 o'clock on the forenoon of the 2d he went out, and then, for the first time, determined to appeal to the police for advice and assistance. Hardly, however, had he arrived in the neighborhood of the nearest police station when he received a violent blow on the head with an iron bar, which struck him senseless to the ground. The assassin immediately disappeared, taking with him 40,000 rubles which Fufajeff had in his pocket.

MRS. LAWRENCE makes speeches in the streets of Norwich, abusing the clergy and violently assailing Christianity. Her tongue is long and active, and she can always command large audiences.

AN East Saginaw grocer has secured a monopoly of the business in his neighborhood by connecting all the houses with his store by telephone.

FARM AND GARDEN NOTES.

OATMEAL contains nearly 16 per cent. of flesh-forming constituents.

LESS wheat, but three times the area of corn, and twice of oats, has been planted and sown in Colorado this year, compared with last.

"PROF." HENDERSON, of the Rural Farm, requests us to state that he finds lamp-black, applied with a woolen cloth, the very best substance for burnishing the brass or silver-plated mountings of harness.—Rural New Yorker.

IF you have any raspberries, the canes must be tied to the trellis or stakes. The young shoots that are now coming will be next year's bearing canes and should be taken care of; five or six may be left on each strong plant; the rest are superfluous.

RADISHES should now be freely supplied with water, otherwise they will be spongy and unfit to eat. To have a constant supply of this excellent vegetable, sow a short row every week, say every Saturday. They can be grown between the rows of cabbage and other vegetables, but water them freely.

QUASSIA and soft soap is recommended for destroying aphides on roses and other woody plants. It is used by boiling four ounces of quassia chips for half an hour in a gallon of water. When cold and strained, add two more gallons of water and six ounces of soft soap. With this syringe the bushes.

THE man who farms his brains to their full extent year after year, and does not believe in occasional fallowings, will find at last that brains, like land, will run out.—Albany Argus. And the man who farms his land year after year without bringing brain power to his work will find that his land will soon run out.

THE unpretending but sweet little mignonette should be found in every flower-garden. Sow some seed in a pot or box; set the young plants in four-inch pots, one in each, and train them up for window decoration. I have transplanted young plants very successfully in the garden by carefully shading and watering them till they began to grow.

PEAS growing over a foot in height should be supplied with brush on which to climb. Trim each brush with a hatchet into a flattened or fan-shaped form, sharpen the ends so they can easily be stuck in the ground and set a row of brush to each row of peas. In beds of two rows the brush should be set on the outside, the tops leaning a little toward each other.

ATTENTION to little things about the farm, as in any other business, is what increases the profits. Plenty of eggs, a few chickens, a few calves, a colt or two help out wonderfully. If some of the perquisites arising are given to the children for the care bestowed, they will cheerfully help in the garden, and thus another important item is added to the well-being of the family.

TOMATO plants should never be allowed to lie on the ground; they give less and inferior fruit, and it will ripen late if they do. The best way is to train them to a trellis made either of wire or of wooden strips. Every branch should be tied up, and, later, when a quantity of fruit is formed, the tips pinched off; you will then be surprised to see the amount and size of the fruit you can gather from a single plant. In lieu of a trellis, you can use low, spreading brush to raise the plants from the ground, but it is not so efficient.

RECENT analysis at the Connecticut Experiment Station of about a dozen different specimens of corn-fodder, cut at different periods, give the highest amount of albuminoids to that cut Aug. 9, of carbo-hydrates to that cut Sept. 25, and the highest digestible ratio to a sample that was harvested in 1877. Analysis shows a much larger percentage of ash in sweet corn than in the ordinary field varieties, which confirmed the general opinion that it is much more exhaustive than common field corn. As the stalk increases in age, its feeding value diminishes.—American Cultivator.

THE use of salt in the care of farm animals seems to aid an economical digestion, and assists assimilation of the requisite normal amount of food; while it is also believed that it makes the flesh harder and gives the animal functions a more regular and healthy action. In England the average daily allowance of salt is for calves one ounce per day, 1-year-old animals three ounces, fattening oxen six ounces, and milch cows four ounces. Sheep, it is said, will never stray from inclosures where salt is kept for their constant use, provided, of course, running water is also found in the pasture.

ANY plants with soft, large, or hairy leaves are good absorbers, and are supposed to ward off malaria. The probability, however, is that, as a rule, such plants absorb much moisture by the roots, and give off much oxygen to the air, and hence they act in a two-fold manner—take up the moisture from wet soils, and thereby prevent much evaporation at the surface. Among trees the willow is a good example of the power of absorption; so is the cottonwood. Nothing will grow near them, from the fact that their network of roots ramify the soil to a great distance, and prevent small plants from getting a due supply. An instance is given in the Journal of Forestry, England, where a bog in South Wales, not only useless, but dangerous, was reclaimed by planting it with black (Italian) poplar. The roots ramifying the ground is said to have allowed the water to precolate the clay, and the bog was naturally drained.

How They Ran.

Old Skinner is a great lover of war reminiscences, and is not slow to tell of his own exploits in that way. As with most men, who pride themselves on a war record, Skinner also gives the best side of his tales to his own army. He was telling one of his grandchildren recently of a famous battle in which he was engaged. His description of the flying balls, booming of cannon, and charge of the troops was very vivid, and the little boy listened with increased interest. At last, when Skinner stopped to fill his pipe, the little boy asked:

"And did the enemy run?"

"Did they run?" said Skinner. "Great Scott, how they did run! My dear boy, they ran so like thunder that we ran three miles to keep out of their way, an', if we hadn't thrown our guns away, they'd have run over us, sure."—Oil City Derrick.

THE WORLD OF BUSINESS.

THE wheat of Texas has been mostly harvested, and the yield is good.

EVERY mill in Rhode Island, with the exception of that owned by the Atlantic Delaine Company, is running on full time. That one will be started soon.

VERY few men are idle in Massachusetts now. In some of the smaller cities and larger towns it is said that it is even difficult to find mechanics for small jobs, and that skilled workmen are in some places really scarce.

PEACHES are likely to be a light crop this season over the West and South. The record shows that Texas bids fair for a crop in some sections, but the distance and express charges are likely to make them costly North this year.

IN Connecticut many of the largest factories are employing more men than for several years, and some are running over-time. There is a good demand for skilled labor at fair prices, and good, steady workmen are not found idle.

IT is stated that within the last eight months some fourteen joint-stock companies have been formed in the United States and Canada for the manufacture of sugar from beets. The satisfactory success of the Maine company has given an impetus to this particular industry.

THE Lebanon (Pa.) Times says long trains of African ore have recently been taken over the Lebanon Valley railroad. Sixty thousand tons of iron ore have been imported lately from the North of Africa for making Bessemer steel. It came as ballast, and can, therefore, compete in price with that mined in Pennsylvania. It contains more phosphorus than the iron ores of this country and Europe, and is better for steel manufacture.

THE mining and manufacturing enterprises of the Lackawanna valley, Pennsylvania, are usually active, although wages rate low. The great works of the Lackawanna Iron and Coal Company, at Scranton, are running night and day, in full blast; turning out steel to fill orders from all parts of the United States. Last week the company advanced the wages of its laborers 10 cents a day, and cash payments are promptly made monthly.

MORE people are now employed in the mills of Paterson, N. J., than ever before. The greatest expansion is in the silk industry. To-day there are in Paterson not less than 500 looms owned by practical weavers, and operated under their immediate supervision in rooms, garrets and sheds, and every place where a loom can be worked. Whole families thus find employment in their own homes; the men do the most difficult part, and the women and children assist. The price of labor in the town has advanced, and common laborers are scarce at $1.25 a day.

Sergt. Hoff.

During the siege of Paris there was nobody more popular, and afterwards there was nobody more unpopular than Sergt. Hoff. He with his own hand slew twenty-seven Germans during the first six weeks of the siege. His gallantry was rewarded by praise lavished in his regimental order of the day and in a general order of the day, and the Legion of Honor was bestowed on him. The Minister of War told him it was very important that a dispatch should reach Marshal Bazaine, and offered him $4,000 to undertake the mission. It was perilous. He staked his head on success. It was easier for him than for many Frenchmen—he was an Alsatian and spoke German well. He said to the Minister of War: "I accept the mission, but I refuse the money." Howl after howl of indignation went up when it was found Sergt. Hoff had disappeared. It was said that he had always been a Prussian spy, and was now a traitor. The Government gave the key-note to these howls to save Hoff's life if he was discovered as he passed through the enemy's lines. He safely reached Bazaine. The war over he was made keeper of Vendome column. The keeper of the Triumphal arch died the other day, and Sergt. Hoff, to the delight of the Parisians, has been appointed to the vacant place.

Experiments with Roosters.

Dr. P. G. C. Hunt, the dentist, has been experimenting in tooth-grafting. Two weeks ago he took a couple of robust chanticleers and inserted in each of their combs a human tooth of the bicuspid variety, and to-day the teeth are as firmly imbedded in the combs as if they had grown there. A chicken-fancier who saw the fowls desired to buy them of the doctor, being under the impression that the birds were of a new strain. To secure their growth it was necessary to remove the nerves and fill the orifices in the teeth.—Indianapolis News.

Insanity and Matrimony.

A remarkable breach-of-promise case has been tried in London. Mr. Jackson contracted to marry Miss Paris. Subsequently he became insane, whereupon Miss Paris sued him for not marrying her, and has actually recovered $250. The Lord Chief Baron ruled that the action could be maintained, and that the defendant's lunacy did not make a bit of difference. It was argued that, so far from being incapacitated for marriage by his lunacy, he all the more needed a wife to take care of him.

THE Italians propose to cap the climax of centennial celebrations next November by commemorating the 1,800th anniversary of the destruction of Pompeii and Herculaneum.

Desperate Conflict With a Circus "Advance Agent"—Heroic Conduct of a Gallant Reporter.

(Virginia City Chronicle.)

Yesterday afternoon a dapper little man, with a two-ounce cane and a half-pound cluster diamond pin, came into the Chronicle office and asked if the amusement reporter was in. When the man he sought was pointed out the stranger grasped him warmly by the hand, remarking: "Delighted to meet you, sir—really, I am. I've heard of you at every place I've stopped on my way from New York. I had such a curiosity to see you that I got off at Reno and took a run up. But really I had expected to find a much older man, considering the magnificent reputation your dramatic and circus criticisms have given you. All of our boys told me to be sure and see you, if I didn't get abboard of anything else in the town."

"Ah," said the reporter, blushing in four colors, 'I am glad to see you. Might I inquire your name?'

"Well, here's my card," said the little man, handing out a piece of paper about five inches square, 'you may have heard of me before—Clarence DeLacy Slocum, agent of the Sebastian Van Buena Vista Circus and Menagerie. This is by far the hugest combination of gigantic circuses ever put on the road. We started out about five years ago in a small way, with not over 400,000 feet of canvas, only nine tents and scarcely 1,500 animals; but we gradually absorbed all the small-fry shows. They'd go into bankruptcy along the route, and we would buy their outfits. Sebastian, our owner, is the most sympathetic man on earth. He'd buy their little shows and pay double price, just to help the poor devils along. Money is of no account to him. He's traveling simply for pleasure and a desire to see the great West."

"I'd like to know him," remarked the reporter.

"Oh, he knows you—that is, by reputation. He has your picture set in a frame that cost him over $100. He was saying to me one night that whenever business was dull he just took a look at that phiz of yours and it always made him feel as happy as if he was obliged to turn five hundred people away at the door."

"How came he to get hold of my picture?"

"Oh, he begged it of De Murska or Modjeska or Clara Morris—I forget which. She hated like thunder to part with it, but you see he had loaned the great actress $10,000 once in Paris to buy a wardrobe and some jewelry for a new piece, and as the debt was never canceled she couldn't very well refuse. But I just came in to give you a little information about our show. I always like to give a man all the points when I know he possesses the talent to handle them in the right style. Some fellows down at Reno and Carson tried to pump me, but I didn't propose to let a description of my shows be mangled up by scrub writers. Besides, Sebastian telegraphed me from New York last night not to let anybody but you get aboard of the first grand description. Just mention four miles of cages containing wild beasts, with twelve new varieties of elephants and a recently-discovered monster from Africa called the jabberwock, which weighs 3,000 pounds."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, sir! and a man like you, with a fine descriptive ability and inexhaustible command of language which has made you famous in two continents—"

"How many columns do you want?"

"Oh, as many as you please."

"When will the show be here?"

"Perhaps not for two months; it takes such a long time to move the animals that our progress across the country is slow."

"Just so. Well, our figures for big circuses like yours are $150 a column cash down, and thirty per cent. of the gross receipts if the show is a success."

The circus agent seemed greatly affected. "Isn't that rather steep?" he said.

"It would be, berhaps, for a small provincial journal like the New York Herald, or even the London Times, but we circulate such a mammoth edition that the price is comparatively trifling. Fourteen freight cars come up every day with paper for our edition, which is worked off on five big Walter presses, lightning geared. Our expense for steam alone, sir, is $2,000 a day. We have more carriers than you could pack into your largest tent. Our Eastern circulation has been increasing at the rate of a thousand a day for the last two years. By simply cutting down the size of the paper an eighth of an inch our proprietor has saved enough to build four school-houses worth forty thousand dollars each, and endowed an orphan asylum in each county in the state. He doesn't run the paper for money, but just simply for his health and because he likes the country. Our mailing and folding machinery would remind you of the Risdon iron-works."

"Is it in this building?"

"Oh, no; this is simply the branch office—the place where we write up circuses. Our principal establishment—"

The circus agent groaned as if in agony and fled from the office.

Fashion's Prayer.

Kind fortune, may thi mersys endure forever; smile thou out ov thi loving eyes upon this fine bust ov mine.

Strengthen mi husband, and may hiz faith and hiz money hold out to the last.

Draw the lamb's wool ov unsuspicious twilight over hiz eyes, that mi flirtashuns may look to him like viktories and that mi bills may strengthen his pride in me.

Bless, oh! Fortune, my crimps, rats, and frizzles, and let thi glory shine upon mi paint and powder.

When i walk out before the gaze ot vulgar man, regulate mi wiggle and add new grace tew mi gaiters.

Bless all dri goods clerks, milliners, manty-makers, and hair frizzers, and give immortality to Lubin and heirs and assighns forever.

Lend me bi the side of colone waters and fatten mi calves upon the bran ov thy love.

Blister, oh! Fortune, with the heat ov thi wrath the man who treads upon the trail ov mi garments.

Take mi two children oph from mi hands, for they bother me; and take them to be thy children and bring them up to suit thyself.

When i bow miself in worship, grant that i may do it with ravishing elegance, and preserve unto the last the lily white ov mi flesh and the taper ov mi fingers.

Smile thou graciously, oh! Fortune, upon mi nu silk dress, now in the hands ov the manty-maker, and may it fit me all over like unto as the duck's foot fitteth the mud.

Destroy mine enemys with the gaul ov jealousy and eat thoum up with the teeth ov envy all thoze who gaze at mi style.

Save me from wrinkles and foster mi plumpness.

Fill both mi eyes, oh! Fortune, with the plaintive pizon ov infatuashun, that i may lay out mi viktims, the men, as knumb as images graven.

Let the lily and the rose strive together in mi cheek, and may mi nek swim like a goose on the buzzum ov krystal waters.

Enable me, oh! Fortune, to wear shoes still a little smaller, and save me from all korns and bunyons.

Bless Fanny mi lap dog, and rain bezom ov destrukshun upon thoze who would hurt a hair ov Hektor, mi kitten.

Remove far from me all the wails of the sorrowful, and shield mi sensitiff nature from the klamoors ov the widder and the rank necessity of the orphan.

Smile, oh! Fortune, most sweetly upon Dick, mi kanary, and watch over, with the fondness ov a mother, mi two lily white mice, with red eyes.

Enable the poor to shirk for themselfs, and save me from all missionary beggars.

Shed the light ov thi countenance on mi kammel's-hair shawl, mi lavender silk, mi point lace, and mi neklace ov diamonds, and keep the moths out ov mi sables, I beseech the.

Give me strength, I pray thee, to endure the sight ov young Dobbin's six-in-hand turn out, and smite with thi wrath all the snobs ov the period.

I have always been a friend to thee, oh Fortune, therefore bless me forever and ever.—Billings.

Lima Democrat: Hayes' "rebel" postmaster general has given the long advertisement for mail letting in Mississippi to the Okalona States. This is one of the ways in which Kernan is to receive pay from the republicans for his "rebel yells." Who is it that endorses the sentiments of this paper?

NAPOLEON III. "kept the peace at the polls" with his army, and, by this sublime method, secured 7,300,000 votes out of 7,300,000 voters. The bayonet says: "You vote my way, or I will get inside of you." That is the beautiful equality and freedom of suffrage which the republicans are so desirous of bringing about.

A sensible Mississippian said to a Boston Herald correspondent when speaking of the negro exodus. "I am willing to stand my share to let our republican opponents in the north see how they like an influx of the negro. I will be one of one thousand men to give fifty dollars apiece annually to send negroes to Massachusetts free. When they get a hundred thousand there the whites will all join the democratic party. Also try the same thing in Vermont, give 'em fifty thousand negroes, and even Vermont would cease to be a republican state."

Portable Mulay Saw Mill,

With improvements recently made is unequaled as a neighborhood mill. It can be run by either steam or water power, and is especially adapted to the engines used for threshing.

It may be operated by either two or three men, and will cut as much lumber in proportion to the power and number of hands employed as mills of larger capacity.

It makes smooth and even lumber, leaves no stubshot and will cut any sized log up to four feet in diameter. It may be transported from one locality to another and re-erected ready for sawing in from two to three days, and can be made profitable in localities where there is not sufficient timber to justify the erection of a large mill. Send for descriptive circular, price, etc., to CHANDLER & TAYLOR, Indianapolis, Ind.

A WOOLLY WEBSTER.

Bob Yancey, of Georgia, a Putative Son of the Godlike Daniel—The Story of his Life.

[Atlanta Letter in Chicago Times.]

It is not generally known that there is to-day living in the city of Atlanta a son of Daniel webster, but such is the fact. For the proof we rely not only on the intelligent account which the son gives of his own life, but also on the coroborative evidence of several prominent citizens, who say there is no doubt of the truth of the story. The son of Webster is a mulatto barber, well-known all over Georgia as Bob Yancey, a man of more than ordinary intelligence. In appearance he has some marks of striking resemblance to Webster, his broad forehead and widely-separated eyes are noticed as circumstantial proof as soon as you hear the story of his birth. A few days ago I had a conversation with Bob, in which he made the following statements. It is due to him to say that his story is corroborated by the members of his former master's family, who are still living It is as follows:

Robert Yancey, whose real name is Robert Webster, was born at Gadsby's hotel, on the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Fourth street, in Washington City, on the 20th of August, 1820. His mother was Charlotte Goodbrick, a mulatto of rare beauty, and her father was one of the old aristocrats of Virginia. Mr. Gadsby bought Charlotte from Billy Bullard, of Fredericksburg, Va., and took her to Washington to wait in his hotel. Daniel Webster boarded with him, and in this way saw Charlotte, and induced those intimate relations which supply a subject of this sketch. The matter was kept quiet in Washington at the time, though the truth was suspected by several of Mr. Webster's friends. After the birth of Robert, Charlotte became the waiting maid of some of the most distinguished ladies at the capitol. She was in the service of Mrs. Clay for a long time, and she continued to enjoy an intimacy with the greatest man of his time. Mr. Webster once gave her a beautiful gold necklace, which she accidentally left in a drawer in Mrs. Clay's dressing-case. Here her mistress found the necklace, and asked Charlotte whose it was. The girl was confused and frightened, and told the whole truth. It is said that Mrs. Clay showed the necklace to Webster, and asked him if he had ever seen it before. Afterward Charlotte was purchased by Mr. Webster. He took her to Boston and gave her perfect freedom, though she continued to be a housemaid in his home. She died in Boston only a few years ago. Bob frequently heard from her. He says she talked freely to him of his origin, and told him many anecdotes of the private life of Mr. Webster, to whom she was passionately devoted. When her son grew up he became the property of young Gadsby, who was a rash, hot-headed southener, and led the gay life so common in the old flush times. Once in Richmond he had been drinking and gambling desperately until he had lost all he had. He staked Bob, his body servant, against $500 in gold and lost. A man named Billy Martin won the son of Webster, but shortly afterward sold him to a Mr. Cunningham, of Charleston, S. C. This Mr. Cunningham was an uncle of Col. Ben Yancey, a prominent member of the present Georgia legislature. Col. Yancey fancied Bob, bought him and kept him as a body servant. Bob was such a faitful slave that his master in 1863 gave him his liberty and enough money to start a business in Atlanta. Here Bob did well and before the confederates surrounded the city had saved quite an independency. When Sherman's army passed through Georgia, with it came Captain Fletcher Webster, a son of Daniel Webster. He had heard the story of Bob's nativity, and accidentally found him while stationed in Atlanta. He bestowed various attentions on him. He gave him a picture of Daniel Webster, which Bob still has. Fletcher Webster was killed in a battle near Atlanta. Sherman's soldiers destroyed all the property Bob had accumulated. One hundred boxes of tobacco and other valuables of his were burned in the destruction of Atlanta. Bob now has a claim pending at Washington for recovery of damages. He says that when he went there a few months ago, several distinguished gentlemen who knew his origin paid him very kind attentions. He is getting quite feeble and is very poor. His creditors not long ago closed out his barbershop in Atlanta. Bob now does little but stand on the street corners and talk of the grand days he saw long ago. He speaks with remarkable accuracy of all the greatest men of Webster's time and refers to his parentage with evident pride. He will not associate with negroes and is passing his last days in complaining of the loss of what was once quite a little fortune.

Summed Up.

[New York Sun.]

How Hayes, the Fraud, towers up in comparison with the cowardly democrats of congress!

They opened a contest with him on the most vital question that can possibly be raised in a free government. They had the immense advantage of being in the right, and he the immense disadvantage of being in the wrong.

But he shows courage. He vetoes measures that are wise and necessary to the safety of the country. He vetoes them simply because they are contrary to the interests of the republican party. He stands up and does it like a man.

The democrats, on the other hand, like a pack of frightened sheep, abandon the field and run away after voting the money that is necessary to keep at the polls the troops they have repeatedly declared should never be allowed there!

The Latest Thing in Coffins.

Israel Hogeland, of Indianapolis, comes to the front with another surprising invention. It consists of an adjustable die or dies attached to the ordinary tile mill, through which clay is to be forced out in the shape of coffins of any size and length from the same dies. An outside earthen box is to be made to hold the casket. They are to be burned as other pottery, and finished up to suit the trade, Japanned or finished similar to slate metals. Some of our practical manufactures are said to look upon the invention as a success. If Mr. Hogeland succeeds it will certainly be a triumph in the mechanical world. The coffins are to be hermetically sealed, and will be made as cheaply as wooden ones. The patents are granted, and the machinery being fitted to go on with the work. If we can be laid away in an earthen vessel for a few thousand years, who will want to be cremated?

In The Coils of a Black Snake.

Flora Agnew, 11 years old, living in New York City, has been visiting at the house of her uncle, near Hunter's Range, Pa. She has frequently gone with her cousin, a girl of about the same age as herself, to drive the cows to pasture. Last Sunday morning her cousin was sick, and Flora went alone with the cows. When she had driven them to the pasture she started for the house, but becoming tired, she sat down on a mossy mound to rest. She had hardly seated herself before she saw a huge black snake coiled on a cluster of laurel bushes. She screamed and started to run, but the snake darted at her and circled itself about her body. She cried at the top of her voice and ran, with the snake drawing its folds tighter and tighter around her, till she fell down with fright and exhaustion. Her cries brought her uncle, who cut the snake in two with his knife and released her. It was some time before the little girl could speak. The imprint of the snake's folds were left on her body. The snake measured 6 feet 5 inches in length.

Raising Pigs.

[National Live Stock Journal.]

The most important thing for the swine breeder at this season of the year is to get the greatest possible growth from his spring pigs. There is no period in the life of a hog when so great a return for the food consumed is possible, as during the first six months, and it is here that the advantages of skillful feeding are apparent. Unless great care be taken, the growth of the pig will be seriously checked when it is from three to five weeks old. The milk of the dam, which was ample to promote a rapid growth in the litter of pigs during the first two or three weeks is not sufficient to answer the demands of the same litter as they grow older; hence the pigs should early be taught to look elsewhere for a part of their sustenance. This is an easy matter; a little milk or nutritious food of any kind, in liquid form, placed conveniently by, where the pigs can have access to it at all times, but beyond the reach of the sow, will soon do the work; and it should be replenished frequently during the day. If this is attended to, there will be no "stunting" of the pigs at this critical period, and their growth will be uniform and rapid. A good clover pasture is a valuable adjunct, and helps wonderfully. The true secret of successful pork making is to push the pig from the date of birth until it is big enough for the market; and, the earlier the age at which this point can be reached, the greater is the return for the food consumed.

A slop, made of corn and oats, ground in about equal parts, with a little oil meal added, makes the best food for the sow while suckling, to increase the flow of milk, and this, with clover pasture and plenty of soaked corn during the summer, will promote a rapid and healthy growth of the pigs.

He Takes Presents but Gives None.

[From the San Francisco State.]

The Sultan of Turkey has shipped for Gen. Grant two full-bred Arabian horses of the kind that in those countries are esteemed above all price. Similar presents were made to Jackson, and we believe some other of our earlier presidents, but were refused. Grant was the first American president who ever accepted a gift, and in his semi-official trip around the world he seems to loose no opportunity to accept of all he can get.

Among the eastern nations the custom of making gifts is very prevalent; but these gifts are only nominally gifts, and the receiver is expected to give in return something of equal value. This is well understood by the English government, and in some form or other the presents which have been made to the Viceroys, of India, or to the Prince of Wales, during his visit to that part of his future dominions were scrupulously returned.

But this ex-president of ours, who goes tramping around the world, accepting princely and regal hospitalities, accepts without returning. Of course nothing will be said that we shall hear, but American character loses in estimation. If this is their great Sultan, these people will reason, the Americans must be a niggardly and mean-spirited nation.

A Wonderful Lake.

In Colorado is a ten-acre field which is no more nor less than a subterranean lake covered with soil about eighteen inches deep. On the soil is cultivated a field of corn, which produces thirty or forty bushels to the acre. If any one will take the trouble to dig a hole the depth of a spade handle he will find it to fill with water, and by using a hook and line, fish four or five inches long can be caught. The fish have neither scales nor eyes, and are perch-like in shape. The ground is a black marl in its nature, and in all probability was at one time an open body of water, on which was accumulated vegetable matter, which has been increased from time to time, until now it has a crust sufficiently strong and rich to produce fine corn, though it has to be cultivated by hand, as it is not strong enough to bear the weight of a horse.

While harvesting, the field-hands catch great strings of fish by punching a hole through the earth. A person rising on his heel and coming down suddenly can see the growing corn shake all around him. Any one having the strength to drive a rail through the crust will find, on releasing it, that it will disappear altogether. The whole section of country surrounding this field gives evidence of marshiness, and the least rain produces an abundance of mud. But the question comes up: Has not this body an outlet? Although brackish, the water tastes as if fresh, and is evidently not stagnant. Yet these fish are eyeless and scaleless—similar to those found in caves.

GOV. HENDRICKS.

A Mild Interview by a Gazette Representative.

Hon. Thos. A. Hendricks passed through our city on yesterday morning, en route for Hot Springs. He was accompanied by Mrs. Hendricks. A Gazette reporter met the party at Walnut Ridge, and was accorded an interview. Gov. Hendricks and wife were looking remarkably well, and appeared to be enjoying their journey, notwithstanding the inclement heat.

Mr. Hendricks denied that his visit had any political significance, stating that he was traveling only for recreation, after long, protracted and arduous labors at home. He said in response to inquiries, that he must decline to make speeches, or otherwise to make any inroads upon the rest which he had promised himself for the time of his visit. He will probably remain at the Springs about four weeks, when he will return to Indianapolis.

He referred with satisfaction to the spirit manifested by the south, and alluded to our senators as being characterized by a wise, statesmanly conservatism.

In other than political matters, the governor was quite free to converse. He spoke with interest of Albert Pike and his poems, of Col R. W. Johnson and others, and regretted that his arrangements would not admit of a visit among his friends at Little Rock.

Gov. Hendricks does not grow old. He is always the same noble-looking, affable gentleman, whose pleasing address renders him a great favorite of the masses, and whose energy never tires in his labors for the success of his party, and for the welfare of the republic.—Little Rock Gazette June 14.

SOLDIERS.

The Way Republicans Removed them from Office.

"Truth," in a communication to the New York Sun, says:

Of all the hollow, canting cries by the rump (only the rump remains) of the once powerful and intelligent republican party, this about democrats removing Union soldiers from office is the silliest. Let us see who removed the most union soldiers from office.

When Grant took up his abode in the White House, on the 4th day of March, 1866, the following soldiers of the union army were removed by Grant and his secretary of State, H. Fish; General Dix, minister, Paris; General Bartlett, minister, Stockholm; General Ewing, minister, the Hague; General Kilpatrick minister, Santiago; General Rosecrans, minister, Mexico; General Hovey, minister, Lima; General Sullivan, minister, Quito; Colonel Gleason, consul, Bordeaux; Captain R. F. Farrell, consul, Cadis; Colonel Duff chief of artillery on Grant's staff, Army of the Tennessee, consul, Glasgow; Lieutenant Kink, U. S. N., consul, Canton.

The Union soldiers, in many of the principal cities, were put out to make room for such men as McLean, Eastman, Irwin, and Campbell, at Chicago; Foulds, Stephenson, and Pullman, at Cincinnati; Robeson, in New Jersey; Murphy, Cornell, Laflin, and 'General' Arthur, at New York; Borie, at Philadelphia; Long street, at New Orleans; and Tom Settle, in North Carolina.

The rump of the republican party is on record, from 1867 to 1879, as being superlatively indifferent to a Union soldier's claim for a place if he lacked political backing. And there are today, and were during the whole of the eight years of Grant's miserable administration, fewer union soldiers in office than under the administration of Honest Andrew Johnson.

The republican rump has a great deal to say about Union soldiers when elections are at hand; but neither in their state conventions, nor in their district conventions have the Union soldiers any show with the blatant demagogue, bondholder, or shoddy contractor.

The people of the south thought proper to send to congress the men who went to battle for them, but the rump of the republican party, with its Grab, Greed, and Grantism, is conspicuous for ignoring the claims of the union soldier. The first to turn his back on the old soldiers was Grant, who had been exalted by them form obscurity to fame, and from indigence to affluence.

Volcanic Eruption.

The eruption now in progress at Mount Ætna or Mount Gibello as the Sicilians call it, a corruption of the Saracenic Gibbel Altamat meaning mountain of fire, promises to be one of the most remarkable of modern times. It seems to be extending from crater to crater, which the volcano can readily do, as it has not less than 80 cones, or minor volcanoes, in all—the largest being some 700 feet high. The principal crater is estimated at from two and a half to four miles in circumference, and from 700 to 1,000 feet deep. If all the cones should get to blazing and belching, the sight would be grand in the extreme—worth a journey to Catania to see. About 60 eruptions of Ætna are recorded, the most notable within the last 125 years being those of 1793, 1711, 1819 and 1833. The first of them continued an entire year, the streams of lava then being 30 feet deep. During the last one mentioned, there opened on the sides of the mountain many flaming mouths in the midst of tremendous explosions and convulsions, prodigious discharges of ashes, cinders and lava, which overran miles of cultivated fields and threatened the town of Bronte with ruin. The river of lava was then 30 miles long, over a mile wide, and 40 feet deep. The lava which in 1669 overtopped the walls of Catania may still be seen coiling over their summit like a frozen torrent. On that occasion much of the city and 15,000 of its inhabitants were destroyed. The earliest eruption mentioned in history was 470 years before the Christian era. Four years later, a vast volume of salt water is reported to have rushed down the mountain side. It was supposed to have come from the crater, showing, apparently, the connection between the volcano and the sea. A great eruption occurred in 1852, when mighty clouds of ashgray dust expelled covering the whole surrounding county. From two new mouths, on the eastern flank, issued torrents of lava, one moving toward Zaffarana, the other toward Giarra. One stream was two miles broad, in some places 170 feet deep, flowed 600 feet in an hour ordinarily, but when it approached abrupt cliffs it dashed over like a fiery cascade. One of the most striking features of the vicinity is an enormous gully—the Val do Bove—excavating the eastern side of the volcano. It is five miles across, environed by nearly vertical precipices of from 1,000 to 5,000 feet, on which are sections of numberless lava streams and beds of scoriæ, traversed by highly inclined dikes, and looks barren and dreary enough to be a part of primeval chaos. The summit of Ætna, being above the line of vegetation, presents, unless covered with snow a melancholy waste of lava, ashes, lapilli and scoriæ, from the center of which, in a desolate plain, ascends the principal cone. Around the base of the mountain is a productive region of corn, olives, grapes and fruits, from three to 11 miles broad. Ætna is, on the whole, a very respectable volcano, and its exhibitions are frequent and imposing.

An Indianian's California Ranche—A Splendid Home.

[San Francisco Letter to Baltimore Sun.]

E. J. Baldwin, everywhere known as Lucky Baldwin, worked on his father's farm when young, in Indiana. After twenty-five years of trial at various pursuits he drifted into the bonanza district, Nevada, and in a few years, by well-judged ventures in mining stocks, realized some millions. He became publicly known by building "The Baldwin," now so favorably known as a popular house, on Market street, San Francisco, 235 by 210 feet. Included in the structure is Baldwin's Theater. The whole, including furniture, cost $3,000,000. Traveling through Los Angeles county he fancied and bought a Spanish grant of 60,000 acres of bountifully watered garden land, and laid it out in princely style. Of this, 13,000 acres are moist bottom land, needing no irrigation. Outside of this he has artificially irrigated most of the property by means of six miles of eight-inch pipe, and beautiful lakes are formed here and there, with rustic bridges and other adornments. Some fifty rustic cottages are the homes of his army of working people. All sorts of farm buildings are tastefully arranged, and flowing artesian springs abound, of purest water. The orchard has 1,200 acres, with 18,000 orange and lemon trees, 2,000 almonds, 600 Italian chestnuts, eighty acres of English walnuts, 500 acres of choice grapes, innumerable apples, pears, plums, peaches and figs. He has 60,000 eucalyptus trees of twenty-seven varieties, and 3,000 of the graceful pepper-trees, our most ornate evergreen and drooping variety, bearing a profusion of pepper-looking spice-berries. A broad avenue is laid out, three miles long by 120 feet wide, lined on each side with eucalyptus trees. In the center is a row of pepper trees, making a grateful shade in that sunny climate, and the air is cooled by innumerable fountains. Soon a mansion in keeping with the surroundings will be erected on a rising knoll overlooking this fairyland, and some hundred tenantry, with gardens and cultivated fields, will enrich the landscape and make this charmed spot a paradise, where the proprietor can pass his declining years in peaceful contemplation of the romance of his creation.

Asking the Men to Go Where the Captains Dare Not Lead.

[New York Sun.]

The democratic statesmen who unhesitatingly assumed the responsibility of the extra session of congress, and then improved the earliest opportunity to sound a retreat from the stand they had taken, have placed themselves in a very awkward dilemma.

They began by declaring that the presence of the army at the polls is inconsistent with the free and independent exercises of the elective franchise. Sooner, they said, than that freemen should be awed at the polls by a menacing military force we will refuse, temporarily, all support to the army.

This is in strict accordance with the doctrines heretofore maintained by the most enlightened and patriotic statesmen of England and of this country. It seemed to be a principle which fully justified incurring the trouble and expense of an extra session.

But what is there left of the consistency of these men when, being hard pressed by the Executive, they hastily abandon the great principle of free elections on which they had planted themselves?

They tell us now that they have made the issue and the people will see to it that their views are maintained and established.

This, in the first place, is asking the men to go where the Captains have refused to lead. And again, it may be asked, if there is real, practical danger of intimidation at the polls, how can it be certain that the people, though convinced in their own minds, will successfully maintain the right by ballot?

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

Holyoke, Mass., was last week the scene of one of the most horrible tragedies ever recorded. A man named John Kemmler, out of work and disheartened by idleness, shot and killed his three little girls, one of them 1 year old, and the others twins, 3 years old. He deserted his family in February, drawing what money he had in the bank, and went to Denver, Col. Lately he returned, however, and sent his wife up street to buy a hat, and when she was out of sight he called the children up from the street, promising them candy. He then locked the door and tried to poison the children with gruel mixed with cyanide of potassium. The dose was too bitter, however, and after taking several spoonfuls the older girl threw it up. The other children refused the poison. He then took one of the twins into the front room and shot her through the head with a revolver, leaving her weltering in her blood. He took the other twin into a rear room and put a bullet through her head, and she fell bleeding on the floor. The youngest girl was treated likewise, and all were dead, shot through the head. Kemmler worked surely in every case, placing his pistol so near the heads of his victims that their hair was singed and the flesh blown away. He thinks he was justified in the work, as he believes the children would come to want.... Alfred T. Sanford, son of Prof. Sanford, of the Chicago University, and Olive C. Holmes, daughter of Judge Holmes, of Syracuse, N. Y., were drowned, a few days ago, in Onondaga lake, near the latter place. They were rowing, and, in changing places in the boat, it was capsized.

Hon. A. E. Borie, ex-Secretary of the Navy, who has been traveling with Gen. Grant in foreign lands since January last, has just returned home to Philadelphia. In conversation with a reporter Mr. Borie said Grant would probably reach San Francisco on Sept. 10.

The wife of Antonie Rolland, a celebrated French gunmaker, while on a tour around the world, fell into the Niagara river and was carried over the falls the other day. Her husband saw but was unable to assist her.... One of the most terrible boiler explosions that has ever taken place in Eastern Pennsylvania occurred recently near East Texas, on the East Pennsylvania railroad, at the iron ore mines of the Lehigh Iron Company, by which four men were instantly killed, two so badly wounded that they died shortly after, and several others more or less injured.

The mystery attending the death of Mrs. Hull, in New York, has at last been solved by the arrest and full confession of the murderer. The missing jewelry proved to be the clew, and the discovery in a Boston pawnshop of a cameo set belonging to the murdered woman laid the foundation for the detection which followed. The murderer proves to be a negro named Chastine Cox, who lived near the Hull residence, and was in the habit of doing odd jobs about the place. After having committed the murder and secured the plunder, he left for Boston, where he pawned a portion of the jewelry, and then returned to New York, where he remained for some days, but went back to Boston again, and there was arrested.... Another collision has occurred upon the New York elevated railroad, the fireman being the only person injured, however.

Thomas Dunkel, charged with killing his wife, killed himself in jail, at Buffalo, N. Y., with a razor given him to shave before the trial.... The New Jersey Court of Appeals has dismissed the writ of error in the case of Mrs. Smith and Covert Bennett, convicted of the murder of Policeman Smith, and it now seems certain that the guilty pair will die on the scaffold.

A very serious railroad accident occurred a few days ago on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern railroad, near Buffalo, N. Y. A funeral car attached to the regular express train jumped the track, and, after dragging along a short distance, turned on its side and was wrenched from the train. The other cars held to the track. The coupling broke. The special coach left the track at the side toward the lake, and the body of the car, wrenching away from the trucks, landed almost bottom up. The car was badly wrecked. Of the eleven passengers, not one escaped uninjured, and two or three of them were so badly wounded as to render it doubtful if they will recover.

Weber, the piano manufacturer, is dead.... The schooner Cummings, arriving in New York from Para, reports the loss of the Captain and two seamen from yellow fever.

THE WEST.

The danger of allowing unauthorized military companies to carry arms was shown at Chicago last Sunday, when a company of Bohemians charged bayonets, and finally fired upon a crowd of hoodlums who were trying to enter the picnic grounds of a Bohemian school, which picnic the military were attending. A number of the crowd were hit by buckshot, though probably no one was killed. The company—called the Bohemian Sharpshooters—are all held to the Criminal Court.

The six distillers known as the Chicago "first batch" have at last received a full and unconditional pardon of all assessments, penalties, damages or claims of the United States against them... In the matter of the controversy between the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe railroad and the old officers of the Denver and Rio Grande railroad, in Colorado, United States District Judge Hallett has decided that the action of the latter company in gaining possession of the Denver and Rio Grande road, under authority of the State court, was illegal. An order on the latter road was granted, restoring possession to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Company.

Chicago elevators contain 4,328,467 bushels of wheat, 2,216,795 bushels of corn, 396,088 bushels of oats, 78,882 bushels of rye, and 78,627 bushels of barley, making a grand total of 7,089,469 bushels, against 1,444,802 bushels at this period last year.... Serious apprehensions have been aroused by warlike symptoms among the Northern Cheyennes and other tribes in the vicinity of Fort Reno, Indian Territory. Ten companies of troops have just arrived at the fort, to be in readiness to deal vigorously with the threatening redskins. The number of the hostiles who are ready for the war-path is between 2,000 and 3,000. Their cause of anger is the fact that the Government has refused them permission to leave their reservation for a hunting raid northward.

Hon. Robert M. Knapp, ex-member of Congress from Illinois, died at Jerseyville, Ill., last week, in the 49th year of his age.

THE SOUTH.

The Legislature of Georgia will convene the first week in July.

A horrible casualty occurred near Jonesboro, Ga., the other day, two young ladies, sister and daughter of J. L. Reynolds, being burned to death by the destruction of his house. Mr. Reynolds was severely hurt while trying to rescue the girls, while his wife is insane from grief.

A dispatch from Frankfort, Ky., says: "On Saturday night, at Sand Riffle, twelve miles distant, a party of unknown men attacked the house of Samuel Faulkner, severely wounding Faulkner as he ran from the house, and then setting fire to the dwelling, which was consumed, with its inmates—Harry Russell, aged 17 (who was also shot), and two children of Faulkner, aged 11 and 3 years. No cause is given for this brutal affair."

A bloody affray occurred a few days ago at Wellsville, Mo., between three brothers named Taylor and a man named Wren. The latter and two of the Taylors were killed.

GENERAL.

The University of Pennsylvania won the Inter-Collegiate boat-race this year, with Columbia second, and Princeton third.

The earnings of the Central Pacific (Cal.) Railroad Company for May were $1,541,000, and for the first five months of the year $6,298,100, against $6,410,300 in 1878.

POLITICAL.

The State Convention and anniversary of the Republican party in Wisconsin will be held at Madison, July 23.... Maryland Democrats hold their State Convention Aug. 7.

The State Central Committee of the Wisconsin National Greenback party have decided to hold their convention for the nomination of a State ticket in Watertown, Tuesday, July 15.

The convention of Nationals who withdrew from the Columbus (Ohio) Convention, held at Toledo, June 24, refused to nominate a ticket, as was anticipated. A platform of principles was adopted, containing the following financial planks: "That the United States should exercise its most vital function, the coinage of money, independent of any foreign power; that it is the duty of the General Government to supply the entire currency medium; that all bank issues of currency should be suppressed; that the so-called specie-resumption is a fraud and swindle; that the locking up in the treasury of the United States of the largest part of the scanty volume of the people's money we denounce as an atrocious crime, without excuse or palliation; and we demand the unlimited coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains."

At a meeting of the Ohio Democratic State Central Committee, at Columbus, June 26, J. Frank McKinney was made Chairman of the Executive Committee, in place of John G. Thompson.... The Maine Republicans, at Bangor, June 26, nominated the Hon. D. F. Davis, of Corinth, for Governor, on the third ballot. The platform adopted asserts that this country is a nation, and not a confederation of States; that it is the right and duty of the Government to protect the citizens and insure an honest and pure ballot; that the action of the Democratic majority in Congress is a revolutionary attempt to coerce the Executive, and that President Hayes should be supported in his resistance to such attempts, and that it is a matter of rejoicing that the Government promises to pay are kept, and the dollar of the laborer is as good as the dollar of the capitalist.

WASHINGTON.

The President has approved of the joint resolution relating to the bridge across the Detroit river at or near Detroit.

The legal difficulty discovered by the Senate Judiciary Committee in the way of confirming the appointment of Secretary McCrary to an office which will not be vacant for nine or ten weeks induced the President to send a brief message withdrawing the nomination.... The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections decided to commence the Ingalls investigation in Kansas by a sub-committee of five, to proceed to that State next September, and to prosecute the Kellogg-Spofford inquiry in New Orleans next November by a sub-committee of three. Senator Saulsbury is the Chairman of the Kansas sub-committee, and Senator Hill will probably be placed at the head of the sub-committee for New Orleans.... Information has reached the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department that a new counterfeit $5 legal-tender note has made its appearance in Western New York. It is of the series of 1875, and bears the name of Allison, Register, and Wyman, Treasurer. It is executed on printed imitation fiber paper, which is lighter than the genuine. Bankers pronounce it a dangerous counterfeit.

FOREIGN.

Sixty-nine cases and bales of various kinds of merchandise and fourteen trunks have been recovered from the wreck of the sunken steamer Pommerania.... The agent of a heavy German cotton firm has absconded after involving his house to an enormous extent on the London market.

The belt given by Sir John Astley, emblematic of the long-distance pedestrian championship of the world, comes back to the United States once more, this time in the hands of Edward Payson Weston, who won it last week in London, after covering the greatest distance ever accomplished in these competitions. Weston walked and ran 550 miles in six days, beating Brown, the only other contestant who kept on the track, nearly 100 miles. Rowell, who held the belt, was unable to compete, on account of sickness, but has challenged the winner.

At the full sitting of the Bonapartist Senators and Deputies, a resolution was adopted declaring that, though the Prince Imperial is dead, his cause survives, and the succession of Napoleon has not lapsed, and that the empire will live. An address of condolence with the ex-Empress Eugenie was drafted expressing the deepest sympathy.... The English Court went into mourning for the Prince Imperial.

By the death of the Prince Imperial of France, Prince Victor, the son of Prince Napoleon Jerome (nicknamed "Plon-Plon"), becomes the heir-apparent to the throne, according to the Prince's will, in the event of the restoration of the empire. He is a lad of 17 years. His mother is the Princess Clothilde, daughter of the late Victor Emmanuel, of Italy.

Prince Jerome Bonaparte occupies a rather peculiar, but in his case a perfectly-consistent, position with regard to the question of the imperial succession—a sort of dog-in-the-manger attitude, for he announces that he is a Republican now and always, and will not consent to be regarded as a pretender to the Bonapartist succession, and that while he sleeps on his rights, as the lawyers say, nobody else can put in a claim.... Serious apprehension is felt in regard to the anti-landlord agitation in the West of Ireland, and additional police are to be provided.

A Vienna dispatch says news has been received from Sofia that there have been several encounters between the Turks and Macedonian insurgents, in which the latter were unsuccessful.

The Sultan has signed a firman deposing the Khedive of Egypt in favor of his son, Prince Mohammed Tewfik, and the Khedive has signified his compliance with the demand for his abdication. The ex-Khedive is to receive a pension of £5,000 a year.... Abdul Rapman, pretender to the Afghan throne, who has hitherto lived under Russian protection, has invaded Badakshan, and the Afghan troops in Balkh have revolted.... The town of Bayran, Russia, has been nearly destroyed by fire. A number of persons have been arrested at Kieff, St. Petersburg and Moscow for trading in explosives, which is prohibited.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

The Senate, on the 20th, continued the consideration of the Army bill. The measure was debated by Messrs. Carpenter, Ingalls, Kirkwood, Logan, Conkling, Eaton, Bayard and Thurman. The bill then passed—30 to 17, Mr. Burnside the only Republican voting with the majority—and at 2 o'clock in the morning the Senate adjourned. ——In the House, the minority of the Judicial Committee presented their views upon the subjects discussed in the President's veto message. Referring to the majority report, presented some days before, the minority say:

"The repeated efforts in said report to make it appear that the right or authority to interfere with State elections, or with the freedom and lawful conduct of any election, is claimed or asserted in any quarter, is hardly deserving of serious notice. The minority in Congress have made no such claim. The right of Federal supervision contended for applies to Congressional elections only. This is entirely ignored in the report of the majority. Their report proceeds upon the false assumption that the President advocates the use of Federal authority to supervise State elections. No such claim is made in the message under consideration or in any other message or utterance of the President, nor does the message advocate or justify military interference with the freedom of any elections. On the contrary, the President uses the following language:

"'Holding, as I do, the opinion that any military interference at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and would tend to destroy the freedom of elections, and sincerely desiring to concur with Congress in all its measures, it is with very great regret that I am forced to the conclusion that the bill before me is not only unnecessary to prevent such interference, but it is a dangerous departure from long-settled and important constitutional principles.

"'The true rule as to the employment of military force at elections is not doubtful. No intimidation or coercion should be allowed to control or influence citizens in the exercise of their right to vote, whether it be in the shape of combinations of evil-disposed persons, or of armed bodies of militia of the State, or of the military force of the United States. Elections shall be free from all forcible interference, and as far as practicable from all apprehensions of such interference. No soldiers, either of the Union or of the State militia, should be present at the polls to take the place of or perform the duties of the ordinary civil police force. There has been and will be no violation of this rule under orders from me during this administration.'"

The report says it is conceded that, during the civil war, some Generals—among others, Gen. McClellan—issued orders interfering with elections where disloyalty existed, and that "these and similar orders undoubtedly exercised influence in securing the enactment of the law of 1865, which prohibits the use of the army or navy at the time and place of any general or special election in any State, except it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep peace at the polls, and also prohibits any military or naval officer from prescribing the qualifications of voters, or in any manner interfering with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State. This law, with appropriate penalties for its violation, was approved by President Lincoln, and since its enactment we do not believe there has been any well-grounded cause of complaint of military interference with elections." The report of a Congressional committee in regard to the operation of the law in New York city is alluded to, in which it was declared that "This happy result [a free, fair, and honest election] was the consequence of the co-operation between the official advisers of city and United States officers."

In conclusion the minority say: "It is to remain a law of the land. All efforts for its repeal have been for the present abandoned. It is the constitutional duty of the President to see that it is faithfully executed. Many of its provisions are applicable to and only to be enforced on the day an election is held. Why should the authority to use all lawful and constitutional means to execute it be suspended or crippled on that day? To whatever extent this may be done, the law will be rendered a nullity so far as it is a law for such days only. Why should the day of election be excepted from the operation of this or any other statute? Surely, the need may be as great on that day as on any other. A proposal to impose like restrictions at every place where a court is to be held on the Fourth of July, or Eighth of January, or any other holiday or anniversary that is to be celebrated or observed, would be met with the jeers or contempt of all good men. The laws should be enforced and executed on all days and at all times and places. To abdicate the authority of the Government of the United States to execute its laws on the day of election would be a fatal mistake, and constitute a precedent of the most dangerous character."

On the 21st the Senate adopted the conference report on the Judicial Expenses bill—31 to 17. After a long discussion upon the proposition to strike out the item in the Postal Deficiency bill increasing the pay of letter carriers, it was voted that the item be retained in the bill. The House joint resolution authorizing the completion of the foundation of the Washington monument was passed.——In the House a message was received from the President announcing his approval of the Legislative bill. During the day's session there was utter apathy manifested, so that it was almost impossible to obtain a quorum on any vote, and no business of any importance was done.

The Senate confirmed a number of appointments on the 23d. That of D. T. Corbin, of South Carolina, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Utah Territory, was reported from the Judiciary Committee adversely and placed upon the calendar for consideration by the Senate hereafter.——In the House, the President's Secretary delivered a message in writing, vetoing the Supplementary Judicial bill; also, announcing that he had signed the Army bill. At the conclusion of the reading of the veto message, the House proceeded to vote on the question whether the bill should be passed, notwithstanding the objections of the President, and it was decided in the negative—yeas, 104; nays, 78; not the necessary two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

In the Senate, on the 24th, the proceedings were tame and of no general interest.——In the House, a resolution providing for adjournment June 25 was voted down—103 to 82. The Political Assessment bill was taken up, and the Republicans availed themselves of the parliamentary privilege to prevent action upon it.

Mr. Burnside introduced in the Senate, on the 25th ult., a joint resolution to the effect that the people of this country having for fifty years adhered to the Monroe doctrine, they "would not view without serious inquietude any attempt of the powers of Europe to establish, under their protection and domination, a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien, and such action could not be regarded in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward these United States." The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Mr. Vest introduced the following joint resolution, which was ordered printed: "That the complete remonetization of silver, its full restoration as a money metal, and its free coinage by the Government of the United States, are demanded alike by the dictates of justice and wise statesmanship." Mr. Windom read what he styled a political speech, reviewing the record of the Republican and Democratic parties for the past twenty years. A long political debate ensued, which was participated in by Messrs. Windom, Saulsbury, Davis (W. Va.), Ingalls and Beck.——The House occupied the day in debating the Senate bill exempting from license and other fees vessels not propelled wholly by sail or by internal motive-power of their own.

In the Senate, June 26, Mr. Vest called up the silver free-coinage resolution, but, objection being made, it went over. After a short executive session, the Judicial Expenses Appropriation bill was read twice and referred. The regular order was resumed, being the joint resolution relating to the extra pay for Congressional employes. Messrs. Davis (W. Va.) and Allison engaged in a short discussion upon the financial questions. ——In the House, the proposition for revoking the leave of absence granted to members was made by Mr. Armfield, and objected to. The bill making appropriations for certain judicial expenses and the bill making appropriations to pay the fees of Marshals and their general deputies, were reported from the Committee on Appropriations and ordered printed and referred. The bill prohibiting political assessments came up as business of the morning hour. Mr. Garfield sought an opportunity of speaking against the bill, but was cut off by the previous question, whereupon dilatory tactics were resorted to by the Republicans.

Isaac Butt.

Of the late Isaac Butt a lady writes: "One day he ran in hurriedly to see my father, who was out at the time. As he was rushing away without leaving any name, I ventured to remark, 'Who shall I say called?' The Home Ruler grimly replied, 'Tell your father the ugliest devil he knows called to see him.' We all knew who it was then." Going home late one night he was accosted by a desperate-looking ruffian in one of the suburbs of Dublin and asked what he was going to stand. "Well," replied Mr. Butt, meekly, "I'm sorry that I can't give you much, my friend, but what I have I will share. Here," he continued, drawing a revolver from his pocket, "is a weapon which has six chambers. I will give you three and ——." Here Mr. Butt found himself alone.

A Cunning Wife.

The Chicago Tribune says that a young wife of that city who is anxious to keep her husband at home evenings flatters him about the exquisitely dainty proportions of his feet, and induces him to wear boots about two sizes too small for him. He is on his feet all day long in town, and when he comes home at night she has a soft chair and a pair of loose, cool slippers for him, and by the time he, with great drops of agony pearling on his brow, has got off his boots, he comes to the conclusion that there is no place like home after all, and has no desire to go down town to lodge or to sit up with a sick friend.

The late William Sloane, of New York city, who amassed a fortune of about $1,000,000 in the carpet business, left bequests to charitable institutions, connected chiefly with the Presbyterian church, amounting to $140,000; to his pastor, the Rev. Dr. John Hall, $20,000; and $35,000 to be distributed among his old and faithful clerks, some of whom will receive $5,000 each, others $1,000.

A Lucky Bullet Saves Hundreds of Lives.

In the middle of the fight at Rorke's Drift, when the Zulus had fired the hospital, a rush was made by a band of the enemy to fire the storehouse, the other building which outlasted the defense. As fast as these Zulus came on with firebrands they were shot down, but one managed to escape the fire and got in close to the wall of the storehouse. The defenders, with their rifles through the loop-holes, could not slope their weapons to kill him, and it seemed as if his purpose of firing the thatch on the roof of the house would succeed. Fortunately, a young corporal of the army service corps named Atwood bethought himself of a plan to rid the camp of the Zulu. As luck would have it, there was a small square hole in the wall which had been used as a window, and the Zulu happened to get below this. Atwood, with his carbine, made his way to this hole, and, pushing out his weapon, let it hang pointing to the ground. It was impossible to take aim in his awkward position, so he trusted to fate. The Zulu had by this time stuck a firebrand on the end of his assegai and was in the act of rising up to set fire to the thatch when Atwood, not seeing the Zulu at all, but knowing about his position, fired the carbine with his thumb. The shot probably, in fact, saved Natal from an invasion of the Zulus. The Zulu at daylight was found at the spot with his skull smashed in, and the assegai, with the firebrand stuck on the end of it, held tightly in his dead hand.

Two Valuable Lessons Taught at West Point.

Two valuable lessons, not from text books, are taught at West Point—strict honesty and truthfulness. A cadet guilty of lying is expelled. There is no hope for him, and there ought to be none. Of all mean and detestable vices falsehood is the meanest and most detestable. A cadet guilty of dishonesty is expelled. Dishonesty and falsehood go hand in hand. They are twin vices. No young man who should show the taint of these vices goes through West Point if the authorities can help it. By extreme circumspection a youth whose imagination is too lively for his judgment may occasionally get through, and even rise to comparatively high command in the army afterward; but he certainly must walk with great care while passing through West Point; and, as to the honesty of its graduates, as a class, that, fortunately, is beyond dispute.

The Jersey City Journal believes that there are probably not over a dozen or so of perfectly able-minded adults in the world who have never told a lie, and the most of them have told a good many. It therefore wonders that the average man hates so to be called a liar.

VETO MESSAGE.

Full Text of the President's Objections to the Judicial Expenses Bill.

To the House of Representatives:

After a careful examination of the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for certain judicial expenses," I return it herewith to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following objections to its approval:

The general purpose of the bill is to provide for certain judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, for which the sum of $2,690,000 is appropriated. These appropriations are required to keep in operation the general functions of the Judicial Department of the Government, and if this part of the bill stood alone there would be no objection to its approval. It contains, however, other provisions to which I desire respectfully to ask your attention.

At the present session of Congress a majority of both houses, favoring a repeal of the Congressional Election laws, embraced in title 26 of the Revised Statutes, passed a measure for that purpose as part of a bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes." Unable to consent with Congress in that measure, on the 29th of May last, I returned the bill to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, without my approval, for that further consideration for which the constitution provides.

On reconsideration the bill was approved by less than two-thirds of the House, and failed to become a law. The election laws, therefore, remain valid enactments, and the supreme law of the land, binding not only upon all private citizens, but also alike and equally binding upon all who are charged with duties and responsibilities of the legislative, executive and judicial departments of the Government.

It is not sought by the bill before me to repeal election laws. Its object is to defeat their enforcement. The last clause of the first section is as follows:

"And no part of the money hereby appropriated is appropriated to pay any salaries, compensation, fees, or expenses, under or in virtue of title 26 of the Revised Statutes or any provision of said title."

Title 26 of the Revised Statutes, referred to in the foregoing clause, relates to the elective franchise, and contains the laws now in force regulating Congressional elections.

The second section of the bill reaches much further. It is as follows:

Section 2. That the sums appropriated in this act for the persons and public service embraced in its provisions are in full for such persons and public service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and no department or officer of the Government shall, during said fiscal year, make any contract, or incur any liability for the future payment of money under any of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing the appointment or payment of general or special Deputy Marshals for service in connection with an election or on election day until an appropriation sufficient to meet such contract or pay such liability shall have first been made by law.

This section of the bill is intended to make an extensive and essential change in the existing laws. The following are the provisions of the statutes on the same subject which are now in force:

Section 3,679. No department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of the appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriation.

Section 3,732. No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made unless the same is authorized by law, or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessaries of the current year.

The object of these sections of the Revised Statutes is plain. It is, first, to prevent any money from being expended unless an appropriation has been made therefor; and, second, to prevent the Government from being bound by a contract not previously authorized by law except for certain necessary purposes in the War and Navy Departments.

Under the existing laws, the failure of Congress to make the appropriations required for the execution of the provisions of the election laws would not prevent their enforcement. The right and duty to appoint general and special Deputy Marshals, which they provide for, would still remain, and the Executive Department of the Government would also be empowered to incur the requisite liability for their compensation. But the second section of this bill contains a prohibition not found in any previous legislation.

Its design is to render the election laws inoperative and a dead letter during the next fiscal year. It is sought to accomplish this by omitting to appropriate the money for their enforcement, and by expressly prohibiting any department or officer of the Government from incurring any liability under any of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the appointment or payment of general or special Deputy Marshals for service on election days, until an appropriation sufficient to pay such liability shall have first been made.

The President is called upon to give his affirmative approval to a positive enactment which, in effect, would deprive him of the ordinary and necessary means of executing the laws, still left on the statute book and embraced within his constitutional duty to see that laws are executed. If he approves this bill, and thus gives to such positive enactments the authority of law, he participates in a curtailment of his means of seeing that the law is faithfully executed, while the obligation of law and of his constitutional duty remains unimpaired.

The appointment of special Deputy Marshals is not made by the statute a spontaneous act of authority on the part of any executive or judicial officer of the Government, but is accorded as the popular right of citizens to call into operation this agency for securing the freedom of elections in any city or town having 20,000 inhabitants or upward.

Section 2,021 of the Revised Statutes puts it in the power of any two citizens of such city or town to require of the Marshal of the district the appointment of these special Deputy Marshals. Thereupon the duty of the Marshal becomes imperative and its non-performance will expose him to a judicial mandate or punishment, or to removal from office by the President, as the circumstances of his conduct might require.

The bill now before me neither revokes this popular right of citizens nor relieves the Marshals of the duty imposed by law, nor the President of his duty to see that this law is faithfully executed.

I forbear to enter again upon any general discussion of the wisdom and necessity of the election laws, or the dangerous and unconstitutional principle of this bill; that the power vested in Congress to originate appropriations involves the right to compel the Executive to approve any legislation which Congress may see fit to attach to such bills under the penalty of refusing the means needed to carry out essential functions of the Government.

My views on these subjects have been sufficiently presented in special messages sent by me to the House of Representatives during its present session.

What was said in those messages I regard as conclusive to my duty in respect to the bill before me. The argument urged in those communications against a repeal of the election laws and against the right of Congress to deprive the Executive of that separate and independent discretion and judgment which the constitution confers and requires are equally cogent in opposition to this bill. This measure leaves the powers and duties of the Supervisors of Elections untouched. The compensation of these officers is provided for under the permanent law, and no liability for which an appropriation is now required would, therefore, be incurred by their appointment; but the power of the National Government to protect them in the discharge of their duty at the polls would be taken away.

States may employ both the civil and military power at the elections; but by this bill even the civil authority to protect Congressional elections is denied us. The object is to prevent any adequate control by the United States over national elections by forbidding the payment of Deputy Marshals, the officers who are clothed with authority to enforce the election laws. The fact that those laws are deemed objectionable by a majority of both houses of Congress is urged as a sufficient warrant for this legislation. There are two ways always to overturn legislative enactments. One is their repeal; the other is the decision of a competent tribunal against their validity. The effect of this bill is to deprive the Executive Department of the Government of the means to execute the laws which are not repealed, which have not been declared invalid, and which it is, therefore, the duty of the Executive and of every other department of the Government to obey and to enforce.

I have in my former messages on this subject expressed a willingness to concur in suitable amendments for the improvement of the election laws, but I cannot consent to their absolute and entire repeal, and I cannot approve legislation which seeks to prevent their enforcement.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 23, 1879.

Symmes' Theory Improved Upon.

A correspondent of the Journal of the Telegraph submits the following: "We will suppose the earth to be a hollow sphere, with an opening at the poles of 400 or 500 miles in diameter—the shell being, probably, 1,000 miles in thickness. This leaves 6,000 miles diameter of space inside the shell. In the center of this space is a sun, having the same elements of light, heat and proportional power as the sun of our planetary system. As the sun, by a force as yet not fully understood, causes the planets to revolve around him in their orbits, so this sun in the center of the earth by a like force causes the shell to revolve around him, and also gives light and heat to the inner surface, which is composed of land and water, as is the outer surface, the heat of which, penetrating the opening at the poles, would account for Kane's open polar sea. From the fact that all the planets travel on the same plane and in the same direction, I infer that there is one force actuating them all, and that force emanates from the sun. Now, if there is a sun in the center of the earth, the moon and the earth's shell stand in the same relation to it as the planets do to the sun of our solar system. I hold that each heavenly body revolving on its axis is revolving around an electrical center, and each planet is a perfect system within a system, 'a wheel within a wheel.' We attribute the cause of the motion of the planets in their orbits to the sun; why not, then, attribute the revolution of the earth and the other planets on their axis to a like cause contained in their center? A bar of iron surrounded by coils of insulated wire and a current of electricity passed through the wire causes the whole to become polarized. The supposed sun in the center of the earth is probably composed largely of iron, and the natural currents of electricity around and through the shell being insulated from the center by intervening space results in the polarization of the earth."

The Cost of Raising a Boy.

The heaviest tax that can be imposed upon a nation is one that is paid in human lives. From whatever point of view the subject may be regarded, this conclusion is irresistible. If we look at it according to purely economical considerations, we may obtain very remarkable results. It has been estimated that an actual money cost of £300 is incurred in raising a boy, cradled among the poorest classes, from birth to manhood. It does not require us to ascend very high in the social scale before we find that this estimate must be trebled. If we take what we may call the cost price of the human unit at any definite time, say at £500 on arriving at maturity, the producing power of the unit in question will bear some relation to that sum; the more costly and careful education producing, as a rule, the more valuable result as to productive power. If the laborer who earns 14s. or 15s. a week adds £50 per annum to the wealth of the country, the physician, the scientific, military or naval officer, the barrister or the engineer may look forward to the time when his yearly labor will be worth more than a hundred times that amount, even if appraised only by the price he is actually paid for his time. Taking any producing individual, whether valued at £50 or £5,000 per annum, at any period of his career, no income tax to which he can be subjected can approach in its pressure the extravagant tax of death, for the payment of that tax at once annihilates the total earning power of which there was, until that moment, a fair mathematical expectation.—F. R. Conder, in the Popular Science Monthly.

A RECENT census of Portugal shows the total population of that kingdom is 4,745,124, being an increase of 401,189 since 1863.

A FOOLHARDY man and his wife started on the 1st of June from Boston to sail around the world in a boat only eighteen and one-half feet long.

EGYPT is written and spoken of as the squeezed orange. England considers it an orange that the Khedive has only peeled, and she is prepared to take some of the pulp.

MR. VREDENBURG, of New Orleans, was attacked and killed by a pet bear belonging to the Crescent City Rifle Club. Mrs. V. sued the club for damages, and has just obtained a verdict awarding her $15,000.

AT last accounts there were about 12,000 prisoners in the Russian Central prison, at Moscow, 8,000 of whom were arrested Nihilists. These were being sent off into dreary exile in Siberia in batches of from 300 to 600 a day.

THE Prince of Orange, heir apparent to the throne of the Netherlands, has just died at Paris. The Prince was born Sept. 4, 1840, and was an Admiral Lieutenant in the navy. This death leaves Prince Alexander, born Aug. 25, 1851, as heir apparent. He is now a Captain in the navy.

"SILVER and gold have I none," is not a phrase that Uncle Sam can use with truthfulness. Last year the mines of this country turned out $95,000,000 of silver and gold. This year the silver mines are not as productive as they were, and it is estimated that the silver and gold mined will amount to only $65,000,000.

AN English clown, Billy Walton, was buried according to his dying wish. There was a procession of the performers in costume and paint, the band occupying the gaudy circus carriage, the air being "In Some Fair Sultry Clime," etc., and as the grave was filled his brother clowns turned a somersault over it.

RESIDENTS of Texas have called on the Governor for protection against thieves, murderers and outlaws, and a petition reciting the necessity of military aid has been sent to the capital, and militiamen are ordered to the counties thus troubled. The petitioners aver that armed bands rob and pillage and defy interference. They run off stock and carry away property, and whoever goes in pursuit endangers his life. The trouble is in the main near the borders of New Mexico and the Indian Territory, and there, according to the petitioners, little short of a reign of terror exists.

THE recent order of the Governor General of St. Petersburg, that every house in the city must be guarded, day and night, by a porter or dvornick created a demand for 25,000 men for that special service; but, as it was soon found that the same men could not be on duty day and night, the number of dvornicks needed was 50,000. Even this force proved insufficient, as many houses have two or more entrances on different streets; and it was found impossible to procure in St. Petersburg the full number of trusty dvornicks. The landlords of the city are groaning under the burden imposed upon them by the new order, and the many troubles that grow out of it.

THE Chinese question has broken out in Australia. The Mongolians have been pouring into the country by the thousands, and already the whites complain that they are being ruined by Chinese cheap labor. The seamen have struck against the employment of the intruders, who will work for much smaller wages, and several serious riots have occurred in consequence at Sydney, an attempt being made, on one occasion, to burn the Chinese quarter of the city. Popular feeling, which is inflamed by rumors that the Chinese Government means to pour its people into Australia by the wholesale, sustains the strikers, and at last accounts it was expected that the steamship companies would yield.

DESPITE the check put upon our cattle trade with England, our importation not of beef only, but also of live animals, into that country is steadily increasing. On the Mersey the facilities for slaughtering cattle after landing are entirely inadequate to meet the demands of our increasing importations, and enlarged abattoirs are rapidly being pushed forward to completion, both on the Liverpool and Birkenhead sides of the river. Dead meat from this country has already overcome the prejudice against it in some quarters in the Old Country, and is now largely sold as home-raised beef by the London butchers. English families are rapidly becoming acquainted with this fact; the newspapers speak of it; and public opinion is arraying itself against the butchers, not on account of selling an inferior article as English beef, but because they sell at the full price of English beef an article which, though equally good, can be had in the market at a lower figure.

SOME letters of good old Greeley's, written prior to the campaign of 1860, have been published by Pike, a Maine editor, to whom they were addressed, and prove very interesting reading. Just before the Chicago Convention, when, with him, it was any man to beat Seward, he wrote: "But I don't care what is done about the nomination. I knew what ought to be done, and, having set that forth, am content. I stand in the position of the rich old fellow, who, having built a church entirely out of his own means, addressed his townsmen thus:

"I've built you a meeting-house
And bought you a bell;
Now go to meeting
Or go to h—l."

THE pastor of a Roman Catholic church in Maine is trying to find some way to make a young man pay his pew rent, but so far has been unsuccessful. The young man asked the priest to perform a marriage ceremony for him some weeks ago, but the request was refused on account of the unpaid pew rent. He went to a neighboring town with his fiance, and was married. Ever since he has regularly attended church and sat in the pew which he had not paid for. The priest has denounced the delinquency from the pulpit, but, as that had no effect, he applied to a Trial Justice for a warrant. The Justice decided that he could do nothing as long as the member made no disturbance, and the fact is he is one of the most quiet and devout worshipers. That is the present situation. The priest continues to preach, the young man continues to attend the church, and continues to refuse to pay his pew rent, and nobody seems to know what to do about it.

IN 1870 France took a month to concentrate 250,000 men, and her reserves numbered only 300,000. Now, according to Capt. Von Fircks of the Prussian staff, the French infantry battalions on a war footing are 1,000 strong; the squadrons, 150 sabres; the mounted batteries 160 men, 120 horses and six guns. In the way of troops ready to take the field France possesses 396 battalions, 296 squadrons, 397 mounted batteries and 57 batteries of horse artillery, 80 companies of engineers, 4 railway companies and 4 pontoon companies; total, 605,000 foot, 44,000 cavalry, 71,700 artillery and 2,700 guns. Neither the staff, military train, administrative or auxiliary services are included in these figures. This host is divided into nineteen army corps—eighteen in France, the nineteenth in Algeria—besides five reserve corps. The nineteen army corps are composed of 34,000 men, 5,500 horses and 120 guns each; the reserve corps of 32,000 men, 4,000 horses and 108 guns. In addition to the field army France possesses the depots of the active army, the wood-rangers and Custom House men, the gendarmerie, the territorial army and the reserve of the territorial army, which, taken altogether, make over 2,000,000 men.

Twice Resurrected.

A San Francisco correspondent writes: The ups and downs of mining towns were well illustrated last week. Long years ago Bodie had its ups and then its down. It was buried, and even Second Adventists did not believe in its resurrection. About three years ago the Bodie mine was reprospected, and a show of gold sent the stock a-kiting and resurrected the town. It was literally born again, and Solomon's Temple, in all its glory, displayed no such brilliance by night as the gorgeous saloons, gambling-shops and groggeries, open as day to public gaze. "Four bits a drink," and "Here is a handful of nuggets I'll bet on that game, either way you darn please. If that don't suit, pay for the drinks or fight." Oh, it was jolly! In a brief year the mine petered out, and silence reigned in Bodie's halls. Only ghostly sobs from spirit-lands were borne on the midnight air from brained gamblers whose stock losses drove them to suicide. Now, again, Gabriel's trump proclaims salvation strikes of gold, and sounds the call to resurrection. Behold! Bodie, that was dead, is alive again. Its highways are all abuzz as of yore, and the old familiar sounds come back—I bet, you bet, he bets. Bodie stock takes a sudden bound from $6 to $40, and from the priest to the shoe-black, from aged women to young maidens—all the world rushes blindly into the gamble!

How Greeley's Cousin Fixed the Stairs

In an out-of-the-way town in New Hampshire lives an eccentric old farmer named Greeley—an own cousin of the lamented Horace, by the way—who found his cellar stairs hard to climb on account of the height of the steps. After careful consideration, he hit upon the device of nailing a piece of two-inch plank on each, in order, he said, to "bring 'em nearer together," and contended that he noticed a "leetle tetch of improvement."—Boston Transcript.

RABID transit—Career of a mad dog.

THE HOME DOCTOR.

FOR THE CURE OF NEURALGIA.—Take two ounces of chloroform, two ounces of chloral hydrate, one and a half ounces of alcohol, one ounce of sulphuric ether, six grains of sulphate morphine, and two drams of oil of peppermint. Put the mixture into a bottle sufficiently large to hold it, cork it tightly, shake it thoroughly, and bathe the part affected frequently. The above is intended for outward application only.

SUNSTROKE.—Now that the "heated term" is upon us, care should be taken to avoid excessively heating the blood, which tends to the attack called sunstroke. They who are temperate and hygienic in their eating and drinking are much less liable to sun-stroke than they who eat "everything they want," and drink wine, whisky or ale. Then, too, the hygienic and they who practice abstinence with respect to alcoholic beverages, when sun-struck, recover much easier from the attack than the drinkers. This is the testimony of all physicians of experience. The treatment of one who has been sun-struck is similar to that required in apoplexy, as the brain-congestion is similar. Cold ablutions over the whole person and ice to the head, considered the best method by many physicians, may do with strong, robust persons, but the majority of cases would sink under such treatment. A better method is to make hot applications, or alternate hot and cold. If hot water can not be obtained at first, bathe the head with tepid water, and, with the hands moistened, rub the extremities, the neck, and the whole length of the spine, rubbing in a downward direction to draw blood from the head. As soon as boiling water can be obtained, put a dry blanket around the body, then wring flannels from the hot water and apply them quickly to the region of the stomach, liver, bowels, and spine over the blanket; also immerse the feet in hot water, or wrap them in hot flannels as far as the body. Re-wring the flannels once every five or eight minutes for half an hour or more, then remove them and apply cool water in the same way, either by cool towels or by sponging with cool water; dry well and rub the surface lightly and briskly with the hand until a glow is produced. As soon as the patient can swallow, give hot water to drink—plenty of it—with occasional bits of ice, or sips of cold water.

SPRAINS.—These are among the more common accidents and are more serious and painful than is commonly supposed. A broken leg or arm is often more readily cured than a sprained ankle or wrist. In sprains, the tendons, ligaments, and soft parts around the joint are stretched and perhaps torn. The first thing to be done is to place the sprained part in the straight or natural position, and to keep it perfectly quiet until the injured parts have resumed their normal state. To reduce the inflammation, warm applications are in most cases the best for the first three or four days, and may be applied in the following manner: Dip a good-sized piece of flannel into a pail or basin full of hot water or hot poppy fomentation—six poppy heads boiled in one quart of water for about a quarter of an hour; wring it almost dry and apply it over the sprained part. Then place another piece of flannel (quite dry) over it, in order that the steam and warmth may not escape. This process should be repeated as often as the patient feels that the flannel next to his skin is getting cold—the oftener the better. If, however, the patient find cold or tepid water more comfortable, it should be used. If the swelling be great, cold water should be applied. The diet should be nourishing, and not tending to constipate the bowels. When the knee is the joint affected, the greatest pain is felt at the inside, and therefore the fomentations should mainly be applied to that part. When the shoulder is sprained, the arm should be kept close to the body by means of a linen roller, which is to be wrapped four or five times round the whole of the chest. It should also be brought two or three times underneath the elbow, in order to raise the shoulder. Gentle friction with the hands, after the swelling and pain have subsided, will help toward recovery. In severe cases, treatment should be applied under direction of a physician.

Optical Delusions.

Some new optical delusions have been described by Dr. S. P. Thompson. Those connected with the railroad may serve to relieve the tedium of travel by affording an agreeable exercise to the mind in endeavoring to explain them: When a landscape is observed from a moving train, all objects to the remote horizon appear to be passing in the contrary direction, those nearest having the greatest velocity. Consequently if the attention be fixed upon any object at some distance from the line, all objects beyond will relatively appear to be moving forwards with the train, while objects nearer appear to be moving backwards. The combined effect is to make the landscape appear to be revolving centrally round whatever point we fix our attention upon. Rain seen from a moving train always seems to fall obliquely (except in a very strong gale in the direction of the train's motion) in a direction opposite to that of the motion of the train. But if another train happens to pass in an opposite direction, and we look out at this and follow it with our eyes, rain-drops falling between the two trains will seem to be flying forwards with ourselves. If we stand upon the platform of a station and watch a train approach, the end of the engine appears to enlarge or swell as it approaches and occupies a larger area of the field of vision. Conversely, the end of the last car of a retreating train appears to shrink down and contract as it diminishes in apparent magnitude. An observer at some light elevation above a railroad, seeing two trains pass along the lines simultaneously in opposite directions, will receive the impression of one long train moving round a circle.

A Test for Color-Blindness.

Chevreul proposes a new test for Daltonism or color-blindness. One-half of a disk is painted with a certain color, and the other half is left white. The disk is then turned at a speed of from 60 to 160 revolutions per minute, and the color complementary to that which had been painted on one-half appears on the white half. The ability to determine the complimentary color constitutes the test.

INDIANA ITEMS.

THE new Court House at Wabash will be dedicated on the 4th of July.

DAVID MITCHELL, who resided five miles east of Salem, was struck by lightning recently.

POOR quality of seed necessitated the replanting of nearly all the corn in Wabash county.

GEORGE W. WALKER, a fourteen-year convict at the Indiana prison, south, made his escape the other day.

MINNIE MCMURREN, a 7-year-old girl, was probably fatally burned at Salem while using coal oil to start a fire.

THE report of the Assessor of Brookville township, Randolph county, shows an increase of $13,000 over last year.

ED. MICHAELS, a son of Elder J. W. Michaels, was drowned in Sugar creek, just below Crawfordsville, while bathing.

THE Ohio and Mississippi Railway Company disregard the "whistling" law, and will continue to do so unless prosecuted.

TIPTON county farmers, whose growing wheat was destroyed by the recent storm, are plowing up the ground and will plant it with corn.

THE expenses of the public schools of New Albany the past school year were, for pay of teachers, $25,154; other expenses, $18,000; total, $44,154.

THE City Council of New Albany has passed a resolution prohibiting policemen electioneering at the polls at city, county, or State elections.

MRS. HENRY WHITMAN, of Sullivan, lived 90 years, and then died suddenly last week from strangulation, caused by the bursting of a blood vessel in her throat.

THE contract for the erection of the new Methodist church at Greencastle has been let for $12,990. The Presbyterian congregation, having bought the old Roberts Chapel, will remodel it at once.

MRS. MARSH, 80 years old, and her daughter, Mrs. Cynthia Williams, of Booneville, were thrown from a buggy by a runaway horse the other day, and the former instantly killed, while the latter was severely injured.

REV. J. P. D. JOHN has resigned the Presidency of Moore's Hill College. Within the past five years the net assets of the college have been increased about $15,000, and the character of the institution was never more enviable.

ROSANNA PETERS, aged 11, was shot in the back in her father's house near Fort Wayne, a few days ago, the ball being fired by a party of young bloods who were passing along the road in an intoxicated condition. She will probably die.

CAPT. JESSE CUSTER, formerly of the Eleventh Indiana regiment, died at Thorntown lately, after a lingering illness. Mr. Custer was a member of the Masonic and I. O. O. F. fraternities, and was well known and respected by all who knew him.

WHILE some boys were carelessly playing with a loaded revolver in the hands of Almon Riddling, at Little York the other day, one of the loaded chambers was accidentally discharged, the ball entering the shoulder of Peter Hanny, from which it is feared he cannot recover.

WILLIAM CHEESEMAN, one of the pioneers of Indiana and the first mail-carrier entering Indianapolis from the East, died at his residence in Richmond lately of general paralysis, caused by old age. He was known as the author of the legendary phrase, "The woods is full of 'em."

THOMAS E. KACKLEY, of Vincennes, a prominent politician and farmer, was badly injured by a reaper, while harvesting, one day last week. The mules became unmanageable, throwing Kackley before the knives. His leg was broken in three places.

ROBERT J. HUGHES and John I. Spray, two bad characters who were sent to the Northern prison for burglarizing a store at Waynetown last winter, have confessed to having murdered Tim O'Connel, about two years ago. O'Connel had received a month's wages. They murdered him and threw his body on the railroad, where it was run over by the night train, and thus the cause of his death was concealed.

THE High School Board of Fort Wayne forbade the presentation of bouquets at the commencement exercises. The exercises had not progressed far, however, before the order was violated, and the fair recipient refused to surrender her floral tribute. Great excitement prevailed, and a squad of police appeared, when the lady surrendered her bouquet and left the stage, followed by eight members of the class. The exercises were at length continued, but great excitement and confusion continued until the close.

MRS. ELIZA WEIR, aged 66, the wife of John Y. Weir, of Memphis, Clarke county, has been afflicted with rheumatism for two weeks past, and one evening last week she, to all appearances, died. The family made the necessary arrangements to prepare the corpse for burial, but about an hour after her supposed death Mrs. Weir gave one groan, and commenced breathing. The people in the house were horrified and ran out, screaming loudly; but one woman stood near the corpse and called out, "Mrs. Weir." She answered, "Oh!" and has not spoken since, but lies in an unconscious condition, and breathing naturally. The affair has caused great excitement in Memphis.

THE Burlington Hawk-Eye grammarian is again at it. He says: "Ah, young man, if you only had not of dyed your linen ulster last fall for to make of it a overcoat, you wouldn't not now had to of bought a linen duster for your summer wear."

Section 5,522.

It is desirable that every American citizen shall carefully consider the kernel of the law which the mouth-piece of the Republican party has just declared must be retained upon the statute book for the "protection" of voters. Read, learn, mark and inwardly digest this poisonous blossoming of partisan ingenuity. It reads:

Section 5,522. Every person, whether with or without any authority, power or process, or pretended authority, power or process, of any State, Territory or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the Supervisors of Election, or either of them, or the Marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or who, by any of the means before mentioned, hinders or prevents the free attendance and presence at such places of registration, or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or in going to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes or rejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing votes thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any Supervisor of Election, the Marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them; or who threatens or attempts, or offers so to do, or refuses or neglects to aid and assist any Supervisor of Election, or the Marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the costs of the prosecution.

That is a statute against the exercise of a free ballot, as has been adequately demonstrated by the operation of the law. Let us suppose the Democrats had been in power and had passed such a law as that and the bayonet law. Of course the Republicans would have loved the arrangement by which the elections in the South are environed and scrutinized with the vigor, penetration, impudence and intolerance of French prefects and their hirelings under MacMahon, by the hirelings of the party in power. The Republicans would, of course, rejoice to see Democratic Marshals and Deputy Marshals by the thousand, under the direction of Democratic Supervisors and the Department of Justice, blocking the way to the polls, arresting Republicans at sight, before they had voted, and putting them in filthy cages. They would be delighted, of course, to see Democratic Marshals running around with their hands full of Democratic tickets, armed with bludgeons and pistols, and threatening with immediate arrest everybody who held a Republican ticket. How delighted, too, would the Republicans be if they had to walk through files of soldiers to the polling places and have their ballots refused. How ecstatic, indeed, would our Republican fellow-citizens be over a law which authorizes the President to crowd the vicinity of polls with soldiers?

Yet the law they have passed works exactly in that way, and they have the impudence to inform us, and Mr. Hayes informs us in his last veto message, that the law is designed to "protect" voters and the ballot-box from violence and fraud. They have the assurance to denounce the Democracy as "revolutionists" for seeking to deliver American citizens from such tyranny. Had the Democrats been in power, and passed such laws, the Republicans would have shouted themselves hoarse in behalf of "State rights" and "personal liberty." No element of our population of 49,000,000 is more tenacious of State rights than Republicans when laws are executed which infringe upon them at home. Let the Federal election or bayonet law be put in operation in Maine or Vermont as it has been in New York, and the States of Blaine and Edmunds would be in an uproar.

Let voters read that shameful clause of the Revised Statutes which we have quoted, and ask themselves if a more partisan and unrepublican law was ever framed. Mr. Hayes says the elections must be supervised from Washington by partisan emissaries and electioneerers, labeled, "Stand up for your party." That is the Republican plea. That plea and the corrupt party which makes it must be overthrown at the polls in 1880. —New York Sun.

Thirty-Eight Millions Saved.

It is a notorious fact that since the breaking out of the war no Congress or House of Representatives was so absolutely free from scandal and jobbery as during the last five years. When the much-abused Democrats and "rebels" obtained control of the House not only a political, but a moral change took place. Bribery and corruption ceased to flourish. The lobby disappeared. Credit Mobilier and Pacific Mail and McGarrahan claims became impossible. Even subsidies of vital importance to the South and of general merit, such as the South of Texas Pacific railroad, or the Brazilian steam line, were refused time and again—refused by the votes of these very rebels, when such shining Republicans as Stanley Matthews or Blaine, and Conkling and Garfield were their zealous advocates.

So that in every conceivable respect the practice of these villified Confederate Brigadiers is precisely opposed to the prediction of these Republican partisan prophets.

On the other hand, both in 1872 and 1874 and 1876, the Democrats promised economy and retrenchment if they came into power. Well, since 1875 they did have the power to check the extravagant appropriations of the Republicans. And what is the result? What is the official record?

In 1876 the appropriations were actually $16,000,000 less than in 1875.

In 1877 the appropriations were actually $20,000,000 less than in 1876.

In 1878 they were still $2,000,000 less than in 1877.

So that the practical result of the presence of the Confederate Brigadiers, and the absence of a Republican majority, is this:

That in three years—1876, 1877 and 1878—the actual cost of the Government has been reduced the amount of $38,000,000.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

The Ohio Campaign.

Gen. Thomas Ewing, Democratic candidate for Governor of Ohio, now in this city, says: "So far as I can judge, the prospects for a Democratic victory in Ohio were never better than they are to-day. If we can carry Ohio we can carry Illinois, and other States of the West and Northwest will be sure to be with us. We are going to have a hot and lively campaign, the most exciting we ever had in Ohio."

"You regard it, then, as the key-note of the Presidential campaign for 1880?"

"Very much so. The campaign will be fought greatly on national issues."

"How about the recent vetoes of Hayes?"

"They will help us very much."

"How about the Election law, Supervisors and Marshals at the polls?"

"Many Republicans, I know, are with us, and we expect to add some of their votes to those of the united Democracy in favor of a free ballot-box."

"Do you expect there will be much of a cry made by the Republicans about Confederate Brigadiers in this canvass?"

"Well, they won't wave the bloody shirt much. I guess Rice and myself, with only three legs between us, can beat Foster and Hickenlooper on four legs when they come to the military part of the canvass."

"How about the Greenback vote?"

"We expect to deplete the Greenback ranks by the stand we have taken in favor of the unlimited coinage of silver."

"You don't think this will be in any sense a rag-baby campaign?"

"Oh, no. We differ from the Greenbackers in that our chief wish on the paper-money question is to substitute Government money for national-bank money."

"How about the Presidential candidates?"

"We hope the Republicans will nominate Grant. We are not afraid of him or Sherman either. As for Tilden, some think he is entitled to the nomination; others think some other man would be stronger."—New York World.

"Easy Writing Cursed Hard Reading."

Few people conceive that incessant authorship, if pursued without due relaxation, will wear a man out, down to the point of killing him. They are oblivious of the sad or sudden way in which the careers of Scott, Southey, Thackeray, Dickens, and others have come to a close. They cannot connect labor with literary works over which they shake with laughter, or smile with delight. It all reads so easy and natural. The most they concede is that "it is a gift," which, to a certain extent, is true. For the rest, authors, they fancy, write as spontaneously and with as little trouble as thrushes and blackbirds sing in a grove. "It is like picking up money in the street," says a slightly educated person, on beholding a check received for contributions to a popular periodical. Perhaps the belief that no trouble need be taken is one cause of the failure of many would-be authors. "Your easy writing," says Byron, "is cursed hard reading." Editors of magazines could contribute volumes full of instances, some provoking, some laughably absurd, and some simply contemptible. Of this last class are the hideous wisps of slovenly manuscript, destitute of a single finished English sentence—those wretched, sloppy compounds of crude ideas and careless diction which make one think sadly of wasted life. What a museum of literary curiosities might be collected from rejected manuscripts—among which colorless ink, illegible handwriting, illogical punctuation and crowded interpolations would conspicuously figure. The transcription of a fair copy seems held to be a needless labor, the compositors' eyesight hardly worth regarding. Luckily this class of "copy" does not often, as a rule, go to press. But, if such authors complain of being poor, the publishers may well reply: "Yes; because you are such very poor authors."—London Society.

Whitewash for Outside Work.

First, whitewash, it is well known, passes to a carbonate of lime in a few days by absorbing carbonic acid from the air, and, being soluble to a certain extent in water, is soon washed off when exposed to the rains. To prevent this a wash prepared as follows lasts much longer: To half a bushel of good lime add enough water to slake and be about the consistence of a thick sirup, and, while hot, add half a gallon of linseed oil and stir well. To this mixture add half a pound of common glue, dissolved in a gallon of boiling water After letting it stand a few hours, thin it with water to the proper consistence, for applying, and it is ready for use. Some parties recommended the addition of salt and others sulphate of zinc, but I cannot see any plausible theory to satisfy me that there is any advantage in their use. With the linseed oil an insoluble soap is formed (oleate of lime), and the glue forms an insoluble cement which protects the lime from the dissolving influence of the water. It is possible that tallow will answer the same purpose, as the resulting compound would be the same—oleate of lime—the glycerine of the fat being set free. Second—To every four quarts of slakened lime add one-half pint of boiled glue, a lump of alum about twice the size of a hickory nut and one tablespoonful of salt, with just sufficient bluing to give a pure white tint. Third—Slake lime in the usual way; mix a handful of flour with cold water, taking care not to have lumps; then pour on boiling water until it becomes like common starch; pour it while hot into the slaked lime; add one pound of whiting and two ounces of powdered borax; stir all well together in a bucket. Fourth—Whitewash for outside exposure is made by slaking one-half bushel of lime in a barrel, adding one pound of common salt, one-half pound of the sulphate of zinc, and a gallon of sweet milk.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, JULY 3d, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

* * *

Gen. Ewing will be the next governor of Ohio.

* * *

We are indebted to congressman Colerick, for valuable public documents.

* * *

The first session of the 46th congress adjourned, Tuesday, the 1st inst., at 5 o'clock P. M.

* * *

It is asserted upon good authority, that if Mr. Hendricks is the democratic nominee for president, he will receive 10,000 more votes in the state of New York than Tilden would.

* * *

A noted Chinese labor-contractor is now in Kentucky proposing to lease Chinese laborers in that state for two or three years, at $12. per month and board. Does not that seem a little like human slavery?

* * *

Of the twenty democratic editors at the convention held at Syracuse last week, nineteen favored Hendricks for president, while but one favored the old ticket. Among the republican editors eleven were for Grant and seven for John Sherman.

* * *

O'Leary won, in the 75-hour pedestrian match for the championship of the world, which took place at the Chicago exposition building last week. He made 250 miles in 74 hours and 40 minutes, against Crossland's 225 miles and three laps. The champion will have to do better walking than that if he retains the belt.

* * *

Capt. Eads, the eminent engineer who constructed the jetties at the mouths of the Mississippi, proposes to substitute for the contemplated ship canal at Panama, a railroad by which the largest vessels may be conveyed across the isthmus. The conveyance requires 1,000 wheels, with a road-bed forty feet wide and eight or ten rails. Eads claims that the project is entirely practicable, that it would be only one fourth the cost of a canal, although more profitable, and the road may be completed in three or four years.

* * *

Here is a bit of oratory from John A. Logan, which the editor of the Baltimore Gazette says, did not appear in the Congressional Record, though it was delivered in the United States senate when he (the editor) was present, Johnny said:

"I ain't been yet in a position to hear such sentiments as those norated through the settlement, but I have long suspicioned in my own mind that there is men, in this body which would, if they have the power, pluck the blue empyrean from the ægis of the American eagle without stopping to reflect where the country was going to or drifting at."

Logan is an educated (?) statesman, and belongs to the stalwart branch of the republican party.

* * *

The following, from the Fort Wayne News, an independent paper, deserves credit from the democratic papers in the state, and is worthy of a hearty second by all democrats. The News gets down to solid truth when it says:

"Indiana democrats should stand firm by Hendricks. He, at least, is an honest man and a gentleman, and cannot, while preserving his self-respect, again accept a second place on a ticket with Tilden."

The fact of his being "an honest man and a gentleman" cannot be questioned, and as to the "second place on a ticket with Tilden," he has rather effectually preserved his self-respect some time ago. A ticket with Governor Hendricks as first and best man is the one we want, and we will have it.

* * *

Probably the greatest feat ever done in the way of track-laying, was that of changing the gauge of the Iron Mountain railroad from broad to standard guage, the entire line of nearly 700 miles being changed in eight hours. The St. Louis Globe-Democrat in a recent issue gives the following particulars:

"Three thousand men, allowing four laborers to the mile, were distributed over the road yesterday morning before sunrise. Each division was in charge of its superintendent, who were in turn represented by roadmasters, who acted as overseers to the section bosses. As soon as it was light the work commenced. At every two miles there were eight men. They divided into two parties, going in opposite directions, being instructed to keep working until they met the parties coming the other way from the adjoining sections. With a "claw" the remaining spikes were pulled from the rails by one man of the party. Another, with a crowbar, jammed the now free rail close up to the spikes already in the ties, two more men followed to fasten the rail to its new home, and the boss of the gang with a gauge constantly tried the position of the rails. The fish plates fastening the rails were not loosened, and practically there was no break in the road throughout its length during the entire work. On bridges both rails were moved in, one and one third inches in order that the weight of the trains should be evenly distributed. The same thing was done in tunnels, for obvious reasons. New frogs and switch bars had been distributed at the points where they were needed and were quickly put in place. Stupendous as the work was, it was a very simple operation, everything depending upon the discipline preserved and the promptness with which general orders were carried out. By 2 o'clock the work was finished.

If Conkling has an exalted opinion of Charlie Foster, the republican candidate for governor of Ohio, then the following Washington dispatch to the Cincinnati Enquirer misrepresents him. Conkling having been invited by Robinson, chairman of the republican executive committee, to make a few speeches in Ohio during the campaign, said:

"Are there no republicans in Ohio to conduct their own campaign?" "Oh, plenty," added Robinson, "but we would be pleased to have you come into the state and make a speech in Foster's interest." At this announcement of Foster's name Conkling assumed a meditative air: "Foster, Foster, Foster," said he. "You mean Chas. Foster, I presume?" Robinson, rather taken aback, said: "Yes, sir, Charles Foster." Conkling turned on his heel to go, but before doing so said: "So Charles Foster has turned to be a republican, has he? I am glad of his conversion; but I never knew that he was a republican before."

* * *

A representative of the Indianapolis Sentinel recently visited the town of Anderson, in Madison county, and while there was carted through the city by Hon(?) Edgar Henderson. The Sentinel man devotes considerable space to Mr. Henderson, by way of an introduction to the democrats of the state, and closes that branch of his letter with the following "puff." "He is a stalwart democrat and has a political future. Mark the prediction." We mark, and if we are not very much mistaken Mr. Henderson's "political future" will be d—n dark, in this neck o' wood's. We take pleasure in introducing this man with a "political future," to the democrats of DeKalb county, as the person who follows the notorious George Hazzard through the country and takes pleasure in signing all the numerous bonds that Hazzard is required to execute for his crookedness. There is about 2187 democratic votes in DeKalb county that Edgar Henderson will never get, his "political future" to the contrary notwithstanding. "Mark the prediction."

* * *

The republican soldiers of Terre Haute attempted to get up a soldiers meeting at that place on last Monday evening, for the purpose of denouncing Senator Voorhees, for saying in his recent speech that he was as good a friend of the soldier as Gov. Morton was. The soldiers who are now democrats and nationals were present in force, and, although the republicans were permitted to organize the meeting without opposition, when it came to the resolutions, it was moved that the chair appoint a committee of five to draft resolutions, but an amendment was offered by M. C. Rankin, of the Express, providing for a committee of six, to be composed of an equal number of democrats, nationals and republicans. After a hot fight the amendment was carried, and the committee, consisting of two from each party, was appointed. After the appointment of this committee, the republicans gave up the fight and adjourned in disgust. The friends of Senator Voorhees left the hall with flying colors, cheering and shouting for the Tall Sycamore.

Two of the Goshen banks are having a lawsuit concerning deposits. It appears that Gen. Hascall, of the Salem bank, had more money than he knew what to do with, and put it in the hands of several persons to be deposited in the bank of Thomas & Heffner, certificates bearing interest being issued therefor, and assigned by the parties to whom they were issued, to the Salem bank. Thomas & Heffner soon learned of the trick, and sent the money to the Salem bank and demanded their certificates. Gen. Hascall would not give them up, and suit was commenced in the circuit court for a cancellation of the certificates. An attempt was made by the attorneys in the case to settle the difficulty; they came within 60 cents of an adjustment, and one of the attorneys proposed to pay that out of his own pocket, but Gen. Hascall refused unless the record would show that the money was paid by the other bank, which was not agreed to. The case will probably go to the supreme court at a cost of several hundred dollars, in order to decide who shall pay the 60 cents. Banks, however, are exempt from attorney fees; they have that advantage over poor people.

* * *

The speech of Hon. D. W. Voorhees, recently delivered in the Senate, was the most effective "brigadier" boomerang that ever struck the radical leaders. Among the confederate "brigadiers" named as having been brought into national politics by the radical party, were Akerman, Key, Hughes, Mosley, Settle, Holden, the Barringers, Lusk, Young, Orr, Northup, Morphis, Hunt, Walter, Chandler, Henderson, Buchanan, Longstreet, Wharton, Hough, Leonard, Smith, Johnson, Boarman, Hebert, Humphreys and scores of other who were rampant secesh, and most of them officers in the confederate army, all appointed by Grant and Hayes to important and responsible positions, with the understanding that they must vote the republican ticket and act with the radical party. No rebel who has ever agreed to vote the radical ticket has ever been refused the "affectionate political embrace" of the radical party. "On the contrary, all such have had seats of dignity and robes of honor assigned," says Voorhees. Yet, the republican leaders refuse to affiliate with the men of the south who choose to vote the democratic ticket. "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

Henri Waterson, of the Louisville Courier-Journal, surrenders to Senator Conkling, of New York, and accompanies the delivery of his "bullying" diploma with the following pointed opinion:

"He (Conkling) wouldn't fight a louse unless he thought he had a dead sure thing of it. Everybody knows, who knows anything, that he is an unprincipled, ill-bred and ill-mannered braggadocio, sprung originally from the slums. His marriage into a respectable family gave him a start in the world, which his bullying and stage talents have continued to push. He does not even consider himself a gentleman, and he will wear the insult which offensiveness and vulgarity wrung from Lamar meekly. His private life for several years has been so equivocal that no decent woman can afford to appear in his company. All that he is after is to get some southern senator to kick him into martyrdom. Blaine knows him."

Waterson's picture of Conkling is not overdrawn, yet it reminds one of the altercation between the pot and the kettle.

* * *

The following, which we clip from the Cincinnati Enquirer, seems to indicate that Gen. Cary, the head of the national party in Ohio, will support Gen. Ewing in the coming campaign in that state.

"Reporter—We infer, then, that you will support Ewing in this canvass?

Cary—What else can I do under the circumstances? I could not support any body, however worthy, upon the Pomeroy-Preyer-Piatt platform. My party has made no nomination. Chief Justice Chase before his death predicted that the time would come 'when the PEOPLE WOULD BE ARRAYED UPON ONE SIDE AND THE NATIONAL BANKS ON THE OTHER IN A CONFLICT SUCH AS HAS NEVER BEEN SEEN IN THIS COUNTRY.' That time has come, and the democratic party in Ohio, in its platform and in the nomination of Ewing, has boldly taken the side of the people in the contest and I believe it to be my patriotic duty as a national to sustain him. I shall bandy no epithets with those honest nationals who differ with me. They may charge me with 'selling out.' Those who make such charges must see to it that they are not venal, and that they are not guilty of the offense which they impute to others. I am willing that my past political record shall be the standard by which I shall be judged. Let my accusers point out when and where I have wavered or faltered in the support of the doctrines I now advocate. Parties I recognize as only instruments for the attainment of desirable ends. I care nothing for mere party but am ready at any and all times to work with any party which will take the side of the suffering and toiling millions of our people.

Reporter—Will you take the stump in Ohio during this campaign?

Cary—It is more than probable, but if I do it will be to enforce the doctrines of the national party and advocate the election of Ewing, not because he is a democrat, but because his views on the labor and finance question harmonize with my own."

* * *

Since so much has been said by the press of the country recently, concerning the Conkling-Blaine controversy which occurred April 30, 1866, we have taken the trouble to look the matter up for the benefit of our readers. The subject under discussion was the investigation of Provost Marshal General Fry for frauds charged by Conkling in the Provost Marshal's Department of the western division of New York. Blaine had criticised Conkling's volubility of speech and charged that Conkling was prosecutor in the case, and produced a letter from Assistant Secretary of War Dana to Conkling, and read the law against the latter acting in any such capacity. This Conkling denied, and Blaine, wishing to interject a remark, Cokling said: "I do not wish to have anything to do with the member from Maine, not even so much as to yield to him the floor. If the member from Maine had the least idea how profoundly indifferent I am to his opinion on this or any other subject personal to me, I think he would hardly take the trouble to rise here and express his opinion." And in apologizing to the house for delaying the proceedings, he characterized Blaine's interruptions as "ungentlemanly and impertinent." Blaine, awaiting his opportunity, took the floor and said: "As to the gentleman's cruel sarcasm, I hope he will not be too severe. The contempt of that large minded gentleman is so wilting, his haughty disdain, his grandiloquent swell, his majestic, supereminent, overpowering, turkey-gobbler's strut has been so crushing to myself and all the members of this house that I know it was an act of great temerity for me to enter upon a controversy with him. I know that within the last five weeks, as members of the house will recollect, an extra strut has characterized the gentleman's bearing. It is not his fault; it is the fault of another. That gifted and satirical writer, Theodore Tilton, of the New York Independent, spent some weeks in this city. His letters published in that paper, embraced, with many serious statements, a little jocose satire, a part of which was the statement that the mantle of the late Winter Davis had fallen upon the member from New York. The gentleman took it seriously and it has given his strut additional pomposity. The resemblance is great. Hyperion to a Satyr; Thersites to Hercules; mud to marble; dunghill to diamond; a singed cat to a Bengal tiger; a whining puppy to a roaring lion. Shades of the mighty Davis, forgive the almost profanity of that jocose satire." The Senator from New York kept his seat in silence.

CELEBRATED

FOR THE CURE OF

Hepatitis, or Liver Complaint,

DYSPEPSIA AND SICK HEADACHE.

Symptoms of a Diseased Liver.

PAIN in the right side, under the edge of the ribs, increases on pressure; sometimes the pain is in the left side; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left side; sometimes the pain is felt under the shoulder blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the shoulder, and is sometimes mistaken for rheumatism in the arm. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness; the bowels in general are costive, sometimes alternative with lax; the head is troubled with pain, accompanied with a dull, heavy sensation in the back part. There is generally a considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. A slight, dry cough is sometimes an attendant. The patient complains of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his feet are cold or burning, and he complains of a prickly sensation of the skin; his spirits are low; and although he is satisfied that exercise would be beneficial to him, yet he can scarcely summon up fortitude enough to try it. In fact, he distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred where few of them existed, yet examination of the body, after death, has shown the LIVER to have been extensively deranged.

AGUE AND FEVER.

DR. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, IN CASES OF AGUE AND FEVER, when taken with Quinine, are productive of the most happy results. No better cathartic can be used, preparatory to, or after taking Quinine. We would advise all who are afflicted with this disease to give them a FAIR TRIAL.

For all bilious derangements, and as a simple purgative, they are unequaled.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The genuine are never sugar coated.

Every box has a red wax seal on the lid, with the impression DR. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS.

The genuine McLANE'S LIVER PILLS bear the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS. on the wrappers.

Insist upon having the genuine DR. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, prepared by Fleming Bros., of Pittsburgh, Pa., the market being full of imitations of the name McLane, spelled differently but same pronunciation.

Auburn Courier.

Local and Miscellaneous

—Upmeyer.

—Yes, Upmeyer.

—H. H. G. Upmeyer.

—At Odd Fellows' building.

—Sells dry-goods terrible cheap.

—'Rah for FourthJuly.

—"Lawyer" Coats. Ahem!

—How about the Auburn band?

—Auburn will be dead to-morrow.

—Where are you going to-morrow?

—Tramps wanted, in the harvest field.

—To-morrow—but you know it yourself.

—Summer clothing in endless variety at Upmeyer's.

—I. N. Cool has put in a hay-scale at his livery barn.

—Pleasure rides to the junction are expensive;—$20 apiece.

—The finest line of ladies' fancy-goods in the city at Upmeyer's.

—Frank Lens embarked last Monday for Indianapolis, via the Saginaw.

—Mrs. F. E. Davenport is still confined to her bed, and is in a feeble condition.

—Mr. James Moore sent us a nice lot of new potatoes, for which he has our thanks.

—Miss Abbie Potter is visiting friends at Ashland, Ohio. She started last Friday.

—When the ladies want real nice goods, at real low prices, they go to Upmeyer's.

—Frank Copper must have a "solid" girl. He wears a fresh button-hole bouquet twice a day.

—Charley Emanuel had the snakes Tuesday night—a painfully real case of jim-jams—in his dreams.

—Arbuckle's Ariosa coffee only 20 cents per pound, at Upmeyer's, and other groceries in proportion.

—Mrs. R. H. Weamer went up to Angola Tuesday evening, where she will visit Mr. and Mrs. July Fourth.

—D. D. Snyder went down to Fort Wayne last Monday, on an excurt of his own, and returned—Monday.

—Newville and Angola items crowded out. Press of previous matter has monopolized the space this week.

—Mrs. J. W. Shaffer, and daughter, paid a visit to Fort Wayne yesterday. They were on a shopping excursion.

—If you have some real nice cherries, to apply on subscription, bring them along at any time except on Saturday.

—A harp and violin, accompanied by two sorrowful looking Italians, discoursed sweet melodies on the stilly night air Tuesday.

—Did you know that Upmeyer had added a full line of groceries to his large stock of dry-goods, in the Odd Fellows' building?

—Needs looking into—A telescope.—Syracuse Herald.

Needs looking over—The tight-board fence at the fair-grounds.

—Byron Rainier challenges the town for a foot-race, distance 100 yards, and for any amount not exceeding $10. Chip in, you fleet-footed Arabs.

—Schaab Beugnot & Co., have the largest and best selected stock of clothing ever brought to DeKalb county at prices 15 per cent. below all competition.

—A judgment of $175.60 was rendered against the county this week, for damages caused by a defective bridge. It pays to keep bridges in good repair.

—A few cords of dry stove-wood, split fine, 18 to 22 inches long, can be disposed of on subscription at this office.

—You are wasting time and money if you do not purchase your notions, fancy goods, hosiery, dry-goods, clothing, groceries etc., at Upmeyer's C. O. D. store.

—A number of willing hands are at work on the base-ball ground, and it will soon be in fine condition. Then let the visiting nines prepare for a walk-away.

—Miss Lida A. Powers, we are sorry to say, has left us for a short time. She went Tuesday morning to Greensburgh, this state, where she will remain about three months.

—Mr. Large and Miss Hart, of Lagrange, were made up into one person June 21. A clear case of "two Harts that beat as one;" and what a great Large Hart it must be.

—The proceedings of the meeting of the Indiana Editorial Association, held last week at Syracuse, though already in type, cannot appear until next week, owing to an abundance of other matter which we must give place to.

—The addition to the business rooms of Schaab, Beugnot & Co., is now well filled with goods in their line, which are being sold at prices lower than ever before heard of. Give the boys a call.

—Mr. J. U. Miller, editor of the Steuben Republican, has our thanks for the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Northern Indiana Editorial Association, held at Syracuse last week.

—M. F. Leonard, who has served at the junction for some time past, has ceased operations, and is succeeded by W. B. McClaren, from New Baltimore. The change occurred Tuesday morning last.

—The best place in northern Indiana to buy dry goods, clothing, hats and groceries is at Schaab, Beugnot & Co.'s, as they have no rent to pay, and do their own work they are able to sell goods 15 per cent. below the lowest.

—Two coaches and a sleeping car on the B. & O., jumped the track near Shelby junction, a few days since, two of them turning completely over. Several persons were injured, we learn, but none seriously.

—Miss Ida Mahurin's remains arrived from Auburn Thursday and the funeral took place from the Wayne street M. E. church on Friday. The attendance was large and the services impressive. The body was interred at Lindenwood.—Saturday's Ft. Wayne Sentinel.

—A ball will be given at Hunsel's hall, in Garrett, Friday evening, July 4, to which all are invited. Preparations have been made for a pleasant time, and a large number will be in attendance. Tickets only 75 cents. Take it in.

—Fred. S. Clark, the popular attache of the junction, got home Tuesday of last week from a pleasant trip through Wisconsin and several other large towns. Fred. says he took it all in and got his money's worth, and we believe he did.

—Seeing Dr. Matheny cutting weeds around his premises, suggested to us that it would improve the appearance of the town if others would do likewise. Borrow your neighbors scythe and go to work, and after the weeds are cut and dried, burn them.

—George Durkee, aside from his duties as night-watchman, is now a permanent fixture in the C. O. D. dry-goods and clothing establishment, under the COURIER office. He and Jay make a full team, and can wait on six or eight customers at once.

—The county commissioners have been devoting this week to the letting of contracts for building bridges and making fills to the same, throughout the county. The contracts are being let at lower prices than were ever made before for that kind of work.

—Abright, the jeweler, had a little 4th of Ju-New-Years all to himself Tuesday evening. He sent up a hot-air balloon and it struck right out for Waterloo, and then Billy Shaffer kicked himself in several places because he hadn't hooked on to the tail end of it.

—Our young friend Henry McIntyre is still soliciting subscriptions for the purpose of organizing a band, and we would urge those who have not yet been called on, or even those who have, to consider the object and respond as liberally as their means will allow.

—A gravel train consisting of eleven cars will leave the Saginaw depot Sunday after next for the lake, whereit goes for the purpose of bringing back gravel for the streets of Auburn. A large force of hands is wanted, and all who will go are requested to be on hand.

T. P. SCOTT, Marshal.

—The chances for a good ball nine this season are favorable, as the boys have warmed up to it and are anxious to organize. Auburn has the material for a club that could carry off the cake at least in this neighborhood, and she ought to get down to her work and sustain it.

—Angola has a nice young man who has smoked for five years, but never in business hours. The Herald says any one who has such control of himself ought to quit altogether. Should think so; though he probably smokes at somebody else's expense, and because it looks "manly"—not because he likes it.

—The Wabash Courier offers one year's subscription as a premium to any Wabash county democrat who will produce, between now and the next presidential election, a pair of miniature democrats in the shape of male twins. The idea!—but how the boys and girls (married ones, we mean,) will go in for that prize!

—Some of the boys, in whom there is much guile, put up a job on Kib's little white dorg, Tuesday, with a fire-cracker; it was done purp-osely, too, and if we were that purp, we'd lay for the fellows who purp-etrated it. (The writer of the foregoing pun will get off no more; he now sleeps quietly 'neath the daisies, cold in death).

—By the closest scrutiny of our exchanges, and by reliable information gleaned from numerous other sources, we are prepared to assure our readers, boldy and unhesitatingly, that to-morrow will be Friday. No, that isn't what we wanted to remark; let's see—oh, yes! to-morrow will be July the four times! Put it down.

—We are informed by Henry McIntyre, who has taken the matter in hand and is soliciting assistance, that the subscriptions to the band project have been quite numerous and encouraging. Though a number have contributed very liberally, he says there are some who are abundantly able to do so but refuse, while a few decline to contribute anything whatever.

—"Why, papa," said a Main street girl to her father, as he meandered into the parlor, away along in the night, while she and her favored one were holding down one rocking-chair, "what are you looking for?" "Oh, nothin'; I just thought I'd get up to see the sun rise." Then the clock struck and the son rose and vanished, and the old man went back to pound his ear.

—The ladies' missionary meeting will be held in the lecture room of the M. E. church next Saturday afternoon, at half past two o'clock. A full attendance is desired. There will also be a public meeting in the audience room of the same church, on next Sabbath evening. The programme will consist of essays, recitations, etc.

MRS. ENOS CASEBEER, Sec'y.

—Cas. J. Coats, the pleasant young gentleman who has been reading law for some time with Messrs. Rose & Hartman, was yesterday admitted to the bar, and we have no doubt but that he will be a shining light in the profession. He is a worthy young man, at all events, and the COURIER will pleasurably note his ascension to the top of the ladder.

—Frank Davenport is mad, and we don't blame him. He bought twenty cents' worth of "garden sass" from a man yesterday, who hitched his team, when delivering it, to one of Frank's most beautiful shade-trees, and the tree is now nearly stripped of its bark. Men who have lived thirty or forty years on this beautiful earth ought to be possessed of a little more common sense.

—A team belonging to Cook Ford, and attached to his finest two-seated carriage, took fright at the abominable Cadwallader screeching of a B. & O. engine, on Wednesday evening of last week, and played particular h—avoc with the whole outfit. Mr. Leonard, who was then employed at the junction, did his best to hold them, being at their heads, but was forced to release them to save himself. Now, who next?

—The following tender missive was picked up last week by one of our dry-goods clerks, and we give it to our readers as received. "Joe" evidently meant business, and it is to be hoped his fond hopes were not shattered. Here it is:

"FRIEND ET:—Can you meet me to-night? I wood like to go to Butler to the show. If you can, let me now. I have Lots to tell you. meet me at the grave Yard to night at 6 or 7. JOE."

—The COURIER acknowledges—with a low bow—the receipt of an elaborate invitation from Harry Rutter, Auditor of Whitley Co., to attend the "Dedication" at Columbia City, July 4. The ceremony, from all indications, will be very impressive, even though the atmosphere may be oppressive, and it is with bitterest regret that we are forced to decline; but we are suffering with a severe cold, anyway, and doubtless could not fully appreciate the exercises.

—Miss Eliza Stahl had a streak of bad luck, a few days since, mingled in the end with some exceedingly good. She lost her pocket-book containing some $34, the amount of her earnings as school teacher for the past term, having only paid her board out of it; but fortunately, it was found by an honest man—Geo. Clark—who identified it by some cards bearing the owner's name, which it contained, and he agreeably surprised the young lady by returning it to her. It would have been quite a loss.

—License to marry issued to the following parties, by County Clerk Moss, during the month of June.

Charles Wood and Catharine Fry, Henry Hevel and Clarissa J. Goss, Fremont Abel and Mary Jane Thompson, Gideon P. Macklin and Mary E. Arford David N. Terny and Cordelia Knott, Ethelbert B. Hornby and Sarah A. DeWitt, Ira R. Baragar and Mrs. Caroline Shreve, Wm. Casey and Henrietta Beard Albert B. Tyrrill and Clara E. Salisburg, Peter J. Showalter and Clara E. Wheelock, Geo. H. Miles and Cora Johnson Isaac Tyron and Junietta M. Holden.

—Jerry Collins, of Wabash, junior editor of the Courier, a newspaper which, by-the way, occupies a lofty position in our pile of exchanges, was unfortunate enough to get "doubled up," on Monday of last week. Cucumbers didn't do it, however, this time; it was a minister who did it with his little say-so, and the lady in the drama who bravely risked her future with an editor—a toiling, greasy, ink-slinging editor—was Miss Lettie Fitzgerald, of Logansport.

One more unfortunate,
Heedless and merry,
Rashly importunate—
Taken in by J—erry.

—From the appended article it will be seen that Zimmerman, of the Messenger, is liable to be summoned home at any moment. To our complaint of two weeks ago, Bro. Myers, of the Standard, files his answer in these words:

"The junior of the Auburn COURIER intimates that the Standard did him injustice by stating that he was married to a Valparaiso lady. If the report is untrue, as Bro. Lowry intimates, we are sorry, and take it all back, but if we ever catch Zimmerman, of the Valparaiso Messenger, all alone by himself, in the woods, at midnight, unarmed, with a bottle in his pocket, we will settle the matter, as he led us into making the statement."

—The select school taught by Maggie Willard, in the ward school building closed last Friday. The following named pupils were neither tardy or absent during the three months term.

FIRST MONTH.

Laura Ober, Berthie Henry, Frankie Henry, Blanch Martin, Mary April, Effie Guersenslager, Wesley Lanum, Johnie Ober, Frankie Camel, Charlie Spake, Willie Brandon, Arra Brandon.

Notice to the Citizens of Auburn.

Marshal Scott received a telegram from T. H. Sprott yesterday, stating that the gravel-train could not be secured for next Sunday, but can be had on Sunday the 13th inst. sure. Then, every person that feels disposed to handle a shovel for the benefit of our streets, is requested to turn out and lend a helping hand.

Lasting.

So lasting is the odor of Dr. Price's Pet Rose, Ylang Ylang, Thibet Musk, Alista Bouquet, and other scents, that a handkerchief being perfumed with them will still retain the odor after being washed. No one who has used Dr. Price's Unique Perfumes can have failed to notice their rich, fresh fragrance.

Spencerville.

—Tub races!

—Fire-works! pic-nics!

—Dances! catching greased pigs!

—Good music! good oratory! good dinner!

—Come to Spencerville to celebrate the fourth of July.

—A. Kinsey has been very busy putting up wire screens and doors.

—Reverends Kelso and Lancaster and Hon. I. B. McDonald, orators of the day.

—Mrs. John Hobaugh has been seriously ill, but is now slowly recovering. Dr. Murphy in attendance.

—M. C. Emanuel has returned from Antwerp, Ohio, at which place he has been visiting friends and relatives.

—A change in the Spencerville mail route is contemplated, after which the hack will go only as far as Cedarville and return. A very desirable change.

—All persons who are delinquent on funds promised or subscribed, for the cleaning of the cemetery and building of fences, will accommodate Mr. Joseph Spitler by paying up.

—On last Wednesday a run-away horse threw Mrs. Joseph Spitler out of a carriage, in which she and Mrs. Frank Wise were riding. The wheel ran over her and inflicted several slight injuries.

—We learn that H. W. Emanuel has gone to Alvarado, Ind., at which place he will commence the practice of medicine. This fall he will go to Philadelphia to attend the Jefferson medical college.

—The Lutheran Sunday-school is now raising funds with which to buy books and papers, and will continue the work next week for the purpose of fencing the church. Both are very useful, and the public should give liberally.

—Visitors at Spencerville this week are Mrs. Werrbaugh, of Butler, at Dr. Emanuel's; Mr. Kelso and lady, at the parsonage of Rev. Kelso; Mrs. Hathaway and son, of Newville, at Mr. S. Warner's; Mr. Cecil Rhodes, of Newvill, at Mr. J. Rhodes'; Miss Etta Ortz, of Tiffin, O., at Mr. William Vaugile's.

—Stealing last week in the vicinity of Spencerville. We were unable to obtain full particulars, but the thief or tramp was forcibly taken by Mr. E. J. Boyle, brought to Spencerville and tried before Justice H. H. Fales, who committed him to jail to await the action of the county court.

—Many thanks to the gentlemanly contributor from this place, "Special Reporter," for his honest sympathy and assistance in this our time of need. It was our original intention not to say anything more about the "grand opera" and we only do so now that we may correct the errors of our "Indignant" friend. "Indignant" was very wrong when he said that "nothing more than a spirit of malace prompted Scribbler to write such an article." We assure "Indignant," and all others, that "we wrote in a spirit of friendly criticism, without which criticism, friendly or unfriendly, there is no improvement, and if we accomplish nothing else, we have at least given a healthy stimulus to the really talented contributors of Newville and Spencerville, whose pens have for some time remained quite inactive. But how about the friendly spirit of "Indignant," who would like to have Scribbler devoured by Cannibals, and who speaks contemptuously of the "nigger show"—in other words, the musical entertainment which was to be given at Newville, by the Spencerville silver cornet band? Now, as Spencerville is not afflicted with any persons of African or Ethiopian descent, the gentlemen of the band must be the "niggers" alluded to by "Indignant." Are Messrs. Barney, Butler, Vauzile, Fales, Bishop, Hobaugh, Rhodes, Horn, Bair Bros., Zimmerman Bros and Prof. D. M. Rieder pleased with the "sobriquet" of "niggers," as well as pleased at having their really meritorious entertainment styled a "nigger show?" We leave it to the good sense and judgment of our readers to determine whether we are alone in this article, or whether we represent the intelligence of Spencerville. We have said and now repeat that the Newville "grand opera" was a fizzle. The instrumental music was a decided failure. We have heard better from children, and the leading musicians present agree with us. The singers were badly frightened, acting verdantly and awkwardly. The bass attempted to sing too high, which made a sound anything but musical, and was more like the bray of a donkey than the musical voice of an accomplished singer. The celebrated prima donna of Ohio, or "star of the cast," was palmed off as a Newvillian until the fraud was discovered. One lady would certainly have failed in her part of the duet, had not another come to her rescue. The selections were in bad taste and misarranged, as there were not two parts in the opera. We stated correctly that they did not receive a single "encore" or bouquet, but only the sympathy of their audience. Does "Indignant" deny? We would not render this criticism unnecessarily severe, and therefore will not disclose any further errors. We ask the indulgence of our readers with this tedious article, and faithfully promise not to take up the pen again, even in self defense, to reply to our maligners. SCRIBBLER.

Hitched By Hymen.

The wedding of Jerome Showalter and Miss Cara Wheelock, which occurred last Thursday night, at the Presbyterian church, was largely attended and passed off in the smoothest possible manner. The COURIER acknowledges its indebtedness for a bountiful supply of delicious cake, and trusts that these two young ones, who have embarked together on the Ocean of Life, may sail through calm waters to the end and eventually ride into the Harbor-of-Rest hand in hand, as they have started out.

Proceedings of Town Board.

Regular meeting—June 30th, 1879. Full board present—The following bills were allowed.

J. C. Vealey	for lumber	$39.60
A Robbins	" road list	14.50
Henry Ford	" roadwork	21.00
P. W. Silver	" lumber	27.60

Peter Brandon	" roadwork	10.66

Upon petition, the marshal is ordered to open Cedar street, between Ninth and Tenth streets. Board adjourned.

The Difference.

Dr. Price's extract of vanilla is made from the true Mexican vanilla bean, while some of the so-called extract of vanilla in the market is but an imitation, made from the tonqua, or snuff bean. Dr. Price's extract vanilla has the fine, delicate flavor of the fruit.

For Sale.

An extra No. 1 three-spring wagon, for sale at a bargain. Inquire of S. U. Tarney. 27 & 29.

RELEASED FROM EARTH.

DIED, in Auburn, Thursday, June 26, 1879, of consumption, M. Ida Mahurin, a sister of Mrs. W. H. McQuiston, aged 26 years, 1 month and 9 days.

The deceased was born in Fort Wayne, May 17, 1853, where, at the age of 16, she united with the Wayne st. M. E. church, since which time, and after her removal here, she joined the Presbyterian church at this place. Since her early admission to the church, she has been a faithful member, living and dying in its faith.

She was a dutiful child, an affectionate sister, a gentle, kind lady, of amiable disposition and sweet spirit, living a life of usefulness which was appreciated by all who knew her. As a christian, she was faithful, earnest and devout; devoted to the Sabbath-school, attached to the church and a lover of its solemn ordinances, and living a consistent life of uprightness and beauty until the day of her death, which she looked forward to with great anxiety, but spoke of it as a pleasant event; and when the Reaper finally came, she regarded him not as an enemy, but as a friend—an Angel of Mercy—and as such she received him.

Thus living, respected, she died regretted, leaving a vacancy in the church militant, but wearing a crown of glory in the church triumphant above.

TUTT'S PILLS

INDORSED BY PHYSICIANS, CLERGYMEN, AND THE AFFLICTED EVERYWHERE.

THE GREATEST MEDICAL TRIUMPH OF THE AGE.

TUTT'S PILLS CURE SICK HEADACHE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE DYSPEPSIA.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE CONSTIPATION.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE PILES.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE FEVER AND AGUE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE BILIOUS COLIC.
TUTT'S PILLS Cure KIDNEY Complaint.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE TORPID LIVER.
TUTT'S PILLS IMPART APPETITE.

DR. TUTT has succeeded in combining in these pills the heretofore antagonistic qualities of a STRENGTHENING PURGATIVE, and a PURIFYING TONIC.

Their first apparent effect is to increase the appetite by causing the food to properly assimilate. Thus the system is nourished, and by their tonic action on the digestive organs, regular and healthy evacuations are produced.

The rapidity with which PERSONS TAKE ON FLESH while under the influence of these Pills, indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, melancholy, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system. Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents. Office 35 Murray Street, NEW YORK.

POEM.

Read by Oliver Wendell Holmes at the dinner given by the Boston Club to the Chicago Commercial Club in Boston, June 14, 1879.)

Chicago sounds rough to the maker of verse;
One comfort you have, Cincinnati sounds worse.
If we only were licensed to say Chica-go—
But Worcester and Webster won't let us, you know.
No matter; we songsters must sing as we can;
We can make some nice couplets on Lake Michigan,
And what more resembles a nightingale's voice
Than the oily trisyllable, sweet Illinois!
Your waters are fresh, while our harbor is salt,
But we know you can't help it—it isn't your fault.
Our city is old, and your city is new,
But the railroad men tell us we're greener than you.
You have seen our gilt dome, and no doubt you've [illegible]
That the orbs of the universe round it are rolled;
But I'll own it to you, and I ought to know best,
That it isn't quite true of all stars of the West.
You will go to Mount Auburn, we'll show you the track,
And can stay there, unless you prefer to come back.
And Bunker's tall shaft you can climb, if you will,
But you'll puff like a paragraph praising a pill.
You must see—but you have seen—our old Faneuil Hall,
Our churches, our school-rooms, our sample-rooms all;
And, perhaps, though the idiots must have their jokes,
You have found our good people much like other folks.
There are cities by rivers, by lakes and by seas,
Each as full of itself as a cheese-mite of cheese;
And a city will brag as a rooster will crow—
Don't your cockerels at home?—just a little, you know.
But we'll crow for you now: Here's a health to the boys,
Men, maidens and matrons of fair Illinois,
And the rainbow of friendship that arches its span
From the green of the sea to the blue Michigan.

HAUNTED.

BY MARION HARLAND.

"Haunted!" Yes, for thirty-two years. I was 50 my last birthday. I graduated at 20. I was 18 and a "Soph" when we fellows sent John Grey to Coventry. "John James Grey," so stood his name in the college catalogue. Among us he was known as "Lady Jane."

I cannot tell you how odd it seemed to me to stand fifteen years ago in front of a small, faded portrait of the poor little 10-days' Queen, whose head was the football to the vaulting ambition of Messrs. Northumberland & Co., and to recognize in the sad brown eyes the same wistful appeal I saw in another pair when I last looked into them. It was a mere coincidence, of course, but the portrait in the Bodleian Gallery, Oxford, has John Grey's eyes, as I noted before I knew whose the likeness was.

We called him "Lady Jane," then, partly in parody of his real name, as much because of a certain refinement of manner and appearance, that was neither delicacy nor lack of manliness. It was a boyish way of acknowledging that he was a bit of choice porcelain cast by chance among coarser pottery. None of us even in jest called him a milksop—or, as the collegian of this generation would put it, a "muff."

He was an admirable student, a jovial comrade, ready alike for work and frolic—in short, "a good fellow through and through," and a decided favorite with us all until what I am about to tell you happened.

We were in Old Chess's room that morning. "Chess" was short for Chesterfield. We thus dubbed the professor of Greek, his name being Field, his body as long and stiff as the Levitical law, and his disposition as surly as that of a hyena. To hate him came to us by nature, and he taught thirty-nine out of the forty in the class to abhor the sight and sound of a Greek word. The fortieth man was Lady Jane.

His aptitude for language, ancient and modern, was marvelous, and Old Chess, with characteristic tact and grace, used the lad's proficiency as a ferule for the rest of us—never praising him, you may be sure, but with happy adroitness proving what dunces we were not to attain unto even so mean a standard as was set up by one of our number.

Nevertheless, it was well understood that if Chess could like anybody, to Lady Jane belonged the honor of his partiality. It was at once an evidence of the unpopularity of the professor, and our fondness for the pupil, that none of us envied the latter. In no other department of the venerable institution we were to remember as our Alma Mater did the lord of misrule have such sway as in the Greek room.

The like law obtains in every college, I fancy. Your best-beloved perceptor gets, likewise, the credit of being the wisest disciplinarian.

Upon the day I have named we were in a state of badly-suppressed revolt. A frightful "imposition" had been laid upon us at the last recitation; Lady Jane again excepted. The punishment was not quite undeserved, being the direct consequence of a boyish prank perpetrated by the class at large, a "barring-out," or something of that kind. By general consent none of us had prepared the prescribed task. Before this fact could transpire, indeed, by the time Old Chess had given the menacing "Hem!" that always preceded the recitation, a slight puff and flash went up from the top of the heated stove, and then a Tartarian odor.

The veriest tyro in chemicals there knew how it was done. Given—a judicious mixture of gunpowder, brimstone and cayenne pepper, the last-named ingredient having the balance of power; pour it dexterously upon a red-hot plate. Result—wild symptoms of suffocation on the part of all present, and an empty room in forty-five seconds.

It was a witless joke, for college-boys' humor was no finer then than now; but we enjoyed it immensely, and the obnoxious imposition was a dead letter for that day. Old Chess had a chronic disposition to asthma, and, an hour after the "eruption," was reported as coughing in a manner that sent ecstacy to our souls.

There must be a form of investigation into the occurrence, so it was no surprise to us when, as Lady Jane and I sat in our room that evening (did I tell you that we were chums?), he was summoned to the President's private apartment—the "Star-Chamber," as we called it.

I looked up with a laugh.

"I hope the dons won't squeeze you unmercifully, old boy."

I remembered afterwards that he was pale and ill at ease.

"I don't mind the squeeze," he said; "but I wish you had not done it, Dick. These senseless tricks put the class so evidently in the wrong as to hurt our reputation with sensible people."

In about an hour I was sent for. Just without the Star-Chamber I met Lady Jane. He was very pale, and his agitation awakened me to pitying curiosity.

"What cheer?" I hailed him, gayly.

He cast a warning glance at the "sub" who had brought me the summons, shook his head and passed on. I threw away the stump of my cigar and laughed softly.

"The dons have scared him badly," I remarked to my attendant, in entering the judgment-hall.

They were all there, from Prex, whom we liked, to Old Chess, our abomination, and an awful silence prevailed while I walked the length of the room and stood before the table about which they were seated.

Prex opened the ball—not with catechism, but with downright accusation. It was I, he stated, who had committed an offense against law and order so flagrant as to challenge prompt and severe measures on the part of the faculty, in sulted in the person of Prof. Field, and so on, and so on.

I was so far stunned that I understood but two things clearly. No denial, or attempt at justification, would be admitted, the faculty having ample proof of my guilt in the positive, although reluctant, testimony of one who had been an eye-witness of the deed, and I was to be publicly reprimanded in the chapel next morning.

When the buzz and whirl of my senses ceased, I found myself back in my room, Lady Jane, still pale and alarmed, gazing into my face.

"I was afraid of it," he repeated more than once; and upon hearing what was to be the form of punishment—"I wish I could stand by you and share it."

"I would rather stand in my shoes than those of the informer when the class have hunted him down," I returned, sore and savage.

In less than three days they had run him to earth, to the indignant astonishment of all—to my grief and horror. Searching inquiry revealed that no witness beside Lady Jane had been called before the tribunal which had condemned me. When bidden to speak in his own defense, he stoutly denied having given evidence against me, but refused to repeat what had passed between the inquisitors and himself.

"They informed you upon whom suspicion rested, I presume?" asked a Sophomore.

"They did."

"And what was your reply?"

"That I should answer no questions relative to the conduct of any of my classmates."

"An honorable man would have hid his friend out of danger sooner than utter such a contemptible evasion!" said the hot-headed querist.

The Chairman of the "Vigilance Committee" summed up the case after the accused had been sent out of the room.

"The fellow is not a malicious spy, but he lacks backbone, and dreads losing the good opinion of the faculty. He was frightened into confession, but he must be made an example of all the same."

So said they all. Even I, whose dearest friend he had been, recalling his speech and behavior before and after my arraignment, could not resist the weight of evidence.

So we sent him to Coventry. So far as we could, we carried into execution the ancient ban of excommunication. We cursed him, by cool and disdainful non-intercourse, when he lay down and when he arose up. Sitting, standing, walking, eating, he was the Pariah of his whilom mates.

Youth is cruel in love or in hate, and we never wavered in our declared purpose, even going out of our way, when occasions rose not ready to our hand, to make him feel the full weight of our vengeance. And—Heaven help us! we thought ourselves manly and righteous throughout, worthy vindicators of the soiled honor of the class that had "spawned an informer." That was our grandiose way of describing the offense which smelled so rank in our heroic nostrils.

After one vain attempt to induce me to listen to his story, the culprit offered no resistance to his doom, bearing it with a steady mien, so far and so equally removed from sullenness or abjectness that we would have called him "game" had we not preferred to consider him insolent.

Thus went on two long months, in which, although we still roomed together, Lady Jane and I had not exchanged one word. There was superb skating that season, and we spent most of our leisure hours upon the river. One afternoon, in passing the "bend" where the stream was widest and most crowded, I heard shouts, and saw all recoil, as one man, from the middle of the channel.

"It is a student! I saw his cap in the water!" I overheard some one say.

The next second I was in the open space left by the aghast throng, had thrown myself flat upon the ice, and, leaning over the jagged edges of the hole, was watching and groping in the water in the frenzied hope of seeing or touching the vanished man.

I did both. A head arose—it was for the third time—within reach of my grasp. I clutched and held it until we were pulled out together and dragged ashore. The crowd closed around the rescued student, and he was borne off before I had seen his features.

By the time I could extricate myself from officious friends and strangers, I found a messenger awaiting me on the bank, with a request from the "young gentleman whose life I had saved." He wanted to see and thank me. He had been taken into the nearest house, and lay in bed wrapped in blankets. Only his face was visible.

Wide brown eyes, with the solemn memory of a just-escaped death shadowing their depths, dark curls clinging to his forehead, lips quivering in the effort to shape into words the gratitude he would express to his deliverer, was the unwelcome vision that met my sight—for eyes, brow and mouth were Lady Jane's.

I halted upon the threshold, staring as at a wraith.

"Dick!" he cried, in amazement as great as my own. "Dear old fellow, do I owe my life to you?"

"It is nothing," I said, coldly. "They said a student was drowning; I did not suspect who it was."

The boy gazed at me as loth to credit the evidence of his senses, his eyes filled with a grief for which language had no vent.

"You did not suspect who it was?" he repeated, slowly. "If you had suspected that it was I"——

He turned his head upon the pillow, his face to the wall, which was no more blank and cold than the visage of the man who had been for two years to him as a brother.

I lingered one awkward moment, then left the place.

It was Saturday afternoon, and I was glad I had engaged to spend the Sabbath with a friend out of town. I could not meet those haunting eyes again, for we had, by solemn pact and covenant, sent him to Coventry, and I should be the last of all the league to sound a recall. When I returned on Monday, Lady Jane's trunk and other possessions had disappeared from our dormitory. He had been summoned home by news of his father's sudden death. He never came back to our college.

Ten years later I met "Prex," now a somewhat garrulous old gentleman, at Saratoga. He came to my room one night with a newspaper in his hand.

"Do you remember John Grey, of the class of '48?" he began.

"I do," I replied briefly.

"By the way, I never guessed how unjustly the poor fellow had been treated by you hot-headed boys until after he left college," pursued the good-natured official, crossing his legs after the manner of one who had a story to tell. "He never gave information against you in that little stove-and-pepper escapade. Perhaps you have forgotten it?"

Forgotten it! Nothing less likely!

Prex prosed on. "A youth of uncommon ability was Grey, espec in anguages. In Greek a prodigy, according to Prof. Field. By-the-by, it was Field himself whose lynx eyes saw you sift the pepper and brimstone compound upon the stove"—here he laughed—"like the scaramouch you were. He gave direct evidence to that effect before us. We sent for Grey to thank him formally for the consistency of his respectful and gentlemanly deportment toward Prof. Field, he being in that respect a marked exception to the rest of his class. He looked like one receiving censure, rather than praise, while I was talking. As I finished, Field broke in in his blunt way:

"'Now tell us who spilt pepper upon the stove to-day?'

"'I decline answering that question, sir,' said the lad, 'or any other that may criminate my classmates.'

"Field smiled. 'Don't trouble yourself,' he said. 'It was your Fidus Achates—your room-mate! We have caught him this time!'

"Grey did not move a muscle. 'As I have said, I do not play spy, much less informer, upon any of my class,' he repeated. 'May I go now, sir?' to me.

"I assented, willing to spare his feelings, and secretly admiring his gallant bearing. A fine boy, with a heart of gold! But, as I was about to say, I am truly grieved to see this."

He passed the paper to me, his thumb upon a paragraph.

"On the 9th inst., in Memphis, of yellow fever, John James Grey, aged 28."

John M. Clayton.

At Dover, not far from the Court House, stands a roomy old dwelling, formerly the residence of John M. Clayton, Secretary of State under President Tyler. Here he lived during the more active portion of his life; here he entertained his friends in the broad, generous style of Delaware hospitality, playing for their delectation his fine old fiddle, or expounding for their edification the State constitution.

John M. Clayton was a man of undoubted ability, and great power and strength of character. During his life he possessed an influence in his native State such as is rarely attained in this country of uninherited political power, but an influence which died with him and the Old-Line Whig party to which he belonged, leaving as its fruit a State constitution the most deleterious to progress and the most unfair to its subjects.

It was he that really built the constitution of 1831, and so hedged it in by clauses that, as he said himself, he "locked the door and threw the key away." As the constitution now stands, an equal number of State Representatives and Senators are elected from each county, notwithstanding that Newcastle, the upper county, has a population equal to both the others together, and ten times their wealth.

John M. Clayton was born in Sussex county, Delaware, July, 1796, and died at his residence in Dover, November, 1856. He is buried in the Presbyterian burying-ground, his remains being covered by a not large, but tasteful, mausoleum.—Howard Pyle, in Harper's Magazine.

"Think a Minute First."

Apropos of the sayings of the little ones I am reminded of an incident which touched me very much at the time, and may find a responsive chord in the hearts of some who are parents. I was sitting on my porch on a pleasant summer morning, when up runs little 5-year-old Bell, intent on a visit to a playmate across the way. "Papa," she asks, "may I go over and play with Carrie awhile?" and then, as she seemed to discern a dissent in my face, she put her little rosebud lips to mine, and quickly added: "Please don't say no—think a minute first." Was there ever a more charming protest against a hasty and inconsiderate answer? Of course the little girl had her wish. We are, perhaps, all too ready, thoughtlessly, to deny many of the requests of the little ones—things that seem trifling to us, but are everything to them. And when their little appeals come, before letting the "no" rise too quickly to our lips, let us think a minute.—Harper's Magazine.

TYPICAL OCCURRENCES.

POISONED BY A TOOTH BRUSH.—A little girl in Wilkinson county recently poisoned herself by cleaning her teeth with a tooth brush made from a yellow jessamine vine. She died in about two hours after using the brush.—Macon (Ga.) Telegraph.

BROTHERS WHO MEET IN PRISON.—The Sheriff of Polk county, a few days ago, took W. P. Pressely to the penitentiary for burglary at Knoxville. Another prisoner was brought in for five years for a similar crime. When stripped by the Warden of the penitentiary it was discovered that they were brothers, who had not seen each other for thirty years.—Burlington (Iowa) Hawk-Eye.

HER DREAM FULFILLED.—A singular instance of the verification of a dream occurred in Polk county some days ago. A young daughter of Mr. Hill dreamed one night that she had been burned to death. The next morning she went with her brother into the corn-field to keep the birds from the planted corn. As it was cold they built a fire, and while they were warming themselves the clothes of the girl caught fire. Her little brother tried to extinguish the flames, but could not. She died the next day.—Tampa (Fla.) Guardian.

A BRAVE LITTLE GIRL.—Mr. H. F. Gaulding has a little daughter 11 years old, to whose nerve and courage he is indebted for the life of his 3-year-old boy. The circumstances were briefly these: The boy was playing by the cistern in Mr. Gaulding's yard. There was a plank off, and through this aperture the little fellow fell. He caught a plank, however, in falling, and held for some time before he was discovered. But his hold weakened, and, with a plash, he fell into the cistern. His sister saw and appreciated the situation. Most girls would have screamed and run off in quest of help. Not so with this little girl. The screams and struggles for life of her baby brother gave her the courage of a man. She saw a ladder and, with all her might, she dragged it to and placed it into the cistern, and then went down into the water, reached out and caught her brother just in time to save him from a watery grave. By this time help arrived, and both were landed safely from their perilous position. All honor to this little heroine!—Bainbridge (Ga.) Democrat.

THE CHEVALIER CLOWN.—Some weeks ago the clown of a company of rope-dancers, who were performing in front of the Pont d'Austerlitz, in Paris, fell upon the stones and was killed. He was le Pere Pigeon. His body was borne to the garret in Montrouge, where he had lived. No relatives claimed the remains and so an Inspector of Police entered the room to make ready for the pauper burial. Nosing about the room the Inspector was made wild to find $9,000 in gold and silver coin hidden in a crack. With the money was a will. Also the baptismal certificate of le Pere. Here was a revelation! Le Pere Pigeon, the cracker of jokes, was found by the certificate to have been none other than Chevalier de Bastard—a member of one of the oldest and noblest Burgundian families. Inquiry showed that when Chevalier de Bastard had attained his majority his guardian placed $80,000, his patrimony, in his hands; that he had squandered the money in high living; that he had at last awakened to find friends and money flown. What could he do? Following nature's bent, he became a clown.

SLEEPING UNTIL HE DIED.—A case that puzzled the physicians of this city has terminated fatally. Mr. Isaac D. Perrin, a man about 70 years of age, was, for a person of his age, quite active. On Wednesday of last week he did not make his appearance as usual, and, when breakfast was ready, a member of the family, on going to his room, found him in a sleep from which he could not be awakened. Medicines were administered with no effect. He breathed quite naturally, but did not open his eyes, nor did he appear to be at all conscious of what was going on about him. During Friday his sleep did not appear to be so natural as the previous day, and his cheeks became somewhat bloated. In the evening he rallied a little. Dr. Cooper was called to consult with Dr. Campbell, but they gave little hopes of their patient ever gaining consciousness again. Nourishment was given him by putting beef tea in his mouth, which he managed to swallow quite well. He lay constantly on his back, and it was noticed that when a fly would light on his face he would turn his head slightly as if to drive it away. He finally expired on Monday evening last, having not shown the least sign of consciousness since he had been asleep.—Poughkeepsie Cor. New York Sun.

Brain Work and Skull Growth.

The London Medical Record sums up as follows the results of some very interesting measurements of heads by two French physicians, Messrs. Lacassagne and Cliquet:

Having the patients, doctors, attendants and officers of the Val de Grace at their disposal, they measured the heads of 190 doctors of medicine, 133 soldiers who had received an elementary instruction, 90 soldiers who could neither read nor write, and 91 soldiers who were prisoners. The instrument used was the same which hatters employ in measuring the heads of their customers; it is called the conformator, and gives a very correct idea of the proportions and dimensions of the heads in question. The results were in favor of the doctors; the frontal diameter was also much more considerable than that of the soldiers, etc. Nor are both halves of the head symmetrically developed; in students, the left frontal region is more developed than the right; in illiterate individuals, the right occipital region is larger than the left. The authors have derived the following conclusions from their experiments: 1. The heads of students who have worked much with their brains are much more developed than those of illiterate individuals, or such as have allowed their brains to remain inactive. 2. In students the frontal region is more developed than the occipital region, or, if there should be any difference in favor of the latter, it is very small; while in illiterate people the latter region is the largest.

Sumner's Complacency.

It was the misfortune of Sumner that, more than any other public man of his time, he was subjected to the extremes of adulation and obloquy. His real character can hardly be discerned amid the tumult of puffs and scoffs, of exaltations and execrations, which the mere mention of his name excited during his public career. Sumner himself was inclined to take the compliments at more than their real worth, while he experienced another though different satisfaction in reading the calumnies. The compliments he considered as indications that all lovers of liberty and justice were on his side; the calumnies delighted him, because, as they grew fiercer and fiercer, they seemed to prove that his blows directed at slavery and injustice were telling more and more against the enemies of freedom and right. It is difficult to say whether his enjoyment was more intense in exhibiting to his friends the private letters from distinguished men, abroad and at home, which exalted him to the skies, or in spreading before them other letters, mostly anonymous, which damned him to everlasting infamy as the foe of his country and of the human race. It must be confessed that, during the Rebellion, our Southern friends did not confine themselves within the limits of good taste in their private communications to their Northern opponents. It is impossible for me to compute the number of times that Sumner's soul was consigned to perdition, with all the additions of superfluous profanity known to gentlemen in whom profanity appears to be a secretion in the throat. These private threats and public denunciations were a source of humorous pleasure to Sumner. He never swore as an individual; nobody ever heard an oath slip from his lips even in his ecstacies of philanthropic rage; but he was the best swearer by proxy and quotation that I ever listened to. The oaths launched at him by his Southern enemies, the oaths which some Republican Senators would occasionally hurl at him when they were vexed by his obstinacy in clinging to his own view of a party question that had been decided against him by a majority of Republican statesmen—these, in narrating his experiences in political life to a friend, he would roll over on his tongue in quite an unsanctified but still innocent fashion, and laugh at the profanity as something exquisitely comical. The more people swore at him the more delighted he was; and it is a pity that he did not have the same sense of humor in estimating the hyperboles of panegyric addressed to him by his admirers, which he unquestionably had in estimating the hyperboles of execration shot at him by his assailants.—E. P. Whipple, in Harper's Magazine.

The Great "I."

Some of our most popular authors are as remarkable for their vanity as for their ability. Victor Hugo is known all over Europe for his colossal egotism, no less than for his patriotism, and the English novelist, Charles Reade, who has struck powerful blows for great reforms, is as absurdly vain and irritable under criticism as a school-girl.

Tennyson is said to have a very hearty appreciation of his own work. He sometimes reads his poems aloud, intoning them as English pastors do the church service. A select party of friends were invited to hear him read "the Idylls of the Kings" before they were published. The poet read, and the audience listened in rapt silence.

One lady, however, annoyed him by crying out from time to time, "Oh, wonderful! beautiful! sublime!" He turned on her fiercely at last.

"Of course it is sublime!" he growled, in his deep bass. "Who doubts it?"

At the close of one of the finest passages he paused.

"Go on, Mr. Tennyson," lisped his admirer.

"Go on!" he thundered. "Great heavens, madam, who could go on in a strain like that?"

Benton, the statesman, possessed an inordinate vanity, which showed itself as simply as a child's. We remember hearing him, a year or two before his death, address a large assemblage of young men. He closed by an urgent appeal to them to avoid the use of all stimulants, and to study close the history of current events.

"I have but one argument to submit to you in favor of this course, but that is sufficient," he said. "I have studied the progress of events from day to day since I was a boy. I have never used tobacco nor spirituous liquors. In consequence," stepping forward and drawing himself to his full height, "you see before you—Thomas Hart Benton!"

If vanity, even when justified by great abilities and well-earned fame, makes a man a ludicrous object, boys and girls may judge how offensive it is in them when there is neither ability nor success to cause it.

A Woman's Invention.

All lovers of good toast will be interested in the following useful bread toaster, the invention of Mrs. A. C. Harris, of Grenville county, N. C. It is not patented, and can be made by all who wish to use it. It is made by taking a piece of sheet iron or tin, about eighteen inches square, and turning up the edges so as to form a shallow tray, to give sufficient stiffness to the sheet. A number of V-shaped openings are now made in regular order across the bottom; and the tongues of the Vs are turned up at right angles to the sheet. These sharp points are to hold slices of bread pressed upon them. A short piece of stout wire hinged to the back serves as a prop to hold it in any angle to the fire. After placing the pieces of bread in position by pressing them on the points, the toaster is set on the hearth before an open fire, where the bread soon assumes a rich brown color, and then the slices should be reversed. If the lower part should brown before the upper, the toaster can be turned upside down, and so bring the underdone bread nearest the fire.

LONDON BRIDGE.

Proud and lowly, beggar and lord,
Over the bridge they go.
Rags and velvet, fetter and sword,
Poverty, pomp and woe.
Who will stop but to laugh and sing?
Self is calling, and self is king!
Who weeps at the beggars' grave?
Crusts they pray for, but love they crave.

Beggar and lord,
Fetter and sword,
Prison and palace, shadow and sun,
Velvet and rags,
So the world wags,
Until the river no more shall run.

Sparkle river, merrily roll!
Laugh with the gay and bright
Who will care for the weary soul
Under thy arch to-night?
Who will pity her, who will save?
Never a tear the cold world gave!
Down there in the rolling Thames—
God will pity what man condemns.

Velvet and rags,
So the world wags,
Prison and palace, shadow and sun,
Fettered and free,
So shall it be,
Until the river no more shall run.

The Credit System.

The credit system sometimes brings results least anticipated by those who trade in it. A Scotch farmer was dunned by a wagon-maker of the ambitious village of Drayton, Ontario, to pay for a vehicle purchased from him; to which the canny Scot pleaded inability in consequence of the scarcity of money. Being pressed for the debt by his creditor, who said that he had a note becoming due in a few days, which the amount of the farmer's debt would enable him to meet, he was told very naively by the farmer that sooner than see him stuck he would lend him the amount from a fund which he had lying by for note-shaving, provided he would get some substantial neighbors to back his note, and would only charge him 12 per cent. for it. He no doubt thought it was a poor system that could not work both ways.

SABBATH READING.

"All of Self, None of Thee."

Oh, the bitter shame and sorrow
  That a time could ever be,
When I let the Savior's pity
Plead in vain, and proudly answered:
    "All of self, and none of Thee!"

But He found me, I beheld Him
  Bleeding on the accursed tree,
Heard Him pray, "Forgive them, Father!"
And my wistful heart said, faintly:
    "Some of self, and some of Thee!"

Day by day His tender mercy,
  Healing, helping, full and free,
Sweet and strong, and ah! so patient,
Brought me lower, while I whispered:
    "Less of self, and more of Thee!"

Higher than the highest heavens,
  Deeper than the deepest sea,
Lord, Thy love at last hath conquered,
Grant me now my soul's desire!
    "None of self, and all of Thee!"

Contentment: A Sermon by Prof. David Swing.

When one of our poets said:

Man wants but little here below,
  Nor wants that little long.

When he said:

Happy the man whose wish and care
  A few paternal acres bound,
Content to breathe his native air
  In his own ground,

he expressed what all thinking hearts love to say and repeat. Those words come to us all as the absolute truth of God. They are the foundation-stone of the man's philosophy.

Socrates said, "Contentment is natural wealth;" the riches which nature is willing to bestow upon her children. God cannot undertake to give us all the millions of money for which our hearts might ask. And should an indulgent Creator grant each man such fabulous sums it would not be long before we should wish we had asked for double the amount. Instead, therefore, of attempting to make the bulk of our property large enough to satisfy all longing, which would be impossible, nature passes inside the soul of the noble being and stops the longings. Instead of carrying food to a glutton it cures the gluttony. Hence, said Socrates, Contentment is natural wealth; it is the only thing that satisfies. And he adds, Luxury is an artificial poverty. For luxury creates a poverty. It so enlarges natural wants that it throws them all out of; proportion it builds up a false world, and one which no bank account can at last meet; and thus, passing under the name of riches, it is a created poverty. Thus contentment is the Lord's wealth, and luxury is an artificial, self-inflicted poverty. For, said another ancient, Every man is poor who wants more.

It certainly is an ordained law of society that some few individuals shall drive onward in the pursuit of enormous property, when the property represents some public enterprise. It is desirable that some man or group of men shall amass money enough to construct our railways and telegraphs, or to launch steamships, or conduct large public works, but it is as truly a law of nature that a majority of earth's people must find their happiness in the natural riches called contentment. It being impossible that all should be millionaires, and there not being public works for each individual to build, it is the inevitable conclusion that God designed that from natural wealth—that is, peace of mind—most persons should extract the sweets of life. Paul and the young man Timothy were taken from the common p-ople, and bore its image, and were to follow moral pursuits, those of teaching the multitude, and they were to leave to Emperors the building of viaducts and aqueducts, and ships of war or peace. With the money that might buy food and clothing these two were to be satisfied. In these two we see millions of men, noble ones at that. It might perhaps have made us weep could we have been present at the death of St. Paul, and have seen in what plainness that body was clad; how worn the sandals; how old and worn the cloak; for after death these emblems of poverty become most touching. They draw tears more quickly than do the wounds on the body. But a moment's reflection would have dried our eyes, for his calling was one which did not need much riches, nor fine raiment, but one which needed only common raiment and common food, for it was in the regions of the intellect and the soul the most of his wants ran. In all other departments of possession his contentment was wealth.

If, therefore, contentment is to be the wealth of the majority, the practical question arises, How can we all secure the most possible of this substitute for property? The acquisition of immense riches being difficult, how may we find its spiritual equivalent? First, by reflection. This is the general cure for all unreasonable turmoils of the heart. That pitiable man who shot at one of our most popular actors reflected after he had done his insane deed. What the public condemns in that almost assassin it habitually does itself—resorts to philosophy when too late. We blunder first and reflect afterward. The moment we shall all learn common sense, the blunders and crimes will disappear. God has not left mankind to be at the mercy of all kinds of emotional manias. He gave man reason, and we are to make use of that reason all along, until it shall have mastered what is called mania.

To the reflecting mind there will come thought enough to fill the bosom with contentment. I have alluded to one fact—that there can be, and need be, but few rich men. If all were wealthy money and labor would lose their value, and civilization would sink back toward barbarism until a working class should be created again. Brain and soul would sink under universal opulence. Therefore [illegible] in your humble home is to be in the path of the highest duty. It is essential that the vast majority of earth's inhabitants be, as were Paul and Timothy, in the possession of only sufficient of clothing and food. Suppose all the world were poets! Even were our 900,000,000 all good poets, what a most ridiculous world we should have! The entire human race writing poetry! All other forms of action suspended! As things exist, to be a Longfellow or a Whittier is well enough, but the world needs only a few such. So the world needs only a few rich men. Society soon passes away from such, and needs millions like you and me, who would starve in a year if we quit work. When the laboring man takes up his bucket in the morning to be gone ten hours; when the clerk enters his store, or bank, or office; when the schoolmaster enters the door where the children are crowding in; when the preacher enters his study-room, or visits the sick, the great god of nature takes each one of these by the hand and says, "I am with you!" Such reflections as these will bring many an hour of peace. As the world needs only a little group of poets, so it [illegible] only a few millionaires.

It is one of the defects of a wild and misguided Communism that it is inducing the lower orders of people to feel that nothing but plenty of money can bring them any happiness. Its desire to distribute property is founded upon the theory that riches and idleness are the elements of blessedness to be sought. This violent Communism has a taste so gross that it cannot rise above the common appetites. It ignores a spiritual world in which a poor shoemaker, or a plowman, or a blacksmith like Gerrit Smith, or like our Collyer, has something in his hard lot which needs no help nor pity from men who would carry firebrands or firearms to equalize the rich and the poor. Communism that means brotherhood and love, and the consequent help of man toward man, is a divine idea, but the violent form of this equalization is a philosophy of plenty of food and drink, and plenty of idleness for all. It fails to see that there is something in a poverty of property which has been wonderfully prolific in great men. It fails to make any note of all those mental lights and shadows which have for thousands of years played around the little cottages where a few pennies a week set the table for the children and paid for the fagots on the hearth. It fails to make any note of that contentment which is nature's fortune. It is so wretched a mental philosopher that it assumes that discontent can be cured by a free distribution of realties and moneys, whereas were each citizen given $10,000, Communism would need to return in five years to pour out blood again and make the sum $20,000 for each.

How Coffee is Cleaned.

When coffee was retailed in its natural condition, and roasted in small lots over the kitchen fire, imperfect beans and impurities were picked out by hand. With wholesale roasting more expeditious methods were necessary, and machines were invented to do the work with greater economy and dispatch. From this necessary operation to the invention of processes for polishing inferior goods, to make them look like prime coffees, was but a step. The poorer grades of coffee were washed in colored water, and then treated to a course of polishing with powdered soapstone, which gave the beans the glossy and flinty appearance of first-rate coffee and covered up all defects. The natural result was to make all honest dealers suspicious of polished coffees, though the need of machine cleaning was in no way diminished. It is possible, however, to have coffee cleaned and polished by machinery and at the same time be honest.

By this process the coffee is put into a large cylinder capable of holding 800 or 900 pounds, the cylinder being lined with heavy linen and provided with cleats to increase the friction, when the beans are set in motion by the rapid revolution of the cylinder. At one end of the cylinder are a number of holes to admit air, and at the other a suction fan, making 2,000 revolutions a minute. The friction loosens the dust and the outer covering of the coffee, which impurities are carried away by the air current set in motion by the fan. After ten or fifteen minutes of this treatment the coffee is wet with pure water and the machine again set in motion. The coffee is thus washed, and after half an hour's scouring comes out entirely clean and much improved in appearance by the polishing it has received. Coffees which contain much loose dirt and many broken beans are subjected to a preliminary process, in which the perfect beans are winnowed clean, after which they are treated as already described.

The Baroness Rothschild.

The New York World revives this anecdote of the wife of the Baron Rothschild, just dead: It was his wife, a woman of keen natural sense and mother wit, who at the time of the wild excitement which raged in England over the elevation of Cardinal Wiseman to the purple and the re-establishment of a Roman Catholic hierarchy in England, made a reply which has gone the rounds of the world, to the bitter speech of one of her neighbors, Mrs. Spencer Walpole. Cardinal Wiseman chanced to be at lunch in Baron Lionel's house at Gunnersberry, when Mrs. Walpole called to pay a visit. The Baroness invited her to come into the luncheon-room, stating as she did so that no one would be found there save the family—and the Cardinal. Mrs. Walpole drew back in a kind of horror, and said: "I am very sorry, but really I make it a principle never wittingly to break bread with a Roman priest." "I beg your pardon," replied the Baroness. "I never dreamed of annoying you. You know I am not a Christian, and cannot be expected, therefore, to enter into those feelings!"

In the Other World.

Before the Cadi, a Mohammedan was brought up for burning down a Christian's house. "Where is the complainant?" "May our souls be a sacrifice, but he is in the other world! He was burned up with his house." "The Koran," said the magistrate, "provides that where the complainant is unable to appear, if his abiding-place be known, the culprit shall be taken there and confronted with him. In the present case the plaintiff does not appear, and is known to be in the next world. Let the law be executed—ditto prisoner."

RUSSIA is quite a country, covering about three times the area of the United States.

FARM NOTES.

THE average price of the milch cow in this country is $26.41.

BEANS planted between thin rows of potatoes drive away the potato bug.

EXTERMINATE totally the first crop of potato bugs, and there will be no second crop.

SHEEP, owing to their shyness, should be treated with great kindness. Their treatment should be such that they will actually learn to entertain an affection for their keepers.

CLING to the farm, make much of it, put your [illegible] it, bestow your heart and your brain upon it, so that it shall savor of you, and radiate of your virtue after your day's work is done.

DR. HOSKINS tells the writer that he plants twice as many trees in his orchards as he intends to remain, calculating that the intermediate trees will twice pay for themselves before they seriously interfere with the others, and have to be removed.—Rural New Yorker.

IT should be remembered, especially in the West, where we have flush pastures, that large cows will, as a rule, produce more milk for the food eaten than small animals. There is great value in a given breed in the purity of the stock; but small cows will not hold their own on full pastures as against animals of greater feeding capacity.

TO KILL BLACK ANTS.—Take a piece of old cheese, moisten it if dry, and dust it with corrosive sublimate or arsenic. Or mix whisky, molasses and water in equal parts and fill a tumbler half or two-thirds full, and set it partly in the ground infested by ants. It will soon be full of drunkards, which can be scooped out and killed.

A CALF will draw milk in three minutes, and the nearer a milker can come to that time the better. A slow milker makes a cow impatient, which often causes her to hold up her milk. The "strippings" are the richest part, and if a cow is milked quietly as well as quickly there will be more as well as richer milk because of the "strippings."

THE LIGHTNING FERTILIZER.—A singular experiment in agricultural methods has lately been tried in France. A savant took two tobacco plants, each weighing the same and being in an equally healthy condition, and placed them side by side in a locality favorable to their growth. One was supplied with an electric conductor, and the other was left in its normal state. In four months the plant under the influence of electricity attained a height of 3 feet 5 inches, and weighed about 44,000 grains; the other measured 2 feet 4 inches, and weighed about 22,000 grains, about one-half. Fertilization by electricity is certainly a new and startling notion.

HOW TO KEEP CHICKENS.—Keep a record of your work. Do not burden your minds with trying to remember either success or failure. If you make an experiment, record it, so that you car trace it up for reference if it is a success; if a failure, you can protect yourself against it another time. Do not allow the bones from the table to be thrown into the dust heap, or lie around the yard; throw them into the fire, burn them a little, crush and give them to your fowls. If bread is burned, or anything else that is cooked in the house, do not throw it away, but use it as charcoal for your birds. If they have been obliged to run in the orchard or meadow to pick up their living as they can, and feeding on what they could get, their eggs and flesh are likely to taste; feeding charcoal in any shape will remedy the evil.—Western Rural.

SUNFLOWER SEED FOR POULTRY.—Many farmers look upon the sunflower as simply a worthless weed, and never dream of the valuable qualities the seeds of this plant possess. For several years they have been used by the breeders of fancy poultry as a food for choice fowls; in small quantities they are mixed with the other food, and the peculiar properties of the seeds impart a beautiful gloss which no grain will give to the plumage of the adult birds. For those who raise fancy fowls for exhibition, it is essential to perfect success that the plumage should be in perfect condition, and to attain satisfactory results we can recommend no more valuable aid than judicious feeding of this seed. It has long been known that the oil extracted from sunflower seeds makes a dressing for the hair which is very beneficial, imparting a smoothness and vigor highly appreciated by all who have tried it. It grows very readily, and the poultryman should not forget this cheap and useful assistant to his labors.

Rubbing with a Dead Hand.

T. F. Thiselton Dyer writes to Notes and Queries: "Many of your correspondents are no doubt acquainted with the famous 'dead man's hand,' which was formerly kept at Byron Hall, Lancashire. It is said to be the hand of Father Arrowsmith, a priest, who, according to some accounts, was put to death for his religion in the time of William III. Preserved with great care, in a white silken bag, this hand was resorted to by many diseased persons, and wonderful cures are said to have been wrought by this saintly relic. Striking with a 'dead man's hand' is a cure for wart in Galloway. At no distant period an instance of this superstition, we are informed, occurred at Storrington, Sussex. A young man who had suffered for some time from goitre, and tried various remedies for its cure, but to no purpose, was at last taken to the side of an open coffin, in order that the hand of the corpse might touch it twice. Formerly, on execution days at Northampton, numbers of people used to congregate around the gallows to receive the 'dead stroke,' as it was termed. Indeed, I might quote further cases, but space will not permit. I may just add that Mr. Peacock himself has recently made mention of an example of this superstitious practice which happened at Lincoln, in 1830. At the assizes that year, when Mr. Johnson, of Wytham-on-the-Hill, was High Sheriff, there were three criminals hanged. After the execution, two women came, bringing a child with them. All three suffered from wens, and the dead men's hands were rubbed on the parts affected, in the full belief that the ceremony would produce a cure."

HOME DECORATIONS.

ONE of the latest dressing stands is entirely decorated with brass intaglios, and has all its appointments, caskets, brushes and perfume flasks, in brass.

THE cabinet is a favorite piece of furnitvre for drawing-rooms and parlors. They have spindle balustrades and leveled glass doors, and many are Japanese open cabinets with irregular shelves.

LIBRARIES are fitted with mahogany or walnut, usually. The book-cases are low and the table in the center of the room is square. Figured stuffs are much used for the hanging and furniture coverings in libraries.

MANY elaborate suits are rich with carving or inlaid panels. Large-sized mirrors for bureaus and dressing-stands are insisted on by purchasers, even though they may not be in keeping with the style of the furniture.

THE light woods, such as ash, oak, or Virginia pine, are shown for simple English bedroom suits, while mahogany, rosewood and ebony are for more costly rooms. The light, natural-tinted mahogany is much used for this purpose.

Purifying Water.

Different waters, like different diseases, require different treatment to purify them; and all waters, no matter how impure they may be, can be made quite pure for drinking or other domestic purposes without distillation, providing the proper materials be used, and sufficient time allowed the ingredients to act; but in many samples of water I have found distillation to be the cheapest and quickest mode of purifying them. All filters in use that I am aware of only purify the water from solid impurities mechanically suspended in the water. The following is a description of a filter that I have often used, which purifies foul water from organic impurities as well as from suspended solids. Take any suitable vessel with a perforated false bottom, and cover it with a layer of animal charcoal; on the top of that spread a layer of iron filings, borings or turnings, the finer the better, mixed with charcoal dust; on the top of the filings spread a layer of fine clean siliceous sand, and you will have a perfect filter. Allow the foul water to filter slowly through the above filter, and you will produce a remarkably pure drinking water. Before placing the iron filings in the filter they must be well washed in a hot solution of soda or potash, to remove oil and other impurities, then rinse them with an equal measure of fine charcoal. If the water is foul it must be allowed to filter very slowly. The deeper the bed of iron filings is the quicker they will act.

The above is a simple, cheap, and very efficient filter, superior to any other that I know of, and it has the advantage of being free to every one who chooses to make it. I have not taken out any patent for it, am not aware of any other person having done so; I think I am the only person who has ever used it. A very good test for the efficiency of any filter is to add some urine to the water before passing it through the filter, and then testing the filtered water to see if the urine passes through unchanged; if it does, then the filter only acts mechanically. The addition of permanganates to water will not destroy Bacteria, but the addition of hydrochloric acid will. If you have to purify water containing Bacteria, you must first add hydrochloric acid to the water till it is slightly acid to test paper; that will destroy the whole of the animalculæ; then add sufficient lime-water to neutralize the acid, then precipitate the lime with oxalate of ammonia, and filter through the iron filter described above. The foulest ditch water, treated as above, is rendered quite pure and fit for drinking. I may mention that I have made it a practice during the last twenty-seven years to boil all my drinking water. It is the safest plan for a man moving from place to place. You cannot always carry a filter and chemicals about with you, but you can always manage to get boiled water; people talk about it being vapid and tasteless, but I am used to it, and like it.—English Mechanic.

Outwitting a Lion.

A Bushman, while a long way from his home, was met by a lion. The lion, assured that he had his victim completely in his power, began to sport and dally with him with a feline jocosity which the poor little Bushman failed to appreciate. The lion would appear at a point in the road and leap back again into the jungle, to reappear a little further on. But the Bushman did not lose his presence of mind, and presently hit upon a device by which he might possibly outwit his foe. This plan was suggested by the lion's own conduct. Aware that the brute was ahead of him, he dodged to the right, and, feeling pretty sure of the lion's whereabouts, resorted to the course of quietly watching his movements. When the lion discovered that the man had suddenly disappeared from the path he was a good deal perplexed. He roared with mortification, when he espied the Bushman peeping at him over the grass. The Bushman at once changed his position, while the lion stood irresolute in his path, following with his eye the shifting black man. In another moment the little man rustled the weeds, vanished, and showed again at another point. The great brute was first confused and then alarmed. It evidently began to dawn upon him that he had mistaken the position of matters, and that he was the hunted party. The Bushman, who clearly recognized what was passing in his enemy's mind, did not pause to let the lion recover his startled wits. He began to steal gradually toward the foe, who, now in a complete state of doubt and fear, fairly turned tail and decamped, leaving the plucky and ingenious little Bushman master of the situation.—Chambers' Journal.

A RATTLESNAKE NINE FEET LONG.—Mr. Berry Crews, of Polk county, had a fine horse bitten by a rattlesnake, nine and a half feet long, last week. The horse was cured with snake-weed.—Tampa (Fla.) Tribune.

A GEORGIA SNAKE.—On Tuesday morning, Mr. Jesse New was looking for his turkeys and found them in a ditch. He started to drive them home and discovered an enormous rattlesnake in the ditch with them. He immediately got his gun and shot the snake twice and then had to call Mingo Glaze, a colored man, for assistance in killing it. He cut the snake open afterwards and found inside of it three turkeys and a chicken. He says the snake was eight or nine feet long and about two feet in circumference. It had twelve rattles.—Americus (Ga.) Republican.

SEVEN WOLVES IN ONE DEN.—Two little sons of James Tully, aged 9 and 11 years respectively, were herding cattle, and came across a wolf den. One guarded the hole while the other went for a pick and the dogs. When the digging had made considerable progress the mother wolf insisted on excavation, which she accomplished at a side hole from the den. She went for reinforcements, and soon returned with the last year's family, but the dogs and the boys "held the fort," and finally killed four young wolves and captured three others alive, making seven wolves at one haul, in spite of the mother and all her friends.—Junction City (Kan.) Tribune.

A TALENTED HEN.—R. H Allison, No. 321 East Baltimore street, is the owner of a very talented hen. It was not until this week, however, that the genius of the bird burst its fetters, as it were, under circumstances of a most unusual character. The hen, it seems, has of late been laying off—that is to say, she has not been laying at all—and in order to save the expense of supporting her in idleness an edict was issued to the servant for her execution. When the servant, in pursuance of instructions, went out to wring her neck it was discovered that the hen, as if to propitiate the headsman, had just laid an egg. And none of your ordinary eggs either, but a compound affair, consisting of an elastic sac, resembling rubber, in which was inclosed a real hard-shell egg of regulation pattern. The novelty was exhibited at the Sun office, and it was stated that in consideration of the originality of the hen her past offenses had been condoned.—Baltimore Sun.

A DOUBLE HEADER.—Canton, Fulton county, Ill., comes forth with a remarkable monstrosity in the shape of a double-headed calf, which is alive and doing well. The Canton Register thus describes it: "The calf is red in color, there being not a white hair visible in its coat. The frame of the calf is unusually large, and one would think there would be no trouble in raising it to maturity. There is nothing unusual in its appearance excepting its double head. Each head is supplied with eyes, nostrils, mouth, tongue, teeth, etc., but only one pair of ears, which are set far back near the neck, and are of the usual size. It will take nourishment in either mouth, and it apparently makes no difference which one you feed, excepting one mouth seemingly 'waters' when the other is receiving the milk, and the tongue and lips of both mouths move simultaneously. When calved, all four eyes were bright and full of life; but since, two of the eyes—the two inside eyes you might call them—have grown dim and have the appearance of blindness. Both heads are of the usual size, and commence separating just above the eyes, and thence to within about two and a half inches of the ends of the noses. Two complete sets of jaws grace the head, and they have the appearance of joining on the inside of the jaws. The owner has already been offered $1,000 for the calf."

Lying in India.

The despotism under which the people of India lived for centuries made them liars. When a subject is in the presence of his despot, safety depends on saying what will please him. If the subject wishes for justice, he must obtain it by lies and bribes. These facts account for much of the Asiatic duplicity, and that which is not thus accounted for may be charged to the law of hereditary descent.

A common saying among the Bannuchis, living in Northern India, teaches that a well-told lie is creditable to the teller, if thereby he gains his cause. "Lying is an honest man's wings," says this proverb.

No Bannuchi is ashamed of himself for telling a lie; but he is greatly mortified if he tells it so clumsily as to be found out. Even public opinion will then condemn him.

The inhabitants of a pastoral village were once much perplexed. The Government had ordered a census of all the cattle, in order to allot to the village a sufficient amount of grazing land. If they understated the number of cattle, they would get less land; if they overstated, their poll-tax on cattle would be increased.

Having in vain sought advice from their wise men, they went to the English Deputy Collector. Stating the dilemma in which they were placed, they touchingly asked him:

"Now, which way shall we lie?"

When he advised them to tell the truth, they were much surprised at not having thought of that solution.

"Why can't you tell a lie?" asked a native of an English officer. "Won't your mouth become crooked?"

"Either a strong man or a fool tells the truth," says another proverb. The former can afford to laugh at the consequences of his statement; the latter don't think of results. Another proverb, "To lie is to jump from a house-top," affirms the uncertainty attending a lie. It is a leap in the dark.

Bread Cast Upon the Waters.

Ten years ago a widow lady in Liberty county found a little, half-starved lamb. She raised it and took care of it. From that beginning she now has eighty sheep, and has, from time to time, sold thirty head. If this is not a good dividend from such a small investment, we would rise to a point of order and ask what is?—Hinesville (Ga.) Gazette.

A Significant Story.

No stronger example can be found of the sudden and gigantic growth of evil from petty beginning, than in a recent tragedy which occurred in Richmond, Va. A young girl went into a store to buy a pair of shoes, when the clerk who waited upon her, as she stated on the trial, complimented her, in an offensive manner, upon her pretty foot.

Now, no modest, properly-trained girl would willingly place herself a second time in the way of personal insult. According to her own statement, this young woman returned again and again to the same store and the same man, to be repeatedly addressed with flattery and attempted caresses.

Other witnesses declared that these insults were wholly the product of her own giddy imagination; that the clerk, Curtis, was respectful and courteous in his manner toward her.

By her own story, however, she encouraged his familiarity by returning to the store, and then complained of it to a young man to whom she was betrothed, in such a way as to enrage him to madness. He sought out Curtis, and beat him severely. Curtis followed him to take revenge, and was shot dead by the girl's lover, who is now sentenced to the State prison for manslaughter.

If this girl had not gone back to the shop to have her ears tickled with praises of her pretty foot, Curtis would be alive to-day, and her lover would not fill a murderer's cell.

There is no trait of character which American girls need more than the modest reserve which they so often laugh at as old-fashioned. It is a quality which, oddly enough, the most licentious man requires in his wife. A girl, however innocent, who flirts and flaunts in public as in private, her eye and manner challenging admiration from every stranger, will find plenty of men ready to flirt with and flatter her, possibly insult her; but not one of them will marry her.

Intellect in American Dogs.

A few months ago I made the acquaintance of a dog which, I think, is worthy of a place among the dogs and cats and rats and mules that are helping the pages of Nature to determine the degree and kind of animal intelligence. "Priest's" is a hotel on the way from the Calaveras grove of big trees to the Yosemite. In former years, on the arrival of the stage, the landlady would send the dog to the poultry-yard to catch chickens for the tourists' dinner. Now, the dog "takes time by the forelock." The stage is due at 6 o'clock. About 5 o'clock the dog saunters leisurely down the road till he meets the stage. He then bounds back to the poultry-yard, catches chickens, bites their heads off, and takes them to the cook! The number of chickens he kills bears a relation to the number of passengers he saw in the stage. A gentleman who was stopping at the hotel for a few days went into the woods one afternoon with a gun. When he returned, the dog came to him in much excitement to see what game he had taken. Finding his hands and his bag empty, the dog ran into the forest and returned in less than an hour with a bird, which he gave with an air of compassion to the unskillful hunter.—Nature.

What Is Put into Letter-Boxes.

The carriers who collect the mail from street boxes sometimes find queer deposits therein. Loose silver coins and loose postage stamps are among the principal discoveries, while a carrier the other day brought in a bank-book containing $85 in bills which he had taken from a lamp-post box. The most remarkable instance of absent-mindedness in this direction was the case, not long since, of a young man who daily carries two leathern bags—one for mail and the other for money, etc. He deliberately, in a fit of abstraction, walked up to a box in the Boston postoffice, and emptied the contents of one bag, containing several bank books and bills and checks amounting to thousands of dollars, into the mail-box, and did not discover his blunder until he went into the bank and handed the receiving teller a bunch of letters. That young man's face, it is said, grew so pale as to frighten every one who saw him rushing through the streets, eyes distended, and heart thumping loudly in his wretched bosom. He was made a happier and a wiser man on receiving at the business office the bank books and money in place of which he gladly tendered his bundle of mail matter.—Boston Herald.

The Question of Age.

The Methodist says in reply to a correspondent who asked the editor how he would like his daughter of 20 to marry a man of 40: Well, in the first place, this is the age of obedient parents, and we may not have much to say about it. If we do have a word, we shall begin by objecting to her marrying at all, unless—unless this Rachel of ours loves her Jacob a great deal. We are not referring to pretty sentimentalism, but to the genuine personal attachment which is the only safe reason for marrying. After that, we should prefer her husband to be at least 30 years old. Before that age few young men have either a defined character or an ascertained career; we should like our perfect girl to know whom and what she is marrying. As to her marrying that man when she is only 20, we should prefer her to be older, say 25. Soberly, however, we cannot cross that river until we get to it.

DAVID CUTLER, aged 70, was a Shaker at New Lebanon, but became so quarrelsome that the elders expelled him. He wandered awhile, tried in vain to be taken back, and then drowned himself in the pond where a Shaker sister committed suicide seven years ago.

THE Queensland transcontinental survey party speak hopefully of the practicability of constructing a railway across the Australian continent.

NORAH'S DECISION.

It was a pretty and picturesque sight that met Belton Black's gaze as he paused among the clustering birches of the wood.

Norah Leigh was seated on the grass, with one rosy child on her lap and two or three others scattered round, her fair cheeks crimsoned, and braids of bronze-brown hair shing beneath the cottage bonnet that she wore.

She looked up radiently as her lover's shadow fell across the tangled ferns of the woodland glade.

"Belton, is it you?" she cried.

"Send the children away," said he impatiently, "I want to talk to you."

"They will not disturb us."

"They will disturb me."

A look of pain came over Honora's sweet, submissive face.

"Nora," said he, "I've made up my mind."

"As to what?"

She looked up fondly into his dark Castillian face.

As to the propriety of our being married next month. Jennygs says I am to have a partnership, and I see my way clear at once. I have spoken to the agent about the little house in Clinton street, and —"

"Belton, do you think the house will be large enough?' interrupted Honora, with a troubled face.

"Large enough for what?"

"For the children. There are four of them, you know, and —'

"No,' said Mr. Black, abruptly, "I don't think it will be large enough—I don't mean that it should. You surely cannot intend, Honora, to burden our household with your aunt's four children? They are nothing to me, and they should be nothing to you. I dare say I can find some excellent institution where —'

"I promised my aunt on her dying bed that the children should never lack a mother's care,' said Honora, who had grown very pale.

"And you have kept your word,' broke in Black, impatiently. "For two years you have fed, clothed and supported them out of your slender earnings. It is all nonsense to keep up this sort of thing any longer. The boys are big enough to work; the girls can easily be provided for in an orhhan asylum.'

"Nora, you must choose between me and them.'

"They are so little and so helpless. Oh, I cannot turn them over to the hard and cruel mercies of the world!' pleaded Honora.

She sat for a moment looking at the tiny child figures as they flitted about upon the edge of the wood, listening to their innocent laughter; then she looked up to his face.

"I have decided,' she said; "I can't leave the children.'

"Belton Black's brow grew dark as midnight. "Good-by, then,' he said, extending a cold hand.

"Good-by, Belton.'

And her eyes followed him with a vague, fascinated gaze, as he strode out of the green glade and was lost to view.

"Have I done right?' she asked herself, with a sharp pain at the heart; and then as little Nelly came up, crying, Nora, Nora, me got a forn in me finger!' and holding up the tiny digit, with tear-stained cheeks, she caught the child in her arms, and sobbed out:

"God help me! Yes, I have done right, for these orphan little ones have no one but me.'

So Honora Leigh went back to her life of patient drudgery and ceasless toil once more. And the rich gentleman on the first floor, who saw her go in and out with her little satchel of books and roll of music, asked her landlady who she was.

"It's Miss Leigh, sir,' said the woman; a daily governess, and one of the sweetest, self-denying young ladies as ever gave up her life for the benefit of others."

"Humph!' said the rich gentleman. "There are not many such in the world.'

"No, sir; indeed there's not,' said Mrs. Moore.

How the rich gentlemen on the first floor became acquainted with the daily governess, how the children began to run in and out of his room, and asked him to tell them marvelous stories of America, whence he came, and how at last pretty Honora went back to America with him as his wife, would make too long a recital in detail. Suffice it to say that such was the fact.

"God bless the little ones; there's room and to spare for them in my house. And to my thinking, there is no sweeter sound about a house than children's voices, said Mr. Bonfield.

And the years went by and the little children grew up into health and beauty; and Honora in her satins, had almost forgotten the sore straits of her early girlhood, when one day the past was recalled to her by a most unexpected accident.

"If you please, Mrs. Honora," said the cook one day, an honest, warm-hearted Milesian, "there's a poor family settlin' down in the old cottage by the gates, and is 'most starvin'."

"I will go this evening and inquire into the case," said Mrs. Bonfield.

And with Charley carrying a basket in which was piled up a goodly supply of jelly, wine, home-bred, and hot-house grapes, Honora walked to the ruined cottage.

Alas? for the squalor and poverty of the wretched place—a candle burning on the hearth, a gaunt form outstretched on a heap of straw, with fever-glowing cheeks and eyes rolling restlessly in their sockets, while by the door sat a faded woman, rocking a child to and fro in her lap.

"I hope we're not intruding, ma'am," said she, with something of a lady's courtesy and accent; "but my husband could not go any further. We are on our way to Omaha, where he thought he could get employment."

"You are quite welcome to stay here; and I will send you something from the house to make you more comfortable. Your husband's name is—"

"Black, ma'am; Belton Black. We have had bad luck, and he thought perhaps, he might do better here."

Honora Bondfield,s heart bent violently as she advanced a pace or two towards the wretched heap of straw, where the yellow flicker of the candle-light faintly illuminated a face which she would have scarcely recognized—the face of Belton Black.

He died the next night, and never knew that the compassionate eyes of his old sweetheart had rested pityingly on him in these last hours.

Death Of Prince Napoleon.

Prince Napoleon, grand-nephew of Napoleon I, has recently been killed by the Zulu's, in South Africa, while in the service of the English government. A London dispatch says:

"The body of the prince when found lay on its back. There were 18 assegai stabs in it, two of them piercing the body from chest to back, two in the side and one destroying the right eye. A locket with hair medallions and reliquary were found around the neck. The face wore a placid expression. He had evidently ineffectually tried to mount, and the failure of the flap tearing, he ran along the path to where found. Two troopers lay near the body both assegaied. The prince was very adventurous. An official account says: The prince, with Lieutenant Carey, of the ninety-eighth regiment, six men and one friendly Zulu, left camp at Keliza mountain, seven miles beyond Blood river, on the 1st inst. for reconnoisance. The party halted and unsaddled when 10 miles from camp. Just as the prince gave the order to remount, a volley was fired from an ambush in the long grass. Lieutenant Carey and four of the troopers returned to camp and reported that the prince and two troopers were missing. From their statements there could be no doubt that the prince was killed A party of the Seventeenth lancers, with an ambulance started on the 2d inst. to recover the body of the prince, which was found and brought in the same day.

Another special from South Africa says the prince imperial had been sent forward by the quartermaster general to sketch a site for the next camp. When the volley was fired not a single Zulu was to be seen. The party dispersed and sought safety under cover. The prince was never seen alive again. His horse joined Lieutenant Carey's party on the road back to camp."

CONSCIENTIOUS WITNESSES.

[Oil City Derrick.]

The interest in the Talmage trial increases faster than interest on a bank note. In fact, it is expected the interest will be compounded at last, or that the trial will. Our New York reporter is busy taking down the notes of the testimony, and his first page presents the following appearance:

Mr. Miller to Mr. Bright, showing witness a paper—"Who wrote that editorial?'

"What editorial?'

"That one my finger is on.'

"Which finger?'

"This finger.'

"This finger on the editorial?'

"Yes.'

"What about it?'

"Who wrote it?'

"The finger?'

"No, the editorial.'

"What editorial!'

"This editorial in this paper, which I hold up before you, which is headed, 'Columbine and Harlequin,' on which I now place this thumb.'

"You want to know who wrote it?'

"Yes'

"Why?'

"It's of iterest in this case.'

"What case?'

"Talmage's case.'

"What Talmage?'

"Do you know who wrote that editorial?' excitedly.

"What editorial?'

"The one just showed you.'

"The one in that paper?'

"Yes.'

"You want to know who wrote it?'

"Yes.'

Witness reluctantly replies, "I don't know.

Eli Perkins.

"Can a thing that has no life move?" asked Joseph Cook of Eli Perkins.

"Of course they can," replied Eli. "Why last year I saw a watch spring, a rope walk, a horse fly, a match box, a peanut stand, a mill dam, an oyster fry, and a cat fish; and this year I expect to see a peach blow, a gin sling, a brandy smash, and—"

"Anything more, Mr. Perkins?"

"Why yes; I expect to see a stone fence, a cane brake, and a bank run?"

"Did you ever see a shoe shop, a gum boil, or hear a codfish bawl?" asked Mr. Cook

"No, but I've seen a plank walk, a horse whip, and a tree toad, and I would not be surprised to see the great Atlantic coast, the Pacific slope, a tree box, and—"

As Mr. Cook left Eli told him that he had often seen a very mysterious thing—that he had often seen a uniform smile.

"Why, I've often seen a sword fish," said Mr. Cook. "I've seen hogs skin boots, too, and once I saw some alligator's hide shoes. Yes, Mr. Perkins, I have even heard the bark of a tree—actually seen the tree bark, seen it holler and commenced to leave. The tree held on to its trunk, which they were trying to seize for board."

SCHNEIDER'S TOMATOES.—Schneider is very fond of tomatoes. Schneider has a friend in the country who raises "garden sass and sich." Schneider had an invitation to visit his friend last fall and regaled himself on his favorite vegetable. His friend Pfeiffer being busy negotiating with a city produce dealer on his arrival, Schneider thought he would take a stroll in the garden, and see some of his favorites in their prestine beauty. We will let him tell the rest of his story in his own language:

"Vell, I valks shust a liddle vhile roundt, vhen I sees some ov dese dermarters, vat vas so red and nice as I nefer did see any more, und I dinks I vill put mineself outside apout a gouple a tozen, shust to git me a liddle abberdite vor dinner. So I pulls off von ov der reddest und best lookin' of dose dermaters und dakes a pooty good pite out ov dot, und vas chewing it up pooty quick, ven—by shimminy!—I dort I hat a piece red-hot goals in mine mout, or vas chewing oup do or dree bapers ov needles; und I velt so pad, already, dot mine eyes vas vool ov tears; und I mate for dat 'olt oken bucket,' vot I seen hangin' in der vell, as I vas comin' along.

"Shust den mine vriend Pfiffer game oup und asked me vot mate me veel so pad, und if any of mine vamily vas dead. I told nim dot I vas der only von of der vamily dot vas pooty sick; und den I ask him vhat kint of dermaters dose vas vot I hat shust peen bicking; und, mine gracious! how dot landsman laughft, und said dot dose vas red boppers dot he vas raising vor bepper-sause. You pet my life I vas mat. I radder you gif me fifty tollars as some more ov dose bopper-sauce dermaters."

WHY THE MINISTER MUST GO.—At a recent meeting of church officers in New Hampshire, to consider the causes of difference between a minister and a portion of his congregation, an old farmer summed up the causes of complaint against him as follows: Our pastor is very fond of music, and sometimes, when traveling on his parish work, he sings his favorite tunes. and sometimes he whistles them. Then he loves a joke and sometimes, when one is thrown in his teeth, he cracks it. He has a good appetite, and he eats steak or codfish, just as he pleases, without consulting his congregation. And, worst of all, he believes a minister has political rights, and has voted as he pleased, not asking permission of anybody. All of which was the narrator's facetious way of saying that he had been so undignified as to whistle; that he was genial and not afraid of a laugh; that he went occasionally to the nearest market and purchased fresh meat, while his neighbors fed on salt pork or salt fish, and that in a closely contested election he had voted the democratic ticket.

AN ORTHODOX CHINAMAN.—Concerning future rewards and punishments Colorado furnishes the following illustration, which occurred recently in a court in La Veta, where the testimony of a Chinese was objected to on the ground that he did not understand or regard the obligation of an oath. To test him he was interrogated thus:

"John, do you know anything about God?"

"No; me no belly well acquaint with Him."

"Have you no Joss in China?"

"Oh yes, gottee heapee Joss."

"Where do you go when you die?"

"Me go to San Francisco."

"No, you don't understand me. When Chinaman quit washee all time, and no live any more. where does he go?"

"Oh yes, me sabe now. If he belly goodee man, he go uppee sky. If he belly baddee man, he go luppee down hellee, allee samee Melican man."

The court was satisfied with this orthodox statement, and admitted his testimony.—Editor's Drawer, in Harper's Magazine for July.

Northern Indiana Editorial Association.

The Northern Indiana Editorial association met in its sixteenth regular annual convention, at Syracuse, Thursday, June 26, 1879, T. C. Mays in the chair. The following named persons were in attendance: T. C. Mays, ex-editor, Auburn; W. M. Starr, Goshen Times; Reub. Williams, Northern Indianian, Warsaw; G. W. Miles, ex-editor, Syracuse; J. B. Stoll, Ligonier Banner; Q. A. Hossler, Warsaw Republican; O. J. Powell, Garrett Herald; Robt. Encell, ex-editor, Warsaw; W. A. Beane, Goshen Democrat; J. W. Baker, Columbia City Commercial; F. Zimmerman, Warsaw Union; J. C. Hewitt, Lagrange Register; W. K. Sheffer, Angola Herald; I. S. Carpenter, Mishawaka Enterprise; T. P. Keator, Wabash Plaindealer; D. M. Eveland, Churubusco Herald; I. M. Mattingly, Bourbon Mirror; H. J. Beyerle, Goshen Times; J. U. Miller, Steuben Republican, Angola.

On calling the convention to order President Mays delivered the following address:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONVENTION:

As was predicted at our last annual convention, the discouragement which has followed so long in the down-grade to hard times, has gradually disappeared, and the outlook to-day is more bright and cheering than for years past. New enterprises are springing up in our midst. The factory breathes again after a prolonged silence; the vacant store room is being reoccupied and all classes are feeling the stimulus of better times. The lavish promises of nature in her rich abundance at our thresholds to-day, awaken a new interest, and the near future promises a marked advancement in our material and intellectual growth. Broken-down industries that have lain paralyzed for many a weary year are beginning to respond to th insinuating influences of better times, and where so recently all was gloom and despondency, may be heard the hum of machinery, and a renewed activity of a burdened but hopeful people springs nimbly to the front.

Keeping sturdy pace with the various avocations in life, undeviating in its course to the goal of human happiness, and wielding strong, powerful blows in splendid accomplishments, stands the local press, and it is for the furtherance of the interests of this great enterprise that we have assembled here to-day. Pressing back the rank weeds of illiteracy and discord, sending a gleam of sunshine into the darkened home, encouraging all efforts in behalf of the right; infusing grander, nobler sentiments into the hearts of teeming millions, journalism may proudly take rank with any other profession in the land. It has been said that Peace has her victories as well as War, and in those victories stands out boldly and conspicuously an incomparable individuality, more exalted more refined more unselfish, than can be found in all the heroic platitudes of the most brilliant history of the world. It is becoming more and more the fashion to reflect this individuality in the columns of the local press, and to this feature hangs their reputation of being bright, popular, influential journals. I have always thought, and believe I can point to the best of evidence to-day, to show that these annual meetings of the editorial fraternity of a given territory contribute largely to the best interests of the profession. Since the organization of this association the newspapers of northern Indiana have advanced more rapidly in local interest and solid worth, than could have been expected without its aid. A fraternization of neighboring brothers, an easy, unconstrained exchange of opinions on topics interesting and valuable to all publishers, and a cordial intermingling, of a class of gentlemen at once genial, pleasant and unassuming, cannot fail to produce a most gratifying result; and as this is the object of our presence here to-day, I trust all will realize this to an unusual degree.

I desire to call your attention to the practice of irresponsible parties arranging and organizing editorial excursions including everybody, in the name and through the influence of publishers without their consent. That its evil tendencies are abridging the usefulness and degrading the influence of the local papers, there should be no doubt. They are usually projected with an eye single to the money that falls to the lot of the projector, either directly or by a generous outburst of liberality never felt, and they should be frowned upon by every fair-minded, honorable gentleman in the profession. As long as we have an organization, and the fraternity desire recreation in this direction, there are proper officers to attend to the duty of arranging them, when we can go without begging our way, and retain the respect not usually exhibited by the editors of coal yards and livery stables.

J. U. Miller was chosen secretary pro tem, and the minutes of the preceding meeting read and approved.

The following new members were then enrolled: I. M. Mattingly, T. P. Keator, I. S. Carpenter, D. M. Eveland, O. J. Powell, H. J. Beyerle

Report of Treasurer.

The election of officers resulted as follows: Reub. Williams, President; Q. A. Hossler, 1st vice-President; W. M. Starr, 2nd vice-President; J. H. Rerick, Treasurer; H. S. Fassett, Secretary.

The chair appointed J. B. Stoll one of the committee to prepare biographical sketches of members, in place of Daniel McDonald, who was chosen at the last meeting.

The President and Secretary were then allowed the amounts of their bills for printing and postage.

The Secretary was instructed to send a statement of arrears for dues to each delinquent member, and request payment of the same.

A motion was then made that the association have an excursion to northern Michigan, to start July 17, 1879, and that a committee be selected to make the necessary arrangements. Carried, and the following persons chosen: T. C. Mays, Q. A. Hossler, and J. C. Hewitt.

Warsaw was then selected as the place for holding the next annual meeting of the association.

Messrs. Stoll, Hossler and Carpenter were then appointed a committee on resolutions.

The session closed after the discussion of matters of general interest to the members of the Association, participated in by Stoll, Carpenter, Sheffer, Baker Zimmerman, Keator and Hewitt.

EIGHT O'CLOCK P. M.

Convention met, and continued the discussion of matters of general interest to the fraternity, which was participated in by the majority of the members present.

An interesting discussion upon the propriety of appointing a committee to prepare a pro rata schedule of prices for foreign advertising took place.

The chair appointed Messrs. Keator, Beane and Carpenter a committee to arrange the schedule of prices. Adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 27.

Convention re-assembled, at 8 o'clock A. M.

The following resolutions were reported and unanimously adopted:

RESOLVED, 1st. That the thanks of this association are due to and are hereby tendered the officers of the B. & O. R. R. Co., for their generosity in furnishing transportation to the members of this convention.

2. That the courteous and efficient manner in which our worthy retiring president, Col. Thomas C. Mays, has discharged the several duties pertaining to his office, entitles him to a lasting place in the affections of the members of the association.

3. That the untiring efforts of Dr. & Mrs. Kelly, the courteous and accommodating host and hostess of the Kelley house, to render our sojourn at Syracuse entertaining and pleasant, entitles them to the profoundest gratitude of every recipient of their hospitality.

4. That our special thanks are due Supt. Bortner and the Trustees of the Syracuse High school for the use of the school building in which to hold the sessions of the convention.

5. That our thanks are also due the Messrs. Sack Bros., of Ligonier, for substantial favors at this and a former session of our association.

J. B. STOLL,
Q. A. HOSSLER, } Com.
I. S. CARPENTER,

Resolutions relative to the late Germ Brown, of the Steuben Republican, were then passed, as follows:

Whereas, It has pleased Divine Providence to remove from our midst since our last annual meeting one of our number; therefore,

RESOLVED. That in the death of Germ Brown, Esq., senior editor of the Steuben Republican, who departed this life Aug., 5, 1878, the Northern Indiana Editorial Association has lost one of its most esteemed and cherished members, the press of northern Indiana an able and efficient representative, and the public a worthy, conscientious and high-minded educator.

RESOLVED. That it is with profound sorrow that we contemplate the early demise of one so worthy to be known, honored and emulated, as a bright and shining light in the editorial profession.

RESOLVED. That we shall ever cherish his memory and life as worthy of our highest admiration.

RESOLVED. That we hereby extend to the bereaved family and friends our most sincere and heartfelt sympathies in their sad bereavement.

RESOLVED. That these testimonials of remembrance shall be, and constitute a part of the coming history of the Press of Northern Indiana, and that, when published a copy of the book shall be presented to the family of the deceased.

The committee on foreign advertising reported minimum net rates to be charged by the members. The committee was continued and requested to extend their investigation of the subject.

Ex-editor, T. C. Mays, was elected an honorary member of the association.

Topics of particular interest to the fraternity were then discussed, after which the convention adjourned sine die.

T. C. MAYS, President.
J. U. MILLER, Sec'y, pro tem.

—One of our jurors got scared out of several years growth, a few nights since. He had "been out amongst 'em" quite late, and on returning was closely shadowed by two suspicious-looking characters. The latter were two town gents, whose joking proclivities are well developed, and they tell of it with much relish; but the old gentleman makes a face as solemn as a tomb-stone and earnestly tells of his hair-breadth escape from assassination, avowing that one of the robbers was seven feet high and the other five feet across the shoulders!

OLD BUCHANAN.

Old Buck was Charitable and Spent the Whole Presidential Salary.

(Washington Correspondence St. Louis Globe-Democrat.)

Among the recent arrivals here was Isaac Cook, of St. Louis, who has been spending some weeks in Florida. Mr. Cook, during the administration of Mr. Buchanan, was a frequent visitor here, and at that time was Mr. Buchanan's postmaster at Chicago and represented his political interests in Illinois as against Douglas. Mr. Cook, in a conversation with some old friends, to-day, mentioned several very interesting and entertaining reminiscences of Mr. Buchanan's administration, showing his strong devotion and attachment to his political friends and also his generosity to the poor and needy. Mr. Cook said that he had always supposed from public report that Mr. Buchanan was a very parsimonious person. Calling on him on one occasion at the executive mansion, he found several indigent persons, of whom the president had some personal knowledge, and saw him hand each of them a $5 gold piece. Mr. Cook said, "Why, Mr. President, I am a little astonished at your liberality. The people say that you are very stingy."

The president replied: "During each year of my term I pay out every dollar that I receive of my salary for household expenses and benevolent purposes. I have a private income of $6,000 a year which is ample for any American gentleman." Another incident mentioned related more particularly to himself. He said that while he was postmaster at Chicago, Mr. Holt was postmaster general, and had taken a great dislike to him, and frequently annoyed him by writing impertinent letters. So disagreeable, said Mr. Cook, had my position become, that I determined to resign, and came to Washington for that purpose. After my arrival here I ascertained that Mr. Holt had informed the president that either Mr. Cook or the postmaster general would have to resign. I called on the president and informed him of my treatment by Mr. Holt and my intention to resign. Old Buck, in his peculiar and expressive manner, said, "Do nothing of the kind." "But," said I, "Mr. President, the postmaster general has left me no alternative." The president, in a confidential way, leaning over toward me, said, "Well, let him resign," and further remarked, "Now you may rest easy in your shoes." The result was that I returned to my office in Chicago with a highly complimentary letter, saying that he had no more efficient and capable officer connected with the department.

Bourbons.

The republicans are your true Bourbons. All their notions of government are of the Bourbon sort. When the people vote them down and out, they refuse to go down, and stay in. It would seem that, according to their own conceptions, they govern by divine appointment; and they assert the right to manage elections by military force as well as by civil agents of the central authority, and, as in the case of the Presidency, to set aside the results of such as do not please them. If this be not Bourbonism, Bourbonism has no existence on earth. And they learn nothing. They act on the supposition that a species of old world despotism, long since extirpated in every English-speaking country, will be patiently borne by the people of the great republic.

Talk about dead issues! Where shall we find a deader than this claim of right to surround with bayonets the ballot boxes of freemen? Our fathers settled it ages ago, and fell asleep assured that it would never return to be met by their children. As well talk of reviving the Holy Office or the Star Chamber, the boot or the thumbscrew. Yet here we have a Fraudulent President in the nineteenth century, boldly asserting his power to oversee our elections through a host of civil agents, and also to put, when he sees fit, a wall of bayonets between the elector and the ballot box. This claim, of course, involves the natural and necessary sequence, that if he may overlook the casting of the ballots, he may likewise supervise the counting, not only by local officers, but when it comes to the Presidency, by congress itself.

This is precisely what Grant did in 1876-7; and if we are to judge by the tenacity with which he clings to the unconstitutional authority of the statute, it is precisely what Hayes intends to do in 1880-1. So we have the spectacle of a Bourbon and a bastard Bourbon at that, wielding the stolen power of the Presidency, browbeating congress, and threatening the people with his army.

A League of Republican House Burners.

[Charlotte (N. C.) Observer.]

A letter has recently been received by a negro man at Matthews' Station, in this county, which has created a ripple of excitement in the community. The negro, it seems, applied to a young man in the neighborhood to read the letter to him, being unable to read himself, and in this way the facts in the case became public. The letter was dated at Hampton, S. C., and was signed by a name to which was attached the word "Secretary." The letter informed the negro man that it was now time to begin to burn houses and railroad bridges in the country, and went on to say that the colored men must resort to this, as they were not treated as they should be, and that their northern friends would furnish them the money. It informed the party addressed that the "President" had $200 for him for his service in the cause, and would come up on the train. He was, however, told to spare Monroe and Charlotte. Some reference having been made to a former letter, the negro was questioned as to this and exhibited another signed by another name, to which was attached the word "President." This was dated Russell, S. C., and was to the same purport as that referred to. One or other of the letters informed the negro man to whom they were addressed that he should send his answer to Liberty, S. C. The negro pretends to know nothing about the whole matter, except what he has heard from the letters. He has been about Matthews' Station for several weeks, and was formerly employed on the Carolina Central railway as one of the hands who were working with the steamshovel. It was soon after he was discharged from the road that he came to Matthews'. He has been employed by several farmers in the neighborhood, and none have noticed anything suspicious about his conduct. The matter is undergoing investigation at the hands of several well-known citizens in and about Matthews'. Letters have been written to the points in South Carolina indicated in the letters received by the negro, but as yet nothing has been heard from these places. The more conservative element in the community is disposed to look upon the matter with no feeling of alarm, but at the same time consider that it is one which must be investigated.

THE REPUBLICAN LEADERS IN CONGRESS.

The Party Too Long in Power.

[Mr. Nordhoff's Washington dispatch to the New York Herald, Republican.]

The course of the republican leaders in the senate this week has been atrocious. They have fought the army bill as though they were the rump of the Grant movement fighting for the last chance to secure an election, or as though, as is commonly conjectured, there were some secret motive in their opposition. The importance of what they have said has by no means justified their intensity and desperation of purpose. They have transcended all regular and legitimate opposition, and the have not shown any reasons that they bill ought not to pass. Their conduct has afforded a curious spectacle of men who have been too long in power for their own or the country's good—who have become intolerant of opposition from any source, either outside of or within their party, and who have forgotten how to submit to defeat, and are capable of seizing on power by any means, however violent. The display which they have made is of a spirit entirely and dangerously evil, and no thoughtful man can read the senate debates of the last week and consider the tone, the temper, the spirit and the wide disparity between the subject and the republican treatment of it, without perceiving that it would be well for the country if these gentlemen could be for awhile retired from power, and that it would be an extremely hazardous thing to lease it, which they seem determined at all hazards and by any means to retain.

It is the Grant movement which has displayed itself in the senate in these days, and has, with an extraordinary arrogance and intolerance, insisted on troops at the polls. If nothing else justified the democrats in insisting on their extremely mild prohibition of the use of troops for election purposes, the language and spirit of the republican leaders in the senate this week would give them abundant justification, and it is not too much to say that rather than trust these republicans—Senators Conkling, Blaine and others—with troops at the polls, it would be far better and safer to the country to disband the army. In this aspect the senate debate of this week may and ought to serve a useful and important purpose. The Grant movement has its center in that senatorial coterie which has aimed to control the house, has tried and is now trying to intimidate the president, whom it hates, and which with unerring instinct makes its desperate stand for troops at the polls as the true ground for the Grant movement to maintain. The democratic determination to keep troops away from the polls has seemed hitherto to be inspired by foolish and ridiculous fears, but the apparition of the Grant movement in the senate justifies them and ought to secure for their arms the support of all judicious voters. The spirit of the republican leaders in the senate shows that it is high time for the security and peace of the country, to have a change of parties. Like the democratic party in 1860, these men have been too long in power. They are drunk with an unpatriotic ambition. They show plainly that they do not mean to let go of the government; that they regard the country as their possession and a political defeat as a personal wrong and robbery of themselves.

The impression which this debate has made upon many thoughtful attendants upon it is that no party can be so dangerous to the country as a party led, inspired and controlled by these men, and that if the republican party appears in the presidential canvass under their leadership, it will be the duty of every man who values the country's safety and peace to oppose it and them, no matter who is on the other side. The republicans uttered a foolish cry of revolution early in the session, but your correspondent, whose duty it has been to watch all the tedious debates of the extra session, and who has not failed to expose to you the folly and weakness of the democrats, has seen nothing on the democratic side when among the worst element of that party which all compares for wickedness of purpose, for desperation and evil spirit, with the course and temper of the leading republican senators during this debate.

Letter from Alabama.

BLOUNT SPRINGS, ALA., }
June 30, '79. }

This popular summer resort is located on the North and South Alabama railroad, and is a village of about 400 inhabitants. As a summer resort this place is gaining quite a notoriety, from the fact that there are usually from four to seven hundred people here from every state in the Union and Canada. The medicinal properties contained in the waters of these springs are excelled by none save the Hot Springs of Arkansas. Strange as it may seem, it is nevertheless true, that within a radius of one hundred feet there are thirteen different springs, each containing different water, one of the springs containing arsenic, another sulphur, etc. The scenery around the village presents a picturesque appearance, being surrounded by very high bluffs, or mountains, as we would call them. I presume a more pleasant place cannot be found anywhere. One of the largest hotels in the south is here located, large enough to accommodate five hundred guests. This is truly a delightful place, this mammoth hotel is under the supervision of Mr. S. D. Holt, and a more clever gentleman can not be found. The weather is very pleasant here now, and prospects for a large cotton crop have never been better. In justice to the people in the south, I will say a better people do not live; the idea prevails among our radical friends of the north to the effect that intimidation, Ku Klux, blood-shed and slaughter reigns supreme, is all false; such talk will do for some of the radicals, but won't do to talk to a man who knows better, one who has spent most of three years in the south; let me say to the radicals, lay aside all malice toward the south, let there be a full reconciliation between north and south, let by-gones be by-gones be the watch word of all. I am sometimes asked the question by radicals, "Is it safe to travel south?" Such questions will do for a child who knows no better, or for a fanatic, whose hatred and spirit of revenge knows no bounds. These people are ever ready to grasp the hand of friendship of any northern man; they do not ask if you are a democrat or a radical. Had I time I would like to give a more thorough account of the truth as it is, for the truth I do know. I know it from observation, not falsified as written by some one whose hatred toward the south is unlimited.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

THE annual boat-race between the Harvard and Yale crews, for the college championship, resulted in an easy victory for Harvard.

THE Havana steamship City of New York, and the iron bark Helen, of Dundee, collided on the night of the 28th ult., off Absecom light, on the New Jersey coast. The Helen was so injured that she sank almost instantly, and her Captain and four of the crew were lost. The City of New York was on her regular course to Havana, and the Helen was on her way from Havana to New York with a cargo of sugar....C. Robert Linke, a Providence jeweler, has been robbed of $15,000 worth of property.

THE emerald ring belonging to the late Mrs. Hull, which Chastine Cox, her murderer, said he gave to a white woman in Boston, has been recovered. The emerald, however, is missing, and it is believed the ring was broken by Cox when wrenching it from the finger of Mrs. Hull.

THE Giant powder magazine, at Mowbray's nitro-glycerine works, North Adams, Mass., exploded last week. Jack Pierce and William Long, workmen, were blown to atoms. Adjoining buildings were shattered.

THE WEST.

A FORT WAYNE (Ind.) paper reports that there is great excitement at Cosses, fifteen miles west of there, over the attempts of a saloon-keeper named Jerry Owens to murder his four motherless children, the oldest of whom is aged 9. He first assaulted a son, aged 7, whose ear he tore nearly off, seized a large butcher-knife and stabbed a daughter of 9 years three times, each wound penetrating to the skull. She can hardly survive. He took a large, thick club, four feet long, and beat all four children, the youngest a babe of 2 years, until their bodies were literally a mass of wounds. The fiend was arrested.

TROUBLE is threatened by straggling bands of Ute Indians, who have left their agency on White river, and are now at or near North Park, in Colorado, where are also a number of mining prospecters....A St. Paul dispatch gives particulars of the explosion of a small steamer at Rockwell's island, on Lake Minnetonka, Minn., by which the boat was shivered to atoms, and about a dozen people injured, four or five of them fatally....A seventy-five hour pedestrian contest at Chicago, between O'Leary, of that city, and Crossland, of England, for $5,000 a side, was won by the Chicago man, who covered 250 miles, the Englishman being twenty-five miles behind at the finish.

TWO YOUNG men named R. Foster and William Howard, aged respectively 20 and 16, were drowned in Skunk river, near Danville, Iowa, last week, while bathing.

A DISPATCH from Sutro, Nev., announces the completion of the famous Sutro tunnel, for the reception of water from the Comstock mines. As an engineering work the success surpasses all expectations. In eight hours the water in the Hale & Norcross and Savage mines was lowered 100 feet, demonstrating the capacity of the tunnel to perform all the work ever claimed for or expected of it. The great undertaking has cost $6,000,000.

THE SOUTH.

THE Louisiana Constitutional Convention has passed resolutions ordering the State officers not to pay the July interest on the State debt till ordered by the convention.... The gauge on 700 miles of track belonging to the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company was recently changed to the regulation width in about seven hours.

POLITICAL.

THE Ohio Democratic State Committee have decided to formally open the campaign early in August, with speeches by Pendleton, Thurman, Ewing, Stedman, and others.

THE Democrats of Maine, in State Convention at Bangor, nominated Gov. Garcelon for re-election.

GENERAL.

DEADLY explosions: A tubular boiler in a planing mill at Philadelphia, by which four persons were launched into eternity; a boiler in an iron mill at Youngstown, Ohio, wrecking the building, mortally injuring two and badly wounding six persons; the boiler of the steamboat Clyde, at Nebraska City, Neb. mortally wounding two persons, and badly scalding two others.

AN item is going the rounds of the press stating that "all surviving soldiers who were imprisoned in Andersonville for a period of six or more months are entitled to $00 per month." There is not a word of truth in this statement. No provision has ever been made by the Government for those who suffered at Andersonville. The above canard was doubtless started by some swindling claim agency, and ex-soldiers are warned against paying any attention to it.

APPROPRIATIONS.

The following memorandum of appropriations has been furnished by the Treasury Department: For fiscal year 1877, $124,122,011; for 1878, $114,049,485. Appropriations for rivers and harbors were omitted for this year, and the Postoffice Appropriation bill was $5,000,000 less than in 1877. For 1879, $140,304,288. This includes increased deficiencies, increased river and harbor appropriations, and the Halifax fisheries award.

SILVER.

The treasury issued $13,536,942 in standard silver dollars. Of this amount $6,518,912 has been returned. The amount now held in the treasury is $28,147,351.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

The total receipts of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30 from all sources amount to $276,250,227. The total ordinary expenses, not including interest on the public debt, amounted to $164,508,384.

GOLD COIN.

The total amount of gold coin and bullion in the treasury Jan. 2, the date of resumption, was $135,382,639. The amount in the treasury June 30 is $135,236,474.61.

WASHINGTON.

THE excess of exports over imports of merchandise in twelve months ended May 31, 1879, was $260,709,876; for twelve months ended May 31, 1878, $241,850,939. The excess of exports over imports of gold and silver coin and bullion was for the twelve months ended May 31, 1879, $5,284,615; for twelve months ended May 31, 1878, $7,243,901....The receipts from internal revenue during the last year amount to $110,053,988; for the fiscal year, over $114,000,000, an increase of over $3,000,000, despite the reduction of the tax on tobacco.

THE President has appointed Col. Horatio G. Wright Chief of Engineers, with the rank of Brigadier General, vice Gen. Humphreys, retired.

IN the United States Senate, during the session just closed, 737 bills and 40 joint resolutions were introduced. In the House the bills numbered 2,305 and the resolutions 110—making a grand total of 3,287 legislative acts proposed.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

The Senate, on the 27th ult., passed, by a strict party vote, the Judicial Expenses Appropriation bill as it passed the House. Mr. Vest's silver resolution was debated without action.——The House, after a sharp debate, passed the bill appropriating $600,000 to pay the fees of U. S. Marshals and their deputies. A resolution was passed, by a party vote, providing for an adjournment on Monday, June 30.

The Senate, on the 28th ult., discussed and again postponed the resolution of Mr. Vest declaring in favor of the free coinage of silver. The bill making appropriations to pay the fees of United States Marshals and their deputies was passed after a brief discussion, Mr. Logan making the principal argument against the bill.——The House passed the bill exempting from license and enrollment [illegible] Mexico.——The Senate, in executive session, rejected the nomination of D. T. Corbin as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Utah.

Mr. Vest's resolution for the complete remonetization and free coinage of silver was finally disposed of by the Senate on the 30th ult. The resolution, on motion of Mr. Allison, was referred to the Committee on Finance, where it will sleep until the next session. The President's message calling attention to the failure of Congress to appropriate money for the necessities of the Government was read in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Mr. Windom introduced a bill making appropriations for the payment of Deputy Marshals, minus the political clauses. The bill was indefinitely postponed by a party vote.——In the House, a message was received from the President announcing his approval of the Judicial Expenses bill; also a message vetoing the bill making appropriations for the pay of Deputy Marshals. The House refused to pass the bill over the veto, the vote standing: yeas, 80; nays, 62—not the necessary two-thirds voting in the affirmative. The House, by a vote of 125 yeas to 23 nays, passed the bill putting salts of quinine and sulphate of quinine on the free list. Mr. Cannon moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill appropriating $600,000 to pay the fees of United States Marshals and their general deputies during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. Rejected by a party vote—yeas, 61; nays, 85.

SPECIAL MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Following is the text of the President's special message sent to Congress on the 30th ult.:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The bill making an appropriation for the payment of the fees of United States Marshals and their general deputies, which I have this day returned to the House of Representatives (in which it originated), with my objections, having on its reconsideration by that body failed to become a law, I respectfully call your attention to the immediate necessity of making some adequate provision for the due and efficient execution by the Marshals and Deputy Marshals of the United States of the constant and important duties enjoined upon them by existing laws. All appropriations to provide for the performance of these indispensable duties expire to-day. Under the laws prohibiting public officers from involving the Government in contract liabilities beyond the actual appropriations, it is apparent that the means at the disposal of the executive department for executing the laws through the regular ministerial officers will, after to-day, be left inadequate. The suspension of necessary functions in the ordinary administration of the first duties of the Government for the shortest period is inconsistent with the public interest, and at any moment may prove inconsistent with public safety. It is impossible for me to look without grave concern on the state of things which leaves the public service thus unprovided for and public interest thus unprotected, and I earnestly urge on your attention the necessity of making immediate appropriations for the maintenance of the service of Marshals and Deputy Marshals for the fiscal year which commences to-morrow. R. B. HAYES.

JUNE 30, 1879.

Very little was done in the way of legislation by either house on the final day of the extra session, July 1. In the Senate, the House bill placing quinine on the free list was passed by an almost unanimous vote. No further effort was made to pass the Marshals' Appropriation bill in either house, but in the Senate Messrs. Windom and Eaton argued the question of responsibility for the failure of the bill. After the passage of the customary resolutions of thanks to the Vice President (Wheeler) and Vice President, pro tem. (Thurman), the latter at 5 p. m. arose and said: "Senators: Thanking you sincerely for the respect and approbation expressed in your resolution adopted to-day, and for the kind aid you have uniformly given me, while temporarily performing the duties of the chair, and wishing you all safe and pleasant return to your homes, I now, in obedience to the concurrent resolution of the two houses, declare the Senate adjourned without day."——In the House, Speaker Randall, at precisely 5 o'clock p. m., rose in his seat and spoke as follows: "Gentlemen of the House of Representatives: Before we separate, I desire to return my thanks as presiding officer of this House to the members of this House, of every political division, and to say to them that I appreciate their uniform kindness and conduct; and now, in obedience to the terms of the concurrent resolution of the two houses fixing the time of final adjournment of the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, I declare this House adjourned without day."

Can Cats Reason?

Baron Von Gleichen, a German diplomatist, used to tell a story of a favorite cat as a proof that the feline race can think and draw practical conclusions. The cat was very fond of looking in mirrors hung against the walls, and would gnaw at the frames, as if longing to know what was inside. She had, however, never seen the back side of a mirror. One day the Baron placed a cheval-glass in the middle of the room, and the cat instantly took in the novelty of the situation.

Placing herself in front, and seeing a second cat, she began to run round the mirror in search of her companion. After running around one way several times, she began to run the other, until fully satisfied that there was no cat beside herself outside of the glass. But where was the second cat?

She sat down in front of the glass to meditate on the problem. Evidently inside, as she had often before imagined. Suddenly a new thought occurred to her.

Rising deliberately, she put her paws on the glass in front and then behind, walked round to the other side, and measured the thickness in the same way. Then she sat down again to think.

There might be a cavity inside, but it was not large enough to hold a cat. She seemed to come to the deliberate conclusion that there was a mystery here, but no cat, and it wasn't worth while to bother about it. From that time the Baron said she lost all curiosity about looking-glasses.

Struck Dead.

One of the most terrible instances of a scoffer struck down in the moment of his blasphemy was revealed before Mr. Carter at the Rose and Crown Tavern, East street, Lambeth walk, recently. The deceased was an engineer named Thomas Hudson, aged 67, who resided at 24 Saunders street, Lambeth, and had been employed at Messrs. Maudslay's for twenty-five years. He returned home at a quarter-past 5 o'clock on Thursday evening, and asked his daughter-in-law to get him an egg from the fowl-house. On proceeding into the yard he became excited, and, after using a frightful oath in reference to his death, he ran into the parlor, vomited blood, and fell dead in the arms of a female who had been nursing his daughter. Mrs. Fall stated that deceased did not say, "God strike me dead," but he used words of a similar character. The jury found a verdict of "Death from excitement," and the Coroner's experience enabled him to narrate a parallel case. A number of persons had assembled in a tavern at Putney, when a man charged another with taking from him twopence. The man, after being accused, said, "May God strike me dead if I did it," and he immediately after fell dead. On being picked up, the missing twopence was found firmly clutched in the deceased's right hand. He would strongly advise men against taking such wicked oaths.—Lloyd's News.

Around the Globe.

To sail around the globe in a boat only eighteen feet long and six feet three inches breadth of beam is what Captain Lewis Goldsmith, a Dane, and a resident of this city, proposes to do, starting next month. The tiny craft, which has been named the Uncle Sam, is now on exhibition in Horticultural Hall. It is built on the general principle of a life-boat, with water-tight compartments fore and aft that will keep it afloat even if the body of the boat should become filled with water. There is a snug little cabin with a bed, and this can be entirely shut in so tightly as to prevent the entrance of water. The boat is sloop-rigged, and fitted to carry a balloon-jib and gaff-topsail. It is a model of compactness. Capt. Goldsmith has followed the sea all his life. In this daring undertaking he will be accompanied by his young wife, who, though this will be her first voyage, is impatiently looking forward to the start. It is thought that nearly the year will be occupied in the tour. An examination of the little boat is interesting, and it is pleasing to listen to the venturesome man as he tells of his plans and expectations.—Boston Transcript.

Agony Caused by a Spider's Bite.

On last Saturday morning the wife of Mr. W. J. Rochelle, living near Brandon, Hill county, Texas, was bitten on the leg by a small brown spider. At first the bite felt like a bee sting, but the pain soon passed off, and she gave it no more thought until about 3 o'clock, when she was seized with the most excruciating pain in every part of her system. The flesh for some distance around the bite turned black, and her whole body became spotted. The doctor was sent for, who administered opiates, and cupped the flesh where it had been bitten. She continued, in spite of remedies, to suffer the greatest agony until Monday morning, when she began to experience some relief. At last accounts she was still in a critical condition.—Hillsboro Expositor.

THE VETO POWER.

It is Exercised Once More by the President in the Case of the Marshals' Bill.

To the House of Representatives:

I return to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act making appropriations to pay the fees of United States Marshals and their general deputies," with the following objections to its becoming a law:

The bill appropriates the sum of $600,000 for the payment, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, of United States Marshals and their general deputies. The officers thus provided for are essential to the faithful execution of the laws. They were created and their powers and duties defined by Congress at the first session after the adoption of the constitution, in the Judiciary act, which was approved Sept. 24, 1789. Their general duties, as defined in the act which originally establishes them, were substantially the same as those prescribed in the statutes now in force.

The principal provision on the subject in the Revised Statutes is as follows:

> Section 787. It shall be the duty of the Marshal of each district to attend the District and Circuit Courts when sitting therein, and to execute throughout the district all lawful precepts directed to him and issued under the authority of the United States; and he shall have power to command all the necessary assistance in the execution of his duty.

The original act was amended Feb. 28 1795, and the amendment is now found in the Revised Statutes in the following form:

> Section 788. The Marshals and their deputies shall have in each State, the same powers in executing the laws of the United States as Sheriffs and their deputies in such State may have by law in executing the laws thereof.

By subsequent statutes additional duties have been from time to time imposed upon the Marshals and their deputies, the due and regular performance of which are required for the efficiency of almost every branch of the public service. Without these officers there would be no means of executing warrants, decrees, or other processes of the courts, and the judicial system of the country would be fatally defective.

The criminal jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is very extensive. Crimes committed within the maritime jurisdiction of the United States are all cognizable only in the courts of the United States. Crimes against public justice; crimes against the operations of the Government, such as forging or counterfeiting money or securities of the United States; crimes against the Postal laws; offenses against the elective franchise; against the civil rights of citizens; against the existence of the Government; crimes against the Internal Revenue laws and Customs laws; crimes against the laws for the protection of the Indians and the public lands.

All of these crimes, and many others, can be punished only under the United States laws, which, taken together, constitute a body of jurisprudence which is vital to the welfare of the whole country, and which can be enforced only by means of the Marshals and Deputy Marshals of the United States.

In the District of Columbia, all of the processes of the courts are executed by the officers in question. In short, the execution of the criminal laws of the United States, service of all civil processes in cases in which the United States is a party, and the execution of the Revenue laws, Neutrality laws, and many other laws of large importance, depend on the maintenance of the Marshals and their deputies. They are, in effect, only police of the United States Government.

Officers with corresponding powers and duties are found in every State of the Union, and in every country which has jurisprudence which is worthy of the name. To deprive the National Government of these officers would be as disastrous to society as to abolish Sheriffs, constables and police officials in the several States. It would be a denial to the United States of the right to execute its laws, and a denial of all authority which requires the use of a civil force.

The law entitles these officers to be paid. Funds needed for this purpose have been collected from the people and are now in the treasury. No objection is, therefore, made to that part of the bill before me which appropriates money for the support of the Marshals and Deputy Marshals of the United States.

The bill contains, however, other provisions which are identical in tenor and effect with the second section of the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for certain judicial expenses," which, on the 23d of the present month, was returned to the House of Representatives with my objections to its approval. The provisions referred to are as follows:

> SEC. 2. That the sums appropriated in this act for the persons and the public service embraced in its provisions are in full for such persons and public service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and no department or officer of the Government shall, during said fiscal year, make any contract or incur any liability for the future payment of money under any of the provisions of title 26 mentioned in the section of this act until an appropriation sufficient to meet such contract or pay such liability shall have first been made by law.

Upon reconsideration, in the House of Representatives, of the bill which contained these provisions, it lacked the constitutional majority, and therefore failed to become a law. In order to secure its enactment the same measure is again presented for my approval, coupled in the bill before me with the appropriations for the support of the Marshals and their deputies during the next fiscal year. The object, manifestly, is to place before the Executive this alternative, either to allow necessary functions of the public service to be crippled or suspended for want of appropriation required to keep them in operation, or to approve legislation which, in official communications to Congress, he has declared would be violation of his constitutional duty. Thus, in this bill the principle is clearly embodied that by virtue of the provision of the constitution which requires that "all bills for raising revenue should originate in the House of Representatives," a bare majority of the House of Representatives has right to withhold any appropriation for the support of the Government, unless the Executive consents to approve any legislation which may be attached to appropriation bills.

I respectfully refer to the communications on this subject which I have sent to Congress during its present session for a statement of the grounds of my conclusions, and desire here merely to repeat that, in my judgment, to establish the principles of this bill is to make a radical, dangerous and unconstitutional change in the character of our institutions.

(Signed) RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 30, 1879.

Her Looks Got the Citron.

In a pleasant little family of this city there is a bright, black-eyed, golden-haired 5-year-old girl named Louise. The family have a young-lady boarder named Miss Annie. The young lady had some nice cake and a jar of citron sent her a few days ago by her mother, and she had been very liberal in dividing her good things with the family, and especially with little Louise. Yesterday morning Louise said: "Mamma, I believe I will go up stairs and ask Annie for some more citron." "Oh, no!" remarked her mamma; "you have already eaten up nearly all of Miss Annie's citron; and, besides, it would be very unladylike to go ask Miss Annie for it." "Well, mamma," suggested Louise, "I will just go up stairs and stand and look like I want some." She went up stairs, and it is needless to say that her looks got her the citron.—*Nashville (Tenn.) THE new Russian expedition under Gen. Lazareff against the Turkomans has left the mouth of the Attrek. It numbers about 20,000 men, a strength which it seems has been resolved upon in consequence of the Turkomans having used breechloaders in their last conflict with the Russians.

TRAMP laws are all the rage now, and Ohio has taken her turn at trying to drive the fraternity beyond her borders. The penalties of the Buckeye law are very severe, and visit from one to three years' imprisonment upon the tramp who kindles a fire on the highway or enters a yard without the consent of the owner or occupant. It is evidently patterned after the New Hampshire and Connecticut Tramp laws.

A COMPETENT court has recently decided that a "bicycle" is a "carriage" within the meaning of the act against the furious driving of carriages on highways, etc., although the velocipede was invented after the passage of the act. As in some places the city authorities permit bicycles to be run at full speed on sidewalks, and in other places forbid their being run at all on sidewalks, this decision may be useful in regulating the speed of these pestiferous vehicles.

MR. ROSS R. WINANS, of Baltimore has just been married in London to Miss Neva Whistler, his cousin, also of Baltimore. The young bridegroom has taken his bride to a magnificent home in Kensington Gardens. He is so dissatisfied with the gas furnished by the London companies that he will have gas manufactured in his own grounds. Permission to make the gas had to be obtained from the municipal authorities. Mr. Winans is the eldest son of the late Thomas Winans.

THE Paris police adopted an ingenious plan to find out how a certain firm was being mysteriously robbed. One day a large box, or rather case, was sent to the store and brought into the back office. It was marked "Explosive Materials." Air holes had been bored in it; and from this position the detective—for one was inside—could overlook the store. He saw about noon, when there was no "boss" to be seen, that one of the clerks went to the door to watch, and the other to the till, from which he took some money.

WILLIAM HENRY ERB, of St. Louis, behaved so badly to his wife that she procured a divorce. He afterward became a drunkard, and earned a miserable living as a knife-grinder. It was his custom to set up his machine across the street from his wife's house, and menacingly grind knives in her sight. This made her nervous at first, but she gradually became accustomed to it. Seeing that he was no longer scaring her, he took to running toward her, brandishing a knife, and declaring that he would kill her. When that plan began to fail, as it did a few days ago, he stabbed her to death.

PITTSBURGH is one of the blackest of cities by reason of the smoke from its manufactories; but a plan is being tested that promises to make it clean. The proposition is to wash the smoke, and the way of doing it is thus described: The washing is done by passing the smoke through the spray caused by paddle-wheels revolving in a tank of water holding soda ash in solution. The tank and wheels are placed in the flue, between the furnace and the chimney, and, the wheels being made to revolve in the direction of the chimney, the draught is increased." The smoke, after being thus treated, will not soil a white handkerchief.

AMONG the laws enacted by the late Legislature of Illinois is one providing that any banker or broker, or person doing a banking business, or any officer of any banking company, who shall receive a deposit when insolvent, whereby the deposit so made shall be lost to the depositor, shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement, and shall be fined in double the amount taken, and also imprisoned in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than three years. The failure, suspension, or involuntary liquidation of the banker, broker, or banking company within thirty days after receiving the deposit is to be deemed prima-facie evidence of an intent to defraud.

DR. SCHMIDT, of the New Orleans Charity Hospital, has had numerous opportunities for investigating the nature of the yellow-fever poison. He takes a decided stand against the germ theory, claiming it to be a disease depending, like small-pox, scarlet fever, and measles, upon a specific poison of animal origin, a product of the diseased human organism itself. The fact that in the case of putrefaction the poison increases in intensity with each individual through whom it passes explains the fatality of the disease, which increases as the epidemic advances. The prevention of the disease involves the interesting question of quarantine, and the perfect isolation of the first cases would appear to be the most important sanitary measure.

A VIOLENT and disgraceful scene was recently enacted in the French Assembly, at Versailles. M. Jules Ferry's Educational bill was under debate, M. Gambetta being in the chair. M. Paul de Cassagnac made a most violent speech, attacking the bill and denouncing its author and supporters. M. Gambetta requested M. Cassagnac to moderate his language, but this appeal served only to augment the fury of the speaker, who went on in such a violent strain that it was moved that a vote of censure should be passed upon M. Cassagnac, and that he should be temporarily excluded from his seat. At this proposal the Imperialists' section of the Chamber broke out into such an uproar that M. Gambetta found himself unable to quell the tumult. He arose from his seat, put on his hat and walked out of the Chamber, thus practically dissolving the session by leaving the Assembly without a presiding officer.

ADVICES from the East represent that the famine is assuming terrible proportions in Cashmere. It now appears to be true that the famine was caused by the cruel action of the Maharajah of Cashmere. He prevented his subjects from sowing crops at the proper time. Then he collected all the grain he could lay hands on, and now he and his agents, having made this corner in corn, are taking advantage of the rise in the price of food to enrich themselves. The Maharajah of Cashmere is a semi-independent Prince, but the inhabitants of Calcutta of all races are anxious that the Viceroy should interfere and compel the Maharajah to freely disburse the stores of grain which he and his agents have under their control. The latest news from Cashmere states that it is impossible to exaggerate the distress which prevails in many districts of the province. Some of the towns and villages have been completely depopulated.

Changes in Persia.

A glowing account is given by the Golos of the improvement going on in Persia since the country has been taken in hand by Austrian and Russian officers. A marked change, says the Russian paper, appears in Teheran. Nearly all rich Persians now drive in European vehicles; some have had built splendid and great houses in European style; the principal boulevards are lighted. But the most important matter is that the Shah is constructing a good road from Teheran through Kaswin, Kendshan and Tauris to the Russian frontier at Dshulfa. From Teheran to Kaswin it is already completed. At every twenty-five kilometers a postoffice after the Austrian pattern will be established. A new Persian army is being organized by the Austrian officers in the Austrian manner. The organization of the cavalry has been confided to the Russian Colonel of Cossacks, Domontowitch, aided by some other Russian officers. The police is being organized by an Austrian Count, who has been appointed Chief Master of Police. The police and gendarmes are to number 25,000 men. Two foreigners who wish to establish gas-works at Teheran arrived there some days ago. A company for the purpose has been formed, and counts the Persian Ministers of Foreign Affairs and of Posts among its members. The coining of the new Persian money continues without interruption; the Chief of the Mint, Amine Sultan, furnishes every day as much as 25,000 tomans in silver coin.

Are Empty Houses Dangerous?

This question may be fitly asked and answered at a season when thousands of families are thinking about deserting their homes for a few weeks to enjoy themselves at the seaside or in travel. It is asserted that houses that have been shut up for a time may become breeders of disease when they are reoccupied, and that such disorders as typhoid fever and diphtheria have occurred under these circumstances. The cause is considered to lie in the disuse of cisterns, pipes and drains, the putrefaction that is engendered by the impure air in them, the unimpeded access of this foul air to the house, which is at all events not interfered with by the closing of doors and windows against the fresh air. There is, fortunately, a very simple remedy in such cases. On returning to town, paterfamilias should take care to see that the pipes and drains are in good order; that the cellars and closets are freed of rubbish, and that the whole house is thoroughly well aired before the fiat for possession goes forth. Carbolic acid plentifully used in the cellar is both a cheap and valuable disinfectant. If these straightforward precautions are observed, no personal harm can result from the home-coming of the pleasure-seekers.—Cassell's Magazine.

No Telegraph Wires in Paris.

The use of telegraph wires in Paris for messages from one part of the capital to another has ceased, the network of pneumatic tubes being complete. Blank forms for messages are sold to the public, and may contain any number of words, the original being forwarded to destination.

INDIANA ITEMS.

Knightstown is to be made a money-order office.

A man in Scott township has four young pet skunks.

At Indianapolis scarlet fever is increasing among the children.

Henry Pelger was drowned near Evansville, while swimming.

The I. O. O. F. will erect a new hall, at Plainfield, at a cost of $4,000.

Brookville is making arrangements to supply itself with water-works.

Work has commenced on the bridge over White river at Worthington.

This season gives the most bountiful wheat harvest ever garnered in Indiana.

A blue racer snake, nine feet and eleven inches long, was killed near Wabash the other day.

David Patton, of Hanover township, Jefferson county, is 101 years old, and Sarah Moseby, of Madison, is 104.

A young son of C. E. Magee, of Fort Wayne, was attacked by a savage dog the other day and seriously injured.

About 100 dentists of this State were in session at Indianapolis, last week, forming a State Dental Association.

James Hallett, a resident of Vincennes, was fatally prostrated by heat while harvesting on the farm of Andy Purcell.

A skeleton was unearthed at Logansport which is now found to be that of the old Chief Aubechaubee of the Pottawatomies.

Prof. John M. Coulter has announced his resignation of the chair of natural sciences in Hanover College to accept a chair in Wabash College.

E. M. Higgins, a convict sentenced to State prison for two years from last February for grand larceny, has committed suicide in his cell by hanging himself with a cord.

There are twenty-two prisoners in Wayne county jail. One is making a handsome model of a ship. Another makes watch-guards and other fancy work out of horse-hair.

In Terre Haute a traveling horse-dealer named Edward S. Cooper was killed in an affray with a colored rough named Albert Evans, who struck Cooper on the head with a heavy chair.

A German passenger on the steamer Lytle, giving his name as Susman, committed suicide by drowning, when the boat was near Garrett's Landing, on the Ohio. He was probably 40 years old.

An infant belonging to Frederick Boub, of Versailles, was seriously scalded, the other day, by falling into a pot of soup. The mother had carelessly placed it on the floor, and the child sat down in it.

Eddy Yocum, a 12-year-old son of Jack Yocum, of Carbon, was instantly killed the other day by the accidental discharge of an old musket while out hunting. The load entered his right eye, tearing through the brain.

The State Millers' Association held a session last week, at the capital. The principal business done was the adoption of a resolution ratifying the compromise between the Executive Committee of the National Association and the Consolidated Middlings and Purifier Company, after a long discussion.

Swindlers are going through various parts of the State, claiming that parts of farm machinery are infringements of patents owned by them, and threatening prosecutions if royalty is not paid. The farmers, rather than suspend work in the busy season to defend suits, generally come down with the $5 or $10 demanded.

The agitation of the locomotive-whistling nuisance, recently inaugurated by a new law of the Legislature, has been kept up so frantically that the matter has finally ended in the courts. A man asked an injunction on an engineer on the Indianapolis, Bloomington and Western railroad, enjoining him from "blowing" his whistle so much, and the Judge granted it, holding that the law is unconstitutional.

A colossal grape-vine is growing upon the farm of Mr. John Copeland, near Hagerstown, Wayne county. A few feet above the ground it measures forty-two inches in circumference. This large trunk grows upward thirty feet, and separates into two branches, each of which is eight inches in diameter. The vine has spread itself over the tops of two large beech trees which stand near, and during the grape season the trees are overloaded with the fruit. A fabulous number of bushels of grapes is said to hang on the tops of the trees, seventy feet above ground, quite out of the reach of the fruit-gatherers.

Mr. Henry Pohlman, of Montgomery county, was awakened by hearing a noise in his back yard, and his dogs barking as though they had something at bay. As he got up he took his gun with him, and, on opening the door, he saw that his smoke-house door was open, and some one close by it. He asked who was there, but got no answer; he asked again, still no reply; the third time he demanded an answer or he would shoot. The person addressed made no answer, but advanced toward Pohlman, who raised his gun and fired with fatal effect. On going up to the person he had shot, to his great surprise he found that it was his uncle, Joe Brinker, who was living with him at the time. The unfortunate man lived but a short time after he was shot.

Wood Instead of Leather.

We often pity those Eastern travelers and peasants who wear the old-fashioned wooden sandals, and congratulate ourselves that no such heavy and uncomfortable shoes are worn in our country. But the French, who lead the fashions of the world, are substituting wooden in place of leathern shoes. They think them better than the ordinary shoes for those accustomed to out-door labors. Their common-sense view of the matter is this: Leather easily soaks in water, and laborers who work in swampy lands or in wet places have wet feet all the day, and suffer much from colds, rheumatism and other forms of sickness. Wood is impervious to water, and wooden shoes insure dry feet under all circumstances.

The peasants who wear them are found to have much better health than those who still cling to leather. There is a great gain, also, in cheapness and durability. The wooden shoes cost less than 40 cents a pair, and will last almost for a lifetime. They are made light and easy to wear. A small cushion is attached to the inside of the upper part to relieve the pressure, and the shoes are large enough to permit the use of stockings. It is possible some bold reformer may introduce them into this country, but we are afraid they will never be popular.

Driving Rats Away Without Poison.

We know of three methods. First, the old French plan. This is followed, chiefly in Paris, by men who make it a special business. They take a deep tub, with water on the bottom and a little elevation in the middle like an island, on which is only a place for just one rat to sit on. This trap is covered, and has a large balance valve opening downward. On the middle of this valve a piece of fried pork or cheese is placed, and, when the rat walks on to it to get the cheese, the valve goes down, drops the rat into the water and moves back in position. A road is made from the rat-hole to the top of the tub by means of pieces of board rubbed with cheese, so as to make the walk more attractive for the rats. In the course of the night some ten, twenty, or even more rats may go down, and, if the island was not there, they would be found most all alive in the morning, quietly swimming around; but the provision of the little island saves the trouble of killing them, because their egotistic instinct of preservation causes them to fight for the exclusive possession of the island, on which in the morning the strongest rat is found in solitary possession, all the others being killed and drowned around him. Second, the New York plan, invented by one of the Friends. The floor near the rat-hole is covered with a thin layer of the most caustic potassa. When the rats walk on this it makes their feet sore; these they lick with their tongues, which makes their mouths sore, and the result is that they shun the locality, not alone, but appear to tell all the rats in the neighborhood about it, and eventually the house is entirely abandoned by them, notwithstanding the houses around are full of rats. Third, the Dutch method. This is said to be used successfully in Holland. We have, however, never tried it. A number of rats are left to themselves in a very large trap or cage, with no food whatever. Their craving hunger will cause them to fight, and the weakest will be eaten by the strongest. After a short time the fight is renewed, and the next weakest is the victim, and so it goes on until one strong rat is left. When this one has eaten the last remains of the others it is set loose. The animal has now acquired such a taste for rat flesh that he is the terror of all ratdom, going about seeking what rat he may devour. In an incredibly short time the premises are abandoned by all other rats, which will not come back before the cannibal rat has left or died.

An Indian Heiress.

Gen. Alfred Sully, who died recently at Fort Vancouver, on the Pacific coast, left a very valuable estate in Philadelphia, inherited from his father, and also a considerable sum of money he had accumulated in his long army career. The Philadelphia estate alone is worth several hundred thousand dollars. It is now said that the only person to whom any part of Gen. Sully's large fortune of right belongs is his half-breed daughter, Julia, at present living with White Swan's band of Yankton Indians, eighty miles above Yankton, Dakota, on the Missouri, and making her home with the family of Colin La Mont, also of mixed blood. Those who knew Gen. Sully well while campaigning against the Indians of Dakota say that at his death he had no wife nor any issue living except this girl, and steps will soon be taken to establish her rights to the fortune. The marriage of Gen. Sully, according to Indian custom, with this girl's squaw mother is susceptible of proof, and it is believed that it will be difficult to invalidate the claim. Gen. Sully's daughter, who is well known to those who have traveled through the upper country, is regarded as the handsomest Indian maiden on the Missouri river or in the great Sioux nation. She cannot talk English, and her habits are thoroughly aboriginal. The daughter of the late Gen. Sully was frequently seen by the writer, while engaged in surveying the Yankton reservation. Having occasion to stop at the house of Colin La Mont, the girl's handsome appearance attracted attention, and La Mont was asked if she was a daughter of his. La Mont said: "No, sir, she is Sully's daughter, and if any of you men have seen Sully you would say she bears a strong resemblance to him."

Wonderful Precocity.

The most noted case of childish precocity is perhaps that of Christian Henry Heinecker, born at Lubec in 1721. He could talk at ten months old; when he had completed his first year he could recite the leading facts in the Pentateuch, and a month later had acquired the rudiments of ancient history, geography and anatomy; had learned the use of maps and 8,000 Latin words. When 2½ years old he could answer almost any question in geography and history, and before his death, which occurred in 1724, at the age of 4 years and four months, had learned divinity, ecclesiastical history, and other branches of knowledge, and spoke Latin, French, German, and Dutch. About a year before his death he harangued the King of Denmark, to whom he had been presented. In his last moments he displayed the utmost firmness, and attempted to console his grief-stricken parents.

HONORING THE SOLDIER.

Hypocrisy of the Republican Party Exposed.

Speech of the Hon. D. W. Voorhees, of Indiana, in the U. S. Senate.

Sir, the soldier roll of this hour, with the Democratic party in the ascendency in both branches of Congress, under the control, if you please, to use a hackneyed phrase, of "Confederate Brigadiers," shows a better patronage bestowed on the Union soldier than it did when the Republican party had unlimited sway.

But I come to another feature of this subject which constantly confronts us. I listened, as we all did, some time ago to the brilliant speech of the Senator from New York, in which he fiercely arraigned the Democratic party on account of the present composition of the Senate. Because a number of gentlemen on this side served in the Confederate army, and a less number on the Republican side served in the Union army, therefore in his opinion the Democratic party was largely to blame, and, therefore, he launched all his powerful invective against us.

I call attention to the passage to which I allude in the speech of the Senator from New York. He said upon that occasion:

> Twenty-seven States adhered to the Union in the dark hour. Those States send to Congress 269 Senators and Representatives. Of these 269 Senators and Representatives fifty-four, and only fifty-four, were soldiers in the armies of the Union.

He is now speaking of the House as well as the Senate:

> The eleven States which were disloyal send ninety-three Senators and Representatives to Congress. Of these, eighty-five were soldiers in the armies of the Rebellion, and at least three more held high civil station in the Rebellion, making in all eighty-eight out of ninety-three.
>
> Let me state the same fact, dividing the houses. There are but four Senators here who fought in the Union army. They all sit here now; and there are but four. Twenty Senators sit here who fought in the army of rebellion, and three more senators sit here who held high civil command in the Confederacy.

He says there are four Union soldiers sitting on that side. I can count but three, but I will take his count.

With powerful force, with vehement voice and gesture, and with a look of lofty reproach and menace, the Senator from New York called us to account for that state of affairs. He assailed us until we sat here looking at each other in a sort of bewildered way, wondering which one among us was most to blame because there were not more members of the Senate on the Republican side, chosen by Republican Legislatures, who had served their country under the flag in time of danger. The Senator so amazed me, and arrested my attention so thoroughly that I have looked into the subject somewhat since. Sir, I am the last man to indulge in a wanton personality; but the Senator from New York cannot complain—I will not say complain, for that he never does—but he cannot charge me with a want of fairness when I remind him, as I do now, that since the war closed there have been four elections held in the State of New York by Republican Legislatures. Each time the party of which the Senator is so brilliant and distinguished a leader and ornament had an opportunity to send somebody here who had shed his blood, or offered to shed it, in the war for the Union. Four times they refused to do it, three times by sending the Senator himself, and once in sending a gentleman whom I presume I may mention as once his colleague, Mr. Fenton. Four times the party of which the Senator is leader and king in his own State had a chance to select as Senator some soldier who had adorned the history of New York by his valor, who had been conspicuous by his heroism, who had faced the belching batteries of the enemy, and yet each time the towering figure of the Senator himself intercepted the soldier's hopes. Those who wore the blue went to the rear while the tall plume of the civil chieftain went to the front; and yet how he rails at us for not filling the Republican seats on the floor with Union soldiers! Amazing spectacle!

Was ever such daring displayed before in the Senate? Does the Senator assume that our forbearance is illimitable? Behold him; the representative of a State which four times has had the opportunity to send some one of her many soldiers to this place, and which has persistently refused, arraigns others in that regard! The Senator from New York said, and said well, as he says everything well, that New York sent a half million of her men to the field. So she did. I claim an interest in the glory of New York. She is the great metropolitan State of this republic. New York city is the great commercial outlet for us all. The Senator from New York can never utter one word of praise adding to the distinction and glory of his State that will not meet with a warm response from me and from the Western people. And I insist that in the vast population of that great State there are many soldiers who would make good Senators if the Republican party would only give them a chance.

Firmly persuaded, however, Mr. President, that the Senator from New York by this time feels convinced and convicted in his own mind of his errors upon this point, I will pass to another State, a very busy State on this floor through its great-brained and warm-hearted Senator. If I have not heard the exact words fall from his lips which we heard from the Senator from New York, yet the same spirit has pervaded all he has said. He has made constant assault on the Democratic party for its alleged hostility to Federal soldiers. He too has been disturbed because there are so many men on one side of this Chamber who periled their lives in battle and so few on the other. If this fact is to be deplored, then I ask why comes the Senator from Maine [Mr. Blaine] here? Why does he not yield to some gallant soldier from the Pine Tree State? The Senator from Maine was just as good a soldier as I was, and no better. We both staid at home, and kept our seats in Congress; we paid our money to fill the quotas of our townships, and in this way hired substitutes. Some of my kindred, perhaps it is not proper for me to say also some of my wife's kindred, went to the front, and some of them died from wounds in battle. How that may be with the Senator from Maine I seek no further to disclose.

But there have been, in the State of Maine, five elections for Senators since 1865, each time resulting in the choice of a Republican Senator. Are there in fact no soldiers in that State to send to the Senate? Is there nobody there fit to be a member of this body who wore the blue during the war? If there is, and he has been jostled aside by the superior ability and, I will not say artifice, but ingenuity of the Senator from Maine, certainly that Senator ought not to come here and reproach us for his own grievous fault. Five times the State of Maine has had the chance to do honor to some soldier in her borders, and five times she has done nothing of the kind, and thus she has added five conspicuous illustrations of the dire hypocrisy, the vile sham, and black, false pretense of the Republican party in its pretended love for the Federal soldier.

We have now and then heard a rush of fervid sound from the State of Michigan. It comes sometimes as a hurricane of wrath. It invokes all the bloody memories of the past and wishes the country to feed on them. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Chandler] is especially incensed at the presence of a Democratic majority, and at the presence of more Senators who fought in the Confederate than in the Union army. The Confederate soldier was sincere, for no man can deny the good faith of those who freely died for their principles. When such men pledge themselves to the Government, as they have since the war, I believe in their manhood and honor.

But what right has the Senator from Michigan to complain that Union soldiers are not here to meet them as Senators as they often did on the field?

Since 1865, the close of the war, four elections in Michigan have taken place for Senator. What soldier has been honored? Not one. My friend who sits opposite me [Mr. Ferry] knows that I am not complaining that he is here, or criticising the wisdom or the judgment of the Legislature that sent him; nor will the other Senator [Mr. Chandler], junior in rank but senior in years, misunderstand me. I intend, however, to silence those who reproach the present composition of the Senate, or compel them to explain why it is that their own States have so universally ignored the Federal soldier and sent men here who staid at home, never confronted the enemy nor encountered danger during the war. How well the gallant and brave Senator from Illinois [Mr. Logan] understands this. I think I can at this moment read his thoughts. The "home guards" are here in force. We see them all around us. The proper order of things is here reversed. The rear ranks are to the front, and the front ranks have gone to the rear. And now these rear men in war and front men in peace fill all the air with a dismal cry over the injustice which they themselves have inflicted on the soldier.

The senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] is not here. I hope prosperous gales are attending upon the ship that is bearing him abroad. I took a kindly leave of him, and I wish him a pleasant and safe voyage; yet if he were here I doubt not his voice would be swelling the chorus of assault, because there are more military men on this side of the Senate than on the other side. Sir, Vermont has held seven Senatorial elections since the war closed. There could not have been any soldiers, I think, in that State, or some one might have been found in seven trials. The State is not large, the population is not extensive. Seven times a Senator was called and seven times a civilian answered and was chosen. Seven times the roll of public merit has been called of those who deserved well of their country; and seven times the eager, hungry, stay-at-home, home-guard politician has rushed to the front, seized the prize, and the soldier has stayed at home. He comes not here from Vermont.

What I say of Vermont is likewise eminently true of the Old Bay State. There have been six Senatorial elections in Massachusetts since the war, and where is the face of the bronzed veteran on this floor? Why comes he not? Why does he remain away from these halls? Massachusetts sent, I believe, 150,000 troops to the field, and yet not one is honored by a seat on this floor, and the hearts of the two Senators from that State beat in unison with the heart of the bold Senator from New York as they all together charge on the Democratic party in hot anger because the Republican party, almost omnipotent all over the North, has sent here but four men who were Union soldiers, while the South has sent twenty or thirty—I do not know how many, nor do I care—who were soldiers on the other side.

Sir, I think, perhaps, I have illustrated this phase of hypocritical politics sufficiently for the present, and, if so, I may pass to another feature of the same general fraud. The cry is not only that there are too few soldiers of the Federal army in Congress, but there is a great panic because there are too many of what are called Confederate Brigadiers. They are painted as very dangerous characters; they are held up to the country for the purpose of alarming it. We are to have a shrieking campaign in Ohio; it has now commenced in favor of a man who staid at home and put money in his purse, against two Federal soldiers traveling on three legs between them, and the issue is the danger of Confederate Brigadiers!

That is to be the battle-cry of the Republican leaders in the great Ohio contest between two Union soldiers on the Democratic side with three legs, and a "home-guard" who got rich by the opportunities of the war on the other side, the leader of the Republican hosts. What a campaign it will be! I can see it now. With banners uplifted, with songs and battle-cries, drum and fife, it is expected to affright the souls of all good people of Ohio into the support of Foster for fear the election of Ewing and Rice will give over the State to the Confederate Brigadiers.

Let us see a little further, however, about this dangerous person called the Confederate Brigadier. Who first brought him here? Who is responsible for the introduction of the Confederate Brigadier to the theater of national politics? Southern gentlemen around me on this floor are here because they thought the country was restored to its normal relations; that the States were rehabilitated under the constitution; that each State had the right to select its own representatives in both branches of Congress, and that they were not compelled to ask leave to come of any set of men from any part of the country.

Gentlemen, I welcome you. You are right in being here. You are met, however, by a party with a violent unwelcome, with abuse and denunciation hurled as a key-note to party warfare by the great Senator from New York, and followed up by all the Senators on that side of the Chamber. Sir, there is something due to history on this subject. Is the Confederate soldier unfit to take part in the affairs of this Government; or is it, in fact, only the Confederate soldier who votes the Democratic ticket to whom you object? Is it the Confederate soldier per se, or does the objection to him only arise when he votes the Democratic ticket? If a Confederate soldier votes the Republican ticket, and indorses all the rascality that overwhelmed the South as a deluge during carpet-bagism, do you embrace him? Tell me when you have ever spewed such a one out of your mouths. Tell me where you ever repulsed him from your warmest and most affectionate political embrace. None such have ever been cast out by the Republican party. On the contrary, all such have had seats of dignity and robes of honor assigned.

It is but a little while ago since a Confederate Brigadier first took part in the control of public affairs. He was invited to do so by the candidate of the stalwarts for the next Presidency, Gen. Grant. Grant appointed Brig. Gen. Amos T. Akerman, of Georgia, to a seat in his Cabinet. A majority of the Republican Senators sitting here to-day on their oaths voted to confirm him as the first law officer of this Government. They gave it to him to construe the constitution, to interpret the laws, to render decisions binding for years, and perhaps for all time. Gen. Grant put into the hands of Confederate Brig. Gen. Amos T. Akerman the portfolio of justice, and a Republican Senate confirmed him; and why? Not because he was greatly learned in law. Nor did they object that he had carried a sword, and killed whom he could, under the Confederate flag; he voted the Republican ticket, and that was enough; it washed away all his sins, and made him clean and pure in their eyes, though his sins had been as scarlet before.

Another instance, nearer home in time and place, occurs next to my mind. I know what profound satisfaction I will afford to the Senator from New York [Mr. Conkling] when I pause for a moment to pronounce a eulogy upon the present administration. I know the appreciation which his robust intellect has of the patriotic and comprehensive capacities of the administration now in power. I know, therefore, he will be grateful to me for calling attention to the fact that, although he has arraigned us for the disproportion of Confederate Brigadiers in this body to the Union Brigadiers or Major Generals, yet this favorite administration of his has confided one of its very important Cabinet portfolios to another Confederate Brigadier, Gen. Key, of Tennessee. I have no word of disparagement for Gen. Key or Gen. Akerman. I am not here to abuse or denounce these men for changing their politics; they had a right to do so. I do say, however, that Senators on the other side, after voting to confirm these men for positions of the very highest public importance, have not the shadow of a right to assail us for welcoming the Southern Senators who are on this floor.

Gen. Key drew his sword under the flag of the South, and fought through the war. He then came to the Senate, and while here made a speech. I refer to it now principally to show how much the Senator from New York has forgiven, to exhibit that gracious phase of his character which some do not know of as well as I do, to illustrate that his forbearance and charity are as broad as the mantle that covers all sin. Gen. Key spoke just before he was appointed to the place he now holds. Commenting upon that very memorable field of testimony wherein Eliza Pinkston covered herself and the Republican party with infamy, and while arraigning John Sherman for being the patron of that paragon of falsehood, the present Postmaster General on this floor, on the 18th day of December, 1876, used this language:

"And on this testimony, the falsehood of which is so apparent on its face, a State is to be disfranchised, and a President, whom the people never elected, is to be placed in office."

I told you, Mr. President, I would prove how generous the charity of the Senator from New York has been. Within but a few days of his appointment and confirmation, the present Postmaster General not only announced that the present President of the United States was not elected President by the people at all, but further, that there was a plot to foist him into that office by disfranchising a State through the instrumentality of wholesale falsehood. He has never recanted this truthful statement that I know of. I suppose he has agreed to vote the Republican ticket, and doubtless he does so. I presume it was on that condition that a Republican Senate confirmed this Confederate Brigadier with an additional handicap in the shape of the speech I have read from.

Mr. Conkling—How does the Senator stretch my charity over that?

Mr. Voorhees—Because I have never heard that ringing voice which God has given the Senator from New York in denunciation of that appointment. I therefore supposed he had condoned the offenses enumerated by me. I think the word "condone" a fitter word in this connection, all things considered, than "forgive." The Senator has been unsparing in his assaults because of our affiliation with the men of the South, while the administration of his party appoints not merely a Confederate Brigadier, but one who in his presence said that your President never was elected by the people, that his claim to that great office rested on wholesale falsehood and threatened the disfranchisement of a State.

Passing on, however, I invite Senators to take a walk with me through the South, starting from the Potomac. I will promise still further to illustrate the shameless, barefaced, false pretensions of the Republican party on this subject. As soon as we cross the Potomac we at once find a Federal Judge holding an office for life in Virginia. I shall not seek to disparage his ability or his character, but he was an original secessionist and the editor of a secession paper when the war broke out. I allude, of course, to Judge Hughes. He is now where he construes the laws of the United States throughout a wide expanse of country and over a large and intelligent population. He was appointed by a Republican administration, confirmed by a Republican Senate, confirmed by the voices of those who have since hurled their anathemas in our ears because we welcomed you, and you, Southern Senators, to this floor. They have welcomed Confederate officers to the bench and to the Cabinet; they have welcomed them to foreign missions; they have welcomed them to official positions of every description, on the one sole condition that they would vote the Republican ticket. Party politics controls this whole matter. When they vote the Republican ticket they are your Brigadiers; when they vote the Democratic ticket they are our Brigadiers.

My purpose must not be misunderstood. I am not producing any of these names here to assault them; I am simply using them to illustrate a policy so crooked and so outrageous that it deserves exposure, and it shall have it.

Here, next, is another Virginian, John S. Mosby. Who was John S. Mosby? I know him well. I speak no unkind word of him, yet I can remember when it was a question whether his surrender would be received, whether he would be accepted as a prisoner of war, or whether he should be outlawed from that general amnesty which the Government was then extending. There was a time when the name of Mosby shook the fears of men in this Capitol. There was a time when it was supposed he fought under a black flag, and that it could sometimes be seen from the dome in the soft sunlight of an afternoon. It was thought that his warfare partook of the nature of the guerrilla, and such a belief largely prevails to this hour. But all is forgiven now; not only forgiven, but verily this most offensive Confederate warrior has his rich reward. Instead of some wounded Federal soldier occupying the position, this Republican Senate has confirmed John S. Mosby as Consul at Hong-Kong, and he is now an American representative to the oldest empire on earth; he is among the Celestials.

The traveler, in passing through Virginia, naturally visits North Carolina next. We will do the same. Thomas Settle, of North Carolina, is now a District Judge of the United States, a life office of rank and importance. It is doubtless true that J[illegible] Settle is a competent man; I am told he is by both the Senators from that State; but he was an officer of the Confederate army. He was a secessionist; he fought the battles of secession; he turned to be a Republican, and was made President of the Republican National Convention which nominated Grant, in 1872, at Philadelphia. Afterward he was made Minister to Peru, and he now occupies a high judicial station. I proclaim here, as far as my voice will go, that the most profitable speculation a man who fought in the Confederate army can now engage in is to advertise himself ready to enter the ranks of the Republican party at a fair compensation.

Gov. Holden, of North Carolina, was an original secessionist and a signer of the ordinance of secession which took North Carolina out of the Union. The Republican party, as soon as he joined its ranks, its unhallowed ranks down there—I will not quite apply that word to it up here—made him Governor of the State. He remained Governor until he was impeached; but proven crimes did not seem to disgrace him with the Republicans. Since then he has been appointed Postmaster at Raleigh and confirmed by the Senate, and he is there now at a good, wholesome salary. Every weak or treacherous man in the South who for shame or for love of gain desires to abandon his friends and prey upon his own people is thus rewarded.

Take the Barringers; one of them is a United States Judge in Egypt. They were Confederates; they are Republicans now, and they are cared for.

The United States District Attorney of North Carolina, Mr. Lusk, was an officer in the Confederate army, and he was confirmed here. He was confirmed by Senators whose souls shrink from contact with a Confederate officer unless he is a Republican. Mr. Young was a Confederate officer, and he is now one of the Revenue Collectors of that State.

Going on down the Atlantic coast and we strike South Carolina, the land of the Marions, the Sumpters, the Hamptons, the Prestons, the Rutledges, the Butlers; the land of chivalric men. What has occurred here? James L. Orr was once Speaker of the House of Representatives, and I speak of him with respect; he is dead. I knew him well. He went into secession, and armed rebellion, and was a Confederate officer. He afterward joined the Republican party; and what a place they gave him! They made him Minister to Russia. If not one of the first-class missions, it is the foremost of the second-class. I believe it does not rank with the first.

Mr. Conkling—It does.

Mr. Blaine—It does now.

Mr. Voorhees—Then it was one of the four first-class missions, England, France, Germany, and Russia; and this Confederate officer received it as his reward for joining the Republican party. I know what my friend from Illinois [Mr. Logan] is saying to himself. He is mentally exclaiming: "Would to God that some of my comrades who fought under the old flag could have a great place like that." I cannot be mistaken as to what is going on in the breast of that hard-fighting Federal soldier. I think even my genial friend from Rhode Island [Mr. Burnside] has his conscience somewhat quickened if not entirely aroused on the subject by this time.

Col. Northup, of South Carolina, is now United States District Attorney; he was an officer in the Confederate army.

We move on again and pause next in Mississippi, the land of the brave and warm-hearted, as I know, for I have been there; the land of genius, because the Senator from Mississippi sitting behind me [Mr. Lamar] has his home there. Let us see how the Republican party has managed its affairs in that State. Major Morphis was the most prominent scout of Gen. Stephen D. Lee's command and he is now the United States Marshal for the Northern District of Mississippi.

Capt. G. W. Hunt was an aid to Gen. Hardee, and he is now the United States Marshal for the Southern District of Mississippi. Ah! how the good things come to the regenerate! Thomas Walton—I knew him; he is in his grave, and peace to his ashes—was an aid to Gen. Longstreet. He was appointed United States District Attorney; and after his death was succeeded by Green Chandler, a Confederate officer who was at that time United States mail agent, and is now United States District Attorney in the place of Walton, deceased.

Col. G. W. Henderson was a Colonel of Cavalry in Gen. Chalmers' division. He is now receiving the reward of his services as a United States Revenue Collector; and, in order to make you feel proud of your party in Mississippi and to finish up my work properly, it only remains for me to state that the Republican candidate for State Auditor in 1875 was Capt. Buchanan, Captain in the Second Missouri Cavalry, at Fort Pillow. He is said, according to all accounts, to have fought fiercely in that memorable battle. Yet he received all the votes the Republican party had to give, as well as the prayers of his Northern friends who could not get to the polls to vote for him. With what devout aspiration the Senator from Maine hoped for his success, and I have no doubt he could get up now and prove that he would have been elected if his supporters had not been bulldozed. Yes, he was a Captain fighting at Fort Pillow under the Confederate flag. The leaders of the Republican party standing here as the representatives of indignant loyalty against Confederate Brigadiers take to their bosoms this Confederate officer who bathed his sword in the blood of Fort Pillow!

I have heard of the means of grace. I used when a boy to attend camp-meetings. I have heard the richest outpourings of the gospel. I have heard grace described as a fountain flowing in boundless beauty and eternal and illimitable wealth. I have listened when it was claimed that this grace washed away all stains, cleansed the murderer's soul on the gallows, purified and gave peace to the guiltiest conscience ever called shivering and quaking with fear from this world to the world beyond; but I have never before heard of a fountain of grace so wide, so deep, so exhaustless, so spontaneous in its unceasing flow as that of the Republican party to Confederate officers if they will only vote the Republican ticket!

Take next Louisiana, that fated region of riot, disorder, and stupendous mendacity. We have known it long as the land of the magnolia and the cypress; we know it now as the land also of stalwart liars, as disclosed within the last few weeks in this Capitol. Let the curtain be raised and let us look at some Federal officials in Louisiana. We see one who was long in office there and who has made a great and bloody figure in history; a man of commanding military capacity—Gen. James Longstreet. Gen. Grant made him Surveyor of the Port of New Orleans, took his bloody hand in his, not only forgave but rewarded him, not only welcomed him but said, "Come up higher." Who was Longstreet? I have heard one who commanded a corps in the Wilderness speak of that dreadful shock of battle when his corps encountered Longstreet's, and the blood ran in rivulets. No braver, harder fighter ever drew sword or encountered an enemy than Longstreet. He was educated for a soldier by his Government, and he cost it more lives than any other one man who commanded no more than a corps in the Confederate army. Who was Longstreet at Gettysburg and at Antietam? An educated American soldier fighting with desperate courage to establish an independent government.

When the history of the late sectional war shall be written, alongside of the names of Gordon and Stonewall Jackson, of Joseph E. Johnston and Albert Sidney Johnston, will be written in living letters the military achievements of James Longstreet. Yet nothing stood between him and civil preferment the moment he was willing to turn his back upon his old comrades who had shared with him the bloody charge, the nightly bivouac, and the overwhelming disaster that fell upon them all at the close. And am I to sit still in my seat and hear hourly reproaches from the mouths of men who confirmed James Longstreet to a civil office because this side of the Chamber is composed in part of those who were in the same contest by his side? No, sir, I do not propose to do it. I propose to appeal for fairness, for common honesty and common decency to the country upon this question. I do not intend that the record shall be made up in the interest of injustice. It is not in the power of Republican Senators to make it up in the way they propose, for the truth is not their way. Their accusations shall recoil on their own heads. Their charges rest upon false foundations. If there is guilt at all on this subject, the leaders of the Republican party are themselves the guilty parties. Other officers may be cited in Louisiana. Col. Wharton is United States Marshal. He was a Confederate officer. Col. William H. Hough is a District Judge; Mr. Leonard is a United States District Attorney; Col. Smith is Postmaster at Baton Rouge; George B. Johnson was late Auditor; Alexander Boarman is United States Judge; Gen. P. O. Hebert was in office as one of the Levee Commissioners, under Gen. Grant. All these were officers in the Confederate army.

I cannot dwell, however, longer on Louisiana. I turn for a moment to Alabama. Who was Judge Humphreys, who is now of the judiciary of this district? Is there any office of more importance than a judicial office? Who was Judge Humphreys? He raised a regiment for the Confederate service. He had, however, only to join the Republican party and he was at once appointed one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of this district, where he now sits. He was confirmed by Republican Senators, who now prate about the presence of Confederate Brigadiers in the public service.

Now I desire at this point to say a word for the comfort of my friend from Rhode Island. Of all the six New England States the little State of Rhode Island is the only one that does herself the honor to send a soldier to this body. I am glad to see him here; he adorns the position he occupies. It is refreshing in view of the conduct of Republican Legislatures in New England that Rhode Island does send a soldier here. I have a kind feeling for Rhode Island for two reasons: She sheltered Roger Williams when he fled from the barbarism of bigotry in Massachusetts. Under his inspiration she established religious liberty, and maintained it afterward. This can only be said of the early history of two other States—Catholic Maryland and Quaker Pennsylvania. Roger Williams established the Baptist church and free worship for all in Rhode Island. This is one reason for liking that State. The other is that she has sent my friend to the Senate, a conspicuous illustration of the general infidelity of the Republican party in New England toward the Union soldier, for none comes from any other State.

The Smith Girls' Cows.

Abby Smith's cows are kept fresh in the public remembrance by her surviving sister, Julia, who has not allowed her marriage to interfere with her fight against taxation without representation. Not long after Mr. Parker married the Glastonbury agitator he was notified by the Town Collector that his wife still owed last year's tax, but she would not let him pay it, and the Collector, as a last resort, was forced to sell the historic cows, or some of their descendants, for the fourth time. It was an interesting scene. Mr. Parker, Julia E. Smith (as Mrs. Parker takes pains to sign her name), and one or two friends went at the appointed time to the sign-post, where stood the Collector ready to sell the animals. Mr. Parker asked the amount of the tax and costs, the Collector replied $78.57, and when the first cow was put up at auction Mr. Parker bid $78.57. Nobody else bid, Mr. Parker paid over the money, and the cows were returned to their pasture. Some people may not be able to see any great principle established by a woman's refusing to pay her tax, forcing the Collector to seize her cows, and then buying them back at a figure which will cover the original tax and $14 or $15 in the way of costs, but the performance gives a vast deal of satisfaction to the quaint old lady, and nobody can have the heart to find fault with it.

Seating the Subscribers.

The late Dr. Selwyn, Bishop of Litchfield, was formerly a missionary Bishop in New Zealand, where he did much hard and beneficial work in Christianizing the natives of that island. An anecdote shows the good sense and pleasant wit which distinguished him. The scene is laid at the Church of St. Paul, Auckland:

Before this church was consecrated, a discussion arose as to the allotment of seats. A man who had given a large sum suggested that those who had given most should have priority of choice. To the surprise of all, the Bishop seemed to assent, but added:

"How are we to find that out?"

"No difficulty," said the donor; "there's the subscription list."

"Very true," said the Bishop, "but you know that we have read of a poor widow who gave only two mites, and the highest authority tells us that she gave more than they all."

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, JULY 10, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

Hayes' last veto message appears in full on the second page.

The special message of the president, relative to the pay of Marshals, will be found on another page.

We ask every unprejudiced republican to read the speech of Senator Voorhees, in this issue of the COURIER.

Advices from Japan to the San Francisco Bulletin, say that Gen. Grant will hardly reach California before April 1880.

A batch of Chicago whisky thieves, six in number, was granted a full and unconditional pardon by Hayes on the 23rd of June. Next batch please come forward.

A subscriber says, "give us Dan's speech, if you can." No quicker said than done; you have it in this issue, and a royal speech it is, too.

Howl! now, you bloody-shirt stalwarts. Hays has appointed another "confederate brigadier" to revise the army rules. Another place filled by a rebel because he votes the republican ticket.

Read the knock-down arguments of Hon. D. W. Voorhees, in reply to the hypocritical claims of the republicans, as to honoring the soldiers. His speech is given in full on the third page of this paper.

Hayes, like Grant, cannot find worthy soldiers enough to supply the vancancies in paymasterships in the army. He appoints civilian friends as paymasters, in preference to old soldiers. Oh, how the republicans love (?) the soldier.

The morning papers of the 5th of July contained the usual number of accidental injuries, caused by "love of country" on the 4th. This year no city was laid in ashes, but patriotic instinct was kept alive by the sacrifice of eyes, hands, fingers and innocent spectators killed outright.

We are inclined to believe that the members of the senate were perpetrating a joke upon W. A. Wheeler, the de-facto vice-president, when they passed a resolution just before adjournment, thanking him for the ability, courtesy and impartiality displayed in presiding over the extra session. Wheeler went trout-fishing, a few days after the extra session convened.

Landers and Gray would make things howl "for a fact." Hendricks and Hancock, Landers and Gray. As to majorities, we'll say 20,000 to start on.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

Well, that does look pretty well at first sight, and it doesn't sound very bad either, according to our way of thinking; it might be possible however, that Gray and Landers would appear to good advantage. 20,000 democratic majority is certain in either case.

In the Louisiana constitutional convention, article XX, authorizing the general assembly to grant lottery charters or privileges, each charter to pay $40,000 per annum into the state treasury; all charters to cease in January, 1895, from which time all lotteries are prohibited in that state; also recognizing as a contract binding on the state the charter of the Louisiana Lottery Company, except its monopoly clause, which is abrogated, was adopted—yeas 59, nays 55.

The latest reports from France and Russia indicate a failure of the growing crops. It is estimated that France alone will have to buy over 550,000,000 bushels of foreign corn; while Russia sends startling accounts of the ravages of grasshoppers, corn beetles and other destructive insects. It is even asserted that a detachment of soldiers on the march near Elizabethpol encountered a plague of grasshoppers in such overwhelming numbers that they were compelled to beat a retreat. An area of twenty-two square miles was completely covered by the swarm.

The Washington Post hits the nail squarely on the head when it says that "there is nothing in the history of the republican party, and there is no promise that it can make of future service, that will restore it to public confidence in face of the record which it has made during the present session of congress. The party that is fully and irretrievably committed to systematized and statutory packing of juries will never be sustained by a people who love justice and demand equity. A party that believes the voting citizens of this republic need the presence of federal troops to keep them in awe and subjection while engaged in the performance of their most solemn public duty, has no hope of a further lease of power. A party which demands that a corps of partisan officials shall be appointed and paid by the government to control elections in close districts, and which threatens to paralyze the government in order to force compliance with this demand, faces sure defeat when it next appeals to the people."

It is said by Grant's followers, that thousands of dollars have been subscribed to pay the expenses of the grand reception to be given their chieftain on his return to this country. It is also said, that while money is being lavishly contributed for Grant's benefit, that the grave of Major-Gen. John A. Rawlins, remains unmarked. John A. Rowlins, the man who furnished the brains for Grant in every battle in which Grant was engaged, while Rawlins was his Adjutant General—the man who suggested every strategic movement made by Grant, except one, (the capture of Vicksburg, which was due to Gen. John A. McClernand)—the man to whom the country owes a debt of gratitude—the man who planned while Grant drank—the man who wrote Grant's military orders, in fact the man who FOUGHT GRANTS BATTLES, and was entitled to the honor which Grant received, is now permitted to rest in peace without even a marble slab, while Grant is lionized on account of stolen honors. Such is republican patriotism.

Out in the great republican state of Iowa, the people are not allowed to elect a man to office who will perform the duties of the office for a less fee than that fixed by law. The following is a case in point. "Mr. Collier of Calloway County, Iowa, was candidate, last autumn, for the office of Probate Judge. At a meeting attended by a large number of citizens of the county, Mr. Collier offered to discharge the duties of the office for half the fees allowed by law, the full amount of the legal fees being about $2,600 a year. He likewise asserted on various occasions, both publicly and privately, that he would serve for about half the regular fees. Collier was elected. The Attorney-General of the state thereupon took proceedings in the supreme court to have Collier ejected from his office, on the ground that he had induced the people to vote for him by improper and unlawful means. The supreme court decided that the proposition to serve for less than the lawful compensation, in other words, to return to persons who should become indebted for fees one-half of the amount so due by them, was a violation of law, and contrary to public policy, and that the office of Probate Judge of Calloway county was vacant, and that a new election must be held."

The Case Briefly Stated.

(New York Sun.)

There are about fifty United States Marshals in the country, every one of whom is a republican of some sort. Each of them employs several deputies all the year round. On great occasions, when members of congress and presidential electors are to be chosen, and the success of the republican party makes it necessary to falsify registration lists, fstuff ballot boxes, and imprison democratic voters, the marshals are in the habit of appointing a large number of special deputies to perform this reprehensible service. This was not the practice in the old days, while Jackson, Clay, Webster, and Benton were among us; but it is the custom now, when we are under the rule of a fraudulent president.

Congress passed a bill to pay the salaries of the United States marshals and of a sufficient number of deputies to discharge the regular duties of their offices. The bill contained a section which, if fairly construed, would prevent the expenditure of money for the employment of special deputies to perform the nefarious acts we have mentioned, or in other words, to commit political crimes and misdemeanors. The praudulent freisdent has vetoed this bill, and the marshals are out of money.

This is the whole case. Now let us see what the country thinks of it.

John Connel and Chas. R. Vernon, two officers of the government, from Washington City, passed through this place last week, on their way to Fremont, Steuben county, in charge of Miss Emma Noble, of the latter place, who had gone to Washington for the purpose of marrying the president. A Washington correspondent gives the following particulars. "A young lady who gave the name of Emeline Noble, and her residence "Indiana," called upon President Hays yesterday, and informed him that she had arrived in accordance with her promise to marry him. The president said he would have to consult some of his friends about the marriage, and managed to get out of the room. She was then taken in charge by an officer and conducted to police head quarters. She was rather finely dressed, had just arrived in the city, and seemed bent on being married. Senator Voorhees, upon being informed of the case, and happening to know her parents, requested that she be sent to the Government asylum for treatment. She was sent there to-day, in the meantime being provided with quarters in a hotel. She had with her $217, which she parted with reluctantly, although she was told it would be kept safe for her at police head quarters. She appeared very indignant because the president did not marry her, as she had imagined he would, and said if he had not consented in his silence in not declining the offers she had sent him in letters, she would have married a young man in Indianapolis. Miss Noble is about twenty-seven years of age, and is not at all bad looking, and besides is well educated."

Messrs. Grubbs and Cadwalader, respective autaors of the "libel" and "whistling" nuisances, will be somewhat relieved to know that the author of an act to provide for the inspection of petroleum oil, will be subject to an equal amount of ridicule with themselves. As the public begins to realize the inconveniences arising from a put-up-job in the interest of some speculator, indignance is manifested, and cuss-words indulged in, to an extent justifiable under few other circumstances. The act in question was passed during the last days of the special session, and was no doubt lobbied through without investigation by a majority of the members, as is usually the case with all such contemptible and uncalled for legislation. The law requires the governor to appoint a state inspector, who shall hold his office two years, and who shall 'employ a suitable number of deputies." The inspector and his deputies are required to provide themselves with the necessary instruments and apparatus, and stencils, brands and stamps for testing and marking the quality of illuminating oils, and such test shall be conducted in the following manner, to-wit:

The test shall be made in a testcup of metal or glass, cylindrical in shape, two and one-quarter inches in diameter and four inches deep, both measurements being made inside the cup, and this cup shall be filled to within one-quarter of an inch of the brim with the oil or other substance to be tested. The cup shall be placed in a water bath sufficiently large to leave a clear space of one inch under the cup, and three-eighths of an inch around it, and in such manner as to project about one-quarter of an inch above the water bath. The space between the cup and the water bath shall be nearly filled with cold water taken at the ordinary temperature, and the cup being placed in the water bath, the latter shall be heated by an alcohol lamp, with its flame so graduated that the rise in temperature, from sixty degrees Fahrenheit to the highest test temperature, shall not be less than two degrees per minute, and shall be as near two degrees per minute, as is practicable, and shall, in no case, exceed four degrees per minute. A Fahrenheit thermometer shall be suspended in such manner that the upper surface of its bulb shall be as near as practicable, one-quarter of an inch below the surface of the oil undergoing the test; as soon as the temperature reaches the point of ninety-eight degrees Fahrenheit, the lamp shall be removed from under the water bath, and the oil shall then be allowed to rise to the temperature of one hundred degrees Fahrenheit, by the residual heat of the water, and at that point the first test for flash shall be made as follows: A taper, hereinafter described, shall be lighted and the surface of the oil shall be touched with the flame of the taper, and it shall be lawful to apply this flame either to the center of the oil surface or to any or all parts of it, but the taper itself shall not be plunged into the oil, and if no flash takes place at the temperature of one hundred degrees Fahrenheit, the lamp shall be replaced under the water bath, and the temperature raised to one hundred and three degrees, when the lamp shall be again withdrawn, and allowed to rise to one hundred and five degrees by the residual heat of the water, when the test shall be made at one hundred and five degrees, by again applying the flame of the taper, as hereinbefore specified. If no flash occurs the test shall be repeated as often as the oil gains five degrees in temperature, three degrees with the lamp under the water bath, and two degrees with the lamp removed. These tests shall be repeated until a flash is obtained. The inspector shall further test the oil by applying the taper at every two degrees rise, without removing the lamp or stirring; but if a flash is obtained by this means, by a less rise in temperature than five degrees herein required, he shall at once remove the lamp, stir the oil, and immediately apply the flame. The taper used for testing may be made of any wood, giving a clear flame, and it shall be made as slender as possible, and with a tip not more than one sixteenth of an inch in thickness. No taper or match, with sulphur on it, shall be used, unless the sulphur is first removed before lighting. When the taper is lighted it shall be applied to the oil immediately, that is to say, before an ash or coal has time to form on the end of the taper beyond the flame, and in applying the taper the flame shall be made to touch the oil, but the taper itself shall not be brought in contact with the oil: Provided, That if the taper is so brought in contact with the oil, but not held there longer than for the space of one second, and the oil flashes, the test shall not thereby be vitiated, but the inspector shall immediately remove the lamp, and again test the oil by the flame, without allowing the body of the taper to touch the oil. No oil or other substance, which, by the test herein described, flashes at any temperature below one hundred and twenty degrees Fahrenheit, shall be allowed to be sold, or offered for sale, or consumed for illuminating purposes in this state. And it shall be lawful to sell for illuminating purposes any oil or oils herein described, to be consumed within this state, which shall bear a flash test of one hundred and twenty degrees Fahrenheit, as shown by said apparatus."

SEC. 5. That if any person or persons, for themselves or as agents for any person, shall sell or attempt to sell to any person in this state any such oils to be consumed within this state for illuminating purposes, whether manufactured within this state or not, before having the same inspected as provided in this act, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject to a penalty, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not less than fifty, nor more than three hundred dollars, or be imprisoned in the county jail not exceeding six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 6. Any person who shall knowingly use, for illuminating purposes, any oil or products of petroleum before the same has been inspected and branded by the State inspector, or his deputy, as hereinbefore provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding one hundred dollars.

SEC. 7. Any person selling or dealing in illuminating oils, produced from petroleum, who shall sell or dispose of any empty barrel, cask or package, which has been branded by an inspector or his deputies, before thoroughly cancelling, removing and effacing the inspection brand on the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall pay a fine of fifty dollars for each barrel, cask or package thus sold or disposed of.

SEC. 12. Any person who shall sell or cause to be sold, any of the oils mentioned in this act for illuminating purposes, which is beow one hundred and twenty degrees Fahrenheit, when tested as provided in section one of this act, shall be liable to any one purchasing said oil, or to any person injured thereby, for all damages resulting from any explosion of said oil.

Speaking of republican ingratitude to the soldiers, the Washington Capital says:

"We are having a dismal, and, as it strikes us, an unhealthy howl kept up by the republican party over the poor soldier. This means paying an officer from $6,000 to $18,000 a year, while poor old Tom Worthington, who saved our army at Shiloh, is dying in destitution; and on every corner feeble hand-organs, turned by crippled soldiers, set one's teeth on edge."

The howlers are not howling now quite so much as they were, the nominations made by the democrats of Ohio, rather changed the howl all over the country.

Suppose Tilden had been inaugurated in New York, suppose he had been kidnapped and suppose the people had risen in his defense, of what use would General Woodford have been to Grant? General Woodford was appointed United States district attorney because Grant feared Tilden's inauguration in New York and wanted in the place which is commonly held by a lawyer, "a man who had smelt powder." Was the United States district attorney to take command of the troops and Robeson's gunboats? Where was General Handcock? If his loyalty to the Grant idea was doubted, where was the general of the army? Now, wasn't it Grant's intention to override all the constitutional authorities, declare an interregnum and fill it himself? This is the man who can have the republican nomination for the presidency if he wants it.

The New York Star, of the 6th inst, contains the long-looked-for report of Congressman Glover, concerning the frauds and crookedness in the United States Treasury department. The report occupies an entire page of the Star, and fully explains many "ways that are dark" in the management of the government finances. Its exposures will surprise the people, notwithstanding the ridicule heaped upon the Glover committee by the leaders of the republican party. The names of many prominent men appear in the report, as having had a finger in the pie; among others we find the names of Hon. Hugh McCulloch, formerly of Fort Wayne; Hon. John A. Logan, of Illinois, and Hon. James S. Frazier, of Warsaw; all prominent men, well known by reputation, to most of our readers, and all shown by the following extract from the report, to have been implicated in cotton transactions. The report says:

"From August 25, 1865, to May 5, 1879, the treasury paid to attorneys, agents and informers more than $1,000,000 from the money which belonged to owners of cotton. One Charles Eames and various partners were paid within ten months of 1866 and 1867, $420,000, by order of Secretary McCulloch, $158,000 of which being shared by Eames with John A. Logan, then representative, and now senator from Illinois. In about eighteen months of those years McCulloch caused to be paid to S. H. Kauffman, first chief of the cotton bureau, $82,000, and Kauffman soon turned up as partner with Boss Shepherd and George W. Adams, correspondent of the New York World, in ownership and management of the Washington Star, which has been conspicuous in defending the District of Columbia ring and belying the Glover investigations. Robert S. Hale of New York was employed as special counsel of the treasury department by McCulloch and Boutwell, and was paid $24,369 for services rendered in the course of two years. James S. Frazier, of Indiana, was employed by Secretaries Richardson and Bristow to aid in adjusting cotton cases under the act of May 18, 1872, and received for services in the course of two years $15,513. Besides this, appropriations amounting to $166,000 have been procured by the treasury from congress to be expended by that department in defending the secretary and his agents against suits for seizures, and in defending suits in the court of claims, and the department of justice has procured in the same time appropriations of $285,000 to be spent by that department in defending suits agains the "captured and abandoned property fund"—$451,000 in all, and the attorney-general continues to ask an appropriation of $25,000 for the same purpose every year, though he and all his subordinates are salaried officials, and though under the law very few cotton claims are now allowed to go before the court.

An infamous law, procured from congress by implicated parties, forbids the owners of cotton to sue the secretary of the treasury or his agents for taking away their cotton, and appropriations have been repeatedly obtained to pay special counsel for using their legal skill to prevent owners from getting back their own!

Andrew Hosmer, a Union officer, settled in Alabama in the spring of 1865, and raised a crop of cotton worth about $30,000. When it was ready for market one of the treasury thieves seized it. The cotton bureau kept Hosmer out of his money ten years, took from him one fourth as "commission" to the robber, another fourth as "expenses," and returned half his property minus ten years' interest."

The report concluded by stating that many of these and other matters need much more investigation; that by no other method can the people learn the truth about the government, or congress get the information necessary to legislation; that the treasury is full of opportunities for wrong that have doubtless been largely used; that that as well as other departments is run by a ring; that the government has far too much to do to do it honestly or well, and that only by wholesale cutting down of government power and a wide abolution of government functions and offices can despotism and national ruin be escaped.

Portable Mulay Saw Mill,

With improvements recently made is unequaled as a neighborhood mill. It can be run by either steam or water power, and is especially adapted to the engines used for threshing.

It may be operated by either two or three men, and will cut as much lumber in proportion to the power and number of hands employed as mills of larger capacity.

It makes smooth and even lumber, leaves no [illegible] and will cut logs up to four feet in diameter. It may be transported from one locality to another and re-erected ready for sawing in from two to three days, and can be made profitable in localities where there is not sufficient timber to justify the erection of a large mill. Send for descriptive circular, price, etc., to CHANDLER & TAYLOR, Indianapolis, Ind.

—Are the citizens of Auburn aware of the existence of an ordinance prohibiting the discharge of firearms within the corporate limits? It is a little dangerous to be safe, where there is so much miscellaneous shooting, perhaps it had better be stopped.

—Prof. Seiler, who has managed the public schools of Auburn with great success for several years, has been elected superintendent of the public schools at Knightstown, in this state. The people of Auburn regret that the school-funds of the town were not sufficient to retain Mr. Seiler at the head of the schools. With his untiring energy and thorough qualification as an educator and disciplinarian, the public schools of Auburn were rapidly gaining in popularity. We heartily commend Prof. Seiler to those interested in education, in his new field of labor, as an honest, moral and educated gentleman.

Married.

BEARD—DOOLITTLE. On the evening of July 3rd 1879, at the brides residence in Stryker, Ohio, by Rev. H. A. Brown, Mr. Jason W. Beard, of Summit, DeKalb county, Ind., to Mrs. Phoebe A. Doolittle.

—While at Auburn last Thursday we took occasion to drop into the COURIER printing office. It was press day and, as a matter of course, we found all hands busy. Mr. Reed was engaged in making up his mail but received us very kindly. The COURIER has a much more pleasant editorial room than when we last called, and to all appearance is doing a profitable and thriving business. Of late the COURIER has been considerably improved.—Angola Herald.

—The Kendallville News sounds the following note of warning: "A lot of thieves have been traveling through the country imposing upon the people, claiming they were government detectives, or some other kind of detectives. These fellows should be kicked out of doors and entirely shunned. They are only rascals and use the detective fraud to cover up their business."

—The verdict in the case of Rockwell vs. Worden, was a surprise to some, owing to the character of the plaintiff. The defendant was fined $10.00 and sent to the county jail for six months, to which we have heard no objection, except that it will be an expense to the county; but as the commissioners have wisely ordered that all prisoners sentenced to the county jail shall be put to hard labor on the county farm, that objection is not well taken.

—As Cal. Husselman was coming up Main street Tuesday morning, some mischievous boys scared his team, and the consequence was his little refrigerator and milk can took a tumble, and Cal. was compelled to return to his dairy and fill up before he could make his usual delivery. There are several naughty, naughty boys in this town, who make a practice of throwing stones etc., at passing teams, and if the practice is kept up, it will cause trouble to their parents. "A word in time," etc.

—A man by the name of Thomas Dingman was literally cut to pieces by a train on the B. & O. railroad, near Albion. The New Era says, "the deceased had been in Albion nearly all day Saturday, and was very much intoxicated, and it is supposed that after starting home he laid down on the track and fell asleep, which proved "the sleep that knows no waking" on earth to him." Let this death be a warning to young men who are contracting an appetite for strong drink."

—Owing to the requirements of the new law concerning the inspection of coal oil, a number of our merchants have quit selling the article. The law is now in force, and no arrangements have been made for the required inspection. Every dealer that offers oil for sale that has not been inspected is subject to prosecution. Every person that knowingly uses coal oil that has not been inspected is liable to be prosecuted. Hunt up the old candlestick, and use a tallow-dip.

—The Selinsgrove Times advises its readers to always bear in mind the fact that coal oil is much more dangerous than gunpowder. They both explode. When gunpowder however has exploded it is all over, and what damage is done is done at once; but this is not the case with coal oil. The worst danger and most serious damage comes after the explosion, from the fact that the oil takes fire and can scarcely be extinguished, burning its victims in the most painful manner and generally with a fatal result. Ignorant and heedless women are very much addicted to kindling fire with coal oil. This they may do safely for awhile, but sooner or later they will suffer the penalty of their folly.

—The annual meeting of the Northeastern Ind. Medical Society was held at Kendallville, June 24, and was largely attended by the medical men of the different counties composing its territory. Papers were read by Dr. White, of Lagrange, Teal and Gilbert, of Kendallville, and Dr. Dills, of Fort Wayne, all of which were excellent. The following is the result of the election of officers for next year:

For president—J. B. Casebeer, of Auburn.

Vice presidents—Dr. Short, of Lagrange county; Dr. Leonard, of Noble county; Dr. Chamberlain, of DeKalb county; Dr. Fuller, of Steuben county.

Secretary—Dr. H. D. Ward, of Steuben county.

Treasurer—Dr. White, of Lagrange county.

Censors—Drs. Dancer, Carr and Spooner.

Dr. Matheny, of Auburn, was elected to membership.

The next session is to be held at Lagrange, last Tuesday in September next. Medical men everywhere invited.

WM. KNEFFER, Pres't.
H. D. WOOD, Sec'y.

An Appropriate Odor.

In Dr. Price's Unique perfumes, each particular character can find an appropriate odor. For the clergyman and orator, his refreshing and fragrant floral riches; for the brilliant and witty, his charming Evening Violet, for the sedate and robust, his persistent Thibet Musk; for the lady of fashion, his captivating Hyacinth, for the young gentleman, his delicate Alista Bouquet; for the young lady, his sweet Pet Rose. We know our friends by their voice; why not recognize them by their sweet and particular odor?

Ex-Governor Horatio Seymour delivered an address to the convicts in the Auburn, (N. Y.) prison on the fourth of July.

Wilmington Township.

MR. EDITOR:—Please allow me space in your columns to say, that the school in district No. 11, Wilmington township, closed July 2, with the most interesting and pleasant time that could have been expected. The picnic was a success, and after taking of a bountiful dinner, we listened to remarks by Mr. McDonald, followed with a closing song by the school. The following are the names of pupils neither absent or tardy during the term: Maud Metcalf, Bertha Grimm, May Nicewander, Willie Balentine, Lien Steward, Willie Cutler, Mamie Cutler, Charley Kiner. Absence caused by sickness: Ida Kiner, Loa Hurni, Addie Steward. Taking it all in all would say that we have had a very enjoyable time together, for which I return my heart felt thanks to the parents and children.

ELLA EREHART, Teacher.

UNION TOWNSHIP, IND.

EDITORS COURIER:—Permit me to return thanks to the citizens of district No. 6, Union township for the kindness shown me during the term of school which closed June 27. Having been so long associated with the children of district No. 6, (this being my third term at that place,) they have become very much endeared to me, and hope that with them life may be an entire success. Their marks of respect were shown by a bountiful picnic dinner being prepared by their parents. After dinner we listened to remarks by Mr. A. Brown, after which I was made the recipient of a beautiful album, presented by the school, followed by a closing song. Many thanks to the dear children, and hope that they may become useful men and women in society.

SUE. HORNBERGER, Teacher.

CONCORD, IND.

EDITORS COURIER:—Please insert the roll of honor, for district No. 3, Concord township, for the last month of school, closing July 1.

Dorcie Knight, Alice Knight, Emma Knight, Blanch Jenkins, Nancy Reasoner, Nettie Reasoner, Eva May, Angelia White, Ida Boyle, Dennis White, John Knight, Dick Monroe, Frank Boyle, Fesse White, Frank May.

I would say in a few words that this term of school was a pleasant one, and am under obligations to parents and children for the kindness shown to me.

BELLE HORNBERGER, Teacher.

—The school at Hopewell, Wilmington township closed on Thursday last. Everything passed off quietly, as we had been too busy during the term to make extensive preparations for the last day of school. At the close of the school the teacher was pleasantly surprised by the presentation of a very pretty oil painting, executed by one of the pupils and given in behalf of the other members of the school, which was gratefully accepted and will be kept as a souvenir of the time spent so pleasantly amongst you.

ALLA E. SHOUD.

Newville.

—A splendid rain; just what we needed.

—We learn that there were a couple of men in town yesterday (Sunday) that had an overdose of peace disturber.

—Picking cherries, currants and raspberries, and canning them, appears to engage the attention of the ladies at this point.

—Mrs. Allen, of Auburn, is visiting Mrs. Lawrence and others of her old friends and neighbors at Newville, her former residence.

—The wheat is being cut as fast as possible, and if the weather keeps as fine as it was last week, harvest will be finished in a few days in this vicinity. Crops excellent.

—Ludwig Countryman thinks the tramp that came to his house a short time ago, does not amount to much in the harvest field yet, perhaps he will in twenty years from this time, if the sauer kraut crop don't fail.

—We attended the fourth of July celebration at Spencerville, in the evening. There was quite a large collection of people, and they appeared to enjoy themselves. The pyrotechnical display was not first-class, but the balloon ascension was better.

ALPHA.

Consumption Cured

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. Sherar, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y. 6-eow 6-m.

Unwholesome.

By the unnatural combination by ignorant persons, for baking powders, they render the food very indigestible, as the chemical action in the stomach prevents their being digested. Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is prepared by the application of scientific principles, forming a perfect powder.

The democrats of California met in convention at San Francisco, on the 2nd inst, made their nominations for state officers, and adopted resolutions, among which we find the following concerning national matters, by which it will be seen, that the same sentiment prevails in the democratic party throughout the entire west, even to California:

"The democratic sentiment is an indissoluble union of the indestructible States under the paramount authority of the federal constitution in all powers which have not been reserved by the States as suffrage, is a privilege conferred exclusively to the constitution ally expressed will of the people thereof. Any attempt of the general government to interfere with elections in States or in any of them, is dangerous to the liberties of the people, and destructive to the sacredness of the elective franchise, and therefore we condemn it as unconstitutional and subversive of the freedom of the ballot; also odious laws of republican origin and adoption, by which federal supervisors of elections and deputy marshals are empowered to interfere with the registration of voters, and United States troops are stationed at places to intimidate or disfranchise citizens, native and naturalized, in unison with party brethren throughout the Republic. The democrats of California denounce the repeated abuses of the veto by Rutherford B. Hayes, setting as the executive officer of the government, in defeating the will of the people, as expressed by congress, in his rejection of the bills passed by that body to repeal the obnoxious and unconstitutional laws during the present session.

The democrats of California earnestly approve the conduct of the democrats in both houses of congress for their firm adherance to just determination in repeal of laws, by which the rights of the voters are interfered with at this instance, and under the authority of the republican administration, to the extremity of depriving citizens of suffrage for the purpose of carrying the election by force and fraud."

TUTT'S PILLS

INDORSED BY PHYSICIANS, CLERGYMEN, AND THE AFFLICTED EVERYWHERE.

THE GREATEST MEDICAL TRIUMPH OF THE AGE.

TUTT'S PILLS CURE SICK HEADACHE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE DYSPEPSIA.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE CONSTIPATION.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE PILES.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE FEVER AND AGUE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE BILIOUS COLIC.
TUTT'S PILLS Cure KIDNEY Complaint.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE TORPID LIVER.
TUTT'S PILLS IMPART APPETITE.

DR. TUTT has succeeded in combining in these pills the heretofore antagonistic qualities of a STRENGTHENING PURGATIVE, and a PURIFYING TONIC.

Their first apparent effect is to increase the appetite by causing the food to properly assimilate. Thus the system is nourished, and by their tonic action on the digestive organs, regular and healthy evacuations are produced.

The rapidity with which PERSONS TAKE ON FLESH while under the influence of these Pills, indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, melancholy, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system. Sold everywhere.

THE CRAZY FARMER.

"Hadn't you better subscribe for it?"

"I tell you no. I hain't got the money to spare; and, if I had, I hain't got the time to waste over newspapers," said Eben Sawyer, with some emphasis.

"But you will gain some information from it in the course of a year, sir," pursued John Walton.

"I tell you I don't want it!"

"Well, what do you say, Mr. Grummet? Shan't I have your name?"

"No, sir!"

This was spoken so flatly and bluntly that Walton said no more, but folded up the prospectus of a periodical which he had with him, and then turned away.

Eben Sawyer and Ben Grummet were two old farmers—that is, old at the business, though they had only reached the middle age of life; and, after their young neighbor had gone, they expressed their opinion concerning him.

"He'll never make a farmer," said Sawyer, with a shake of the head. "He spends too much time over them papers and books of his'n. He's a leetle mite above farmin', that's my opinion."

"Them's my sentiments," responded Grummet. "I tell you, Eben, the man that thinks to make a livin' on a farm in this country has got to work for it."

At this juncture, Sam Bancroft came past. He was another old native of the district.

"We was just talkin' about young Walton," said Sawyer.

"I've just come from there," replied Sam.

"He's been borin' me to sign for a paper; but he couldn't come it."

"Ha, ha! So he bored us. He's gettin' a leetle too high far a farmer."

"He's rippin' his barn floor up," said Bancroft.

"Rippin' the floor up!" repeated Grummet. "Why, Mr. Amsden had the whole floor put down new only three years ago."

"The stable floor, I mean," pursued Bancroft. "He's got a carpenter up from the village, and his two hired men are helpin'."

"Whew! I opine he'll make a farmer!"

And so they all opined—with a reservation. In short, there was something highly ridiculous in the thought of a man's thinking to be a farmer and a student at the same time, and all sorts of jests were discharged over it.

John Walton was a young man—some five-and-twenty; and, though he had been born in the neighborhood, yet much of his life had been spent in other portions of the country. His parents both died when he was quite young, and his father's farm passed into the hands of a Mr. Amsden. But now John had married, and he meant to be a farmer, and his thoughts naturally turned to the old homestead. He found Amsden willing to sell, and he bought—paying $2,500 down, and giving a note and mortgage for $2,500 more, which had been cashed by Mr. Piddon.

This farming district was upon a broad ridge of land, which had been cleared for a great many years; and, though they were the handsomest and smoothest-looking farms in the county, yet they were by no means the best. The summit of the ridge was crowned by a ledge of granite, and the soil, over the whole broad swell, was more or less wet and cold. This was particularly the case with John Walton's farm, some portions of it being wholly unfit for cultivation. There was one field of over twenty acres which was never fit for plowing. The soil was so wet and heavy that it had never been worked to any advantage; yet there was some good land upon it, and Mr. Amsden had gained fair crops while he lived there.

Ben Grummet had a curiosity to see what was going on in Walton's barn, so he dropped in there. He found that the whole of the floor, where the cattle stood, had been torn up, and that they were digging a wide, deep trench the whole length of the tie-up.

"What is all this for?" asked Ben.

"Why," returned Walton, who was busy in superintending the work, and also in working himself, "I am having a place fixed here for making manure. I mean to fill this trench up with good muck, and thus save the liquids which have heretofore been lost. I think, by proper management, I can get fully double the quantity of manure which others have got on this place."

"Do ye?" said Grummet, sarcastically.

"Yes," resumed the young man. "It is a fact that the liquid manures, could they be saved, would fully equal the solids, both in bulk and value; and when combined with well-rotted muck, and some other articles which shall take up and retain all the more volatile parts, I feel sure that they will afford more fertilizing powers and properties than the solid manures can."

"You don't say so! Where d'ye larn all that?"

"Partly from reading and partly from observation," answered John, smiling at his neighbor's open sarcasm.

"I don't s'pose it costs anything to do all this?"

"Oh, yes; it will cost me considerable before I get through."

"Yes, I should think it would!"

"I say," he cried, as he met Sawyer shortly afterward, "John Walton's about as nigh bein' crazy as a man can be."

"Eh?—crazy, Ben?"

"Oh, he's got his head full of all sorts of nonsense. He's got his stable floor torn away, and a trench dug there big enough to hold more'n twenty car-loads of dirt."

"But what in nature's he goin' to do?"

"Why, he's goin' to save the liquids, as he calls 'em. And he's goin' to put in something to take up the—the—vol—voluntary parts."

"Voluntary parts? What's them, Ben?"

"It was vol somethin. But I don't know. I wouldn't ask him. I s'pose he just used the outlandish word so's to get me to ask him what he meant, and then he'd show off his larnin'. But I wasn't so green."

"I wonder if he thinks he's comin' here to larn us old farmers how to work?" said Sawyer, quite indignantly.

"He thinks so," returned Grummet.

"Then he'll find out his mistake," added the other. "You mark my words, Ben, he'll be flat on his back afore two years is out."

And these were not the only ones who looked for the same thing. The idea of a man's coming in there with any such new-fangled notions was absurd."

Autumn came, and after John Walton had mowed over his twenty-acre field—some of his coldest and stiffest land—getting hardly enough hay to pay for the labor, he set the men at work digging deep trenches all over it. He had two dug lengthwise, running up and down the slope; and then he dug quite a number running across these. They were quite deep and broad, and into them he tumbled nearly all the stones that could be found in the fields.

"A pooty expensive way of gettin' rid of your rocks," remarked Grummet.

"It's a better place for them than on the surface, isn't it?" returned Walton, with a smile.

"Perhaps. But what on earth are ye doin' it for?"

"Why, I'm going to see if underdraining won't improve the land."

"Underdraining! What's that?"

"It is simply drawing off the water from the surface. This land is cold and wet; but if I can get the water to drain off among these rocks, the sun may warm the surface and give me a good piece of soil here."

But it looked very foolish to Ben Grummet. He believed that "what was the natur of the soil couldn't be altered."

"That's a cur'us contrivance," said Sam Bancroft. He and Ben Grummet had been at work for Walton hauling muck. He aluded to a large vat at the back of the house, into which ran a spout from the sink. This vat was capable of holding several cart-loads of stuff, and was about half full.

"That's a compost vat," explained Walton, who had overheard the remark. "All the slops from the house—the soapsuds and such stuff—which most people waste, I save by this means, and turn to good account; and, instead of throwing away refuse matter, I put it in here, and let it rot and ferment and make manure."

"But what's this charcoal dust for?"

"It answers two purposes, though by only one office. It takes up the ammonia and other volatile matter, thus holding them for fertilizing agents, and at the same time prevents the disagreeable effluvia which would otherwise arise from such a fermenting mass."

"That all sounds very well," remarked Ben, after Walton had left them; "but, let me tell you, it don't pay! He'd better let such fandangles alone if he ever expects to make a livin' at farmin'."

Before the ground froze out, Walton threw out most of the muck behind his stable, which had become well saturated, and filled the trench up anew.

The old farmers had a great many apple trees, and made a great deal of cider; but the fruit was of an inferior quality. When spring came, Walton went to some of his neighbors, and asked them to go in with him and send for some good scions to engraft upon their apple-trees. He explained to them just the plan he had formed for his own orchard. He had engaged a competent man to come and do the work of grafting, and, while they were about it, it would be cheaper to get grafts enough for the neighborhood

It was of no use. The old orchards were just such as their fathers had, and were good enough. So Walton went at it alone. He had his trees all pruned and dressed, and nearly all of them grafted to such fruit as he thought would thrive and sell best.

A little while later, and Ben Grummet had occasion to open his eyes. He found that John Walton had contrived to have 104 full loads of manure, all of which had been made within the year. However, he finally shook his head and said: "Wait; we'll see if it's good for anything."

A little while later, and the grass began to spring up on the twenty-acre lot as it had never sprung up before, the two acres, which had been plowed and harrowed up light and fine, being the best crop of corn that was grown in the whole county, and all the manure put upon it was some that had been manufactured.

And so the time went on, and John Walton was continually studying how to improve his farm. At the expiration of a few years the new scions had grown large and strong in his orchard, and began to bear fruit. He had taken care of his trees, and they were about to return him interest for the labor.

"Good gracious!" ejaculated Eben Sawyer as Ben Grummet and Sam Bancroft came into the house one cool autumn evening, and the three filled their mugs with new cider; "have you heard about John Walton's apples?"

"I knew there was a man up to look at 'em returned Ben, "but I ain't heard no more."

"Well, I was there, an heerd the whole on it, so I know. I never would have believed it. An orchard turn out like that."

"But how much was it?"

"Why, Walton was offered—cash right down—$500 for the apples he's got on hand; and he tells me he sent nearly $300 worth of early fruit off a month or so ago."

It was wonderful—more than wonderful. But they had to believe it.

"And look at that twenty-acre field," said Bancroft. "Ten years ago it wouldn't hardly pay for mowin'; now look at it. Think o' the corn and wheat he's gained there; and this year he cut more'n forty tons of good hay from it."

"But that ain't half," interposed Sawyer. "Look at the stock he keeps, and see what prices he gets for his cows and oxen! Why, he tells me he's cleared over $2,000 this year on his stock?"

At this moment Mr. Walton came in. He had grown older and was somewhat stouter than when he first became a farmer, and his neighbors had ceased to question his capacity, and had come to honor and respect him.

"We was talkin' about you, Mr. Walton," said Sawyer.

"Ah!" returned John, as he took a seat by the fire. "I hope you found nothing bad to say of me."

"Not a bit of it. We was talkin' about the wonderful improvements you've made on the old place, and of the money you make."

"And do you think it wonderful?"

"But ain't it?"

"Well," replied Walton, "I don't know about that. But I'll tell you what I do know; there is no class of people in the world who may study the arts and sciences to better advantage than the farmers, and yet, I am sorry to say, there is no class as a class, occupying the same social position, who read and study less. There are many honorable exceptions, of course. Farming is a science—one of the most deep and intricate—and he must be a man of more than ordinary capacity who can master it all. But farmers must not be afraid of books; they won't, if they are wise, follow every advice which experimentalists give, but they may study, and reason, and experiment for themselves. So I have done, and so I mean to do."

"He's right!" remarked Ben Grummet, after Walton had gone. "What fools we was that we didn't go into that graftin' operation!"

"And that under-drainin'," added Bancroft.

"And that muck and compost arrangement," suggested Sawyer.

"Well," said Ben, with a serious face, "it isn't too late now. They say it's never too late to learn, and I'm sure it hadn't ought to be too late to commence to improve after a body has learned."

"True as a book!" added Bancroft.

"Good evening."

"Good evening."

Introduction of Wheat in America.

Prior to the discovery of this continent by Columbus, there was no cereal in America approaching in nature the wheat plant. It was not until 1530 that wheat found its way into Mexico, and then only by chance. A slave of Cortez found a few grains of wheat in a parcel of rice and showed them to his master, who ordered them to be planted. The result showed that wheat would thrive well on Mexican soil, and to-day one of the finest wheat valleys in the world is near the Mexican capital. From Mexico the cereal found its way to Peru. Maria D'Escobar, wife of Don Diego de Chauves, carried a few grains to Lima which were planted, the entire product being used for seed for several successive crops. At Quito, in Equador, a monk of the order of St. Francis, by the name of Fray Iodosi Rixi, introduced the new cereal; and it is said that the jar which contained the seed planted is still preserved by the monks of Quito. Wheat was introduced into the present limits of the United States, contemporaneously with the settlement of our country by the English and Dutch.

A Very Bad Boy.

A precociously wicked lad named Ollivier, barely turned 16, was tried to-day for murdering his cousin, an old lady of 75. His father, a respectable man, employed on the Orleans railroad, put him to a good school. He was clever, won prizes, but was disliked by the masters and scholars, and left because of altercations. He obtained employment as a clerk in a biscuit manufactory, and, being introduced by his father on New Year's day to the cousin, she gave him 20 francs. In March he came to see her, and, learning she was without a servant, called again, found her alone, and battered out her brains with a pastry mold he took from the kitchen. He had pocketed a watch and a bunch of keys, when the door was broken open by neighbors, who heard the victim's cries, and he was arrested crouching down behind an arm-chair. A plea of insanity was rebutted by medical evidence, and a verdict of guilty with extenuating circumstances, based on his youth, was followed by a sentence of twenty years' penal servitude.—Paris dispatch to the London News.

Gifted With Great-Grandmothers.

The baby Princess of Saxe-Meiningen is singularly gifted with living ancestors. She has two great-grandfathers, the German Emperor and Duke Bernard of Saxe-Meiningen. As for great-grandmothers, the fortunate little girl has four, the Empress Augusta, now 68 years old; Queen Victoria, who is 60; Princess Mary Ann of the Netherlands, the maternal grandmother of the baby's father, and a lady of 69; and the Duchess Mary of Saxe-Meiningen, his paternal grandmother. The little Princess has, however, her two grandfathers living, but only one grandmother, the Crown Princess of Germany.

SHOOTING NIAGARA.

Sad Ending of a Pleasure Tour Around the World.

[Buffalo Cor. Cincinnati Enquirer.]

On Thursday last a wealthy Frenchman, named A. Rolland, accompanied by his wife, arrived at Niagara falls from the West, and registered at the Park Hotel. The couple had been on a tour around the world, and were on their way to their home in Paris, intending to leave the falls for New York to-morrow, to take a French steamer next week. Neither could speak much English, but they passed themselves to belong to the cultured Parisian class. This morning, by a singular and deplorable accident, Madame Rolland lost her life, and was swept down the surging rapids, and over the great Horse Shoe fall.

It appears that about 10 o'clock this morning the couple, who seemed to be much attached to each other, went out for a walk to view the wonders of the great cataract. They strolled about Goat island, enjoying the sublime scenery, and then crossed the bridge to the Three Sister islands. While on the middle island of the group Madame Rolland, being thirsty, procured a tin cup and stooped down at the edge of the foaming rapids to get a drink of water. All accounts say that her husband's back was turned at this moment, and he was probably gazing up the river. Suddenly, according to his own statement, he heard a piercing shriek, and turning around was horror-stricken to see his beloved wife in the torrent of water and just disappearing from sight. The body of the unfortunate lady was carried on the surface to the edge of the Horse-Shoe, or Canadian fall, and was seen to plunge over and into the dreadful abyss below. This was the last seen of her, and no trace of the body has yet been discovered.

The frantic husband was at first completely dumb founded, and stood rooted to the spot as if in a stupor. After a little while he apparently began to realize the awful fate of his wife, and made his way back to the hotel, where he succeeded, after much effort, in explaining the dreadful calamity which had befallen him. Not being able to speak much English, and in a state of mind that can better be imagined than described, he naturally excited warm sympathy; and, though he was the only direct witness of his wife's fate, his account of the disaster was readily accepted as the true one. He gave way to violent grief all through the remainder of the day, and his condition, at late accounts to-night, proved that he had been suffering terrible mental anguish.

Nothing definite has been learned regarding his history or that of his unfortunate consort, except the facts stated above. Their pleasure tour had extended as far as Japan, and they were looking forward to a speedy return to their native land. Madame Rolland was a lady of attractive appearance, and had not reached middle age. It is doubtful whether the body will be recovered for several days, if at all. That of the last previous victim of Niagara—a man named Walker, who was carried over in a small boat several weeks ago—has not been found. As a general rule, clothing is always torn off the body going over the great cataract, and cases have been known in which corpses have been terribly mangled.

Faithful Engineer Pritchard.

The heroic part taken by the engineer, B. F. Pritchard, in the accident on the Pittsburgh division of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, between Confluence and Cumberland, on Wednesday last, deserves to be immortalized. He saw just ahead a large piece of rock that had rolled down the side of the mountain on to the track. Quick as thought he sprung from his seat, without relaxing his hold on the throttle, jammed it shut, and put on the air-brakes. The next instant the engine went crashing and grinding over the rock, was thrown from the track, and turned over and over. When the trainmen and passengers reached the battered wreck which had a moment before been a splendid piece of machinery, the form of the brave engineer was found standing erect, as if his engine was running smoothly over the rails. One hand was grasping the throttle and the other the handle of the air-brake valve with a clutch that could not be loosed. His lips were pressed closely together, and his face wore a determined but anxious look, and penetrating his side was the polished iron handle of the reverse bar. The engine, in turning over, had pressed him against the bar and he had died at his post of duty. That the engineer's action was successful in putting on the air-brakes is known, for it saved the train from wreck and its sleeping human freight from death. Whether he succeeded in throwing back the reverse bar is not known, for, though it was not reversed when the crash was over, it might have been before. It is probable that he saw that all he could do in the brief moment between the discovery and the collision was to close the throttle and hold the air-valve open long enough to insure the patent brakes a full supply of condensed air.—Cumberland (Md.) News.

Increase in the Use of Opium.

A statement on good authority has recently been made to the effect that during the last two years the consumption of opium by the working classes has considerably increased, and an explanation has been advanced that this increased consumption has been induced by the restriction of the sale of intoxicating liquors by the early closing of public houses under the late act. That the sale of narcotic drugs has of late greatly increased we fear there is but little reason to doubt, but that the explanation referred to is the correct one we feel bound to demur to. It is rather to the hardness of the times than to any restraint in the sale of drink that the increased consumption of opium by the working classes is to be attributed. Opium is cheaper than alcohol, and 2d. expended on the former will give more present ease than 6d. worth of the latter. Nor when first commenced does its use produce such unpleasant after-effects as an intoxicating dose of alcohol. It is sad to learn that the sale of opium is extending among the lower classes, and we hope, if the evil be found to be gaining ground with the rapidity stated—and from facts before us we cannot doubt the accuracy of the report in the main—that Government will take action in the matter and place severe restrictions on the sale of all narcotic drugs. The free employment of narcotic drugs has wrought individual evil enough among the upper and middle classes of society, but it would be a national disaster if their use continued to extend among our working classes.—London Lancet.

HOME DOCTOR.

A Nation of Dyspeptics.—That dyspepsia is a national ailment no one can deny. Americans do not attend to their digestive organs sufficiently. Coffee and tea are much more injurious than are generally supposed. Strong coffee will at least promote, if not indeed cause, gout, and its continued employment seriously impairs the blood, irritates the kidneys, and deranges the nervous system. Tea, with its abundant adulteration, is still more harmful. Chocolate, habitually used, is probably more damaging than either. Instead of the vinegar bottle, lemons should be employed, and the whole array of pickles is little more than a series of insults to the stomach, which it is very slow to digest. Though apples are excellent as food, they should not be eaten at unreasonable times. At meal-times is the only proper season. There is no objection to baking, steaming, stewing or roasting the apple, although the best results may be expected from the fruit uncooked.

A Simple Remedy.—Here is rather a curious remedy, but in many cases a certain one, for the cure of indigestion. It is simply the cultivation of a habit of chewing, while out of doors, different kinds of green leaves, and swallowing the juice. One can always cull a leaf from a hedge or bush as one passes. Almost all are good that are not nauseous, such as the ivy, or poisonous laurel-leaf. One of the latter, however, is a capital thing where there is a slight irritation of the stomach. The chewing of leaves cures dyspepsia, principally, I believe, by increasing the flow of salivary juice, and partly by the tonic and stimulating action of the leaf chewed. The leaves that occur to me at present as most likely to be beneficial are those of the pine trees, spruce or Scotch fir, blackthorn, currant and rose bushes, mint, the petals of many flowers, the stalks of mountain-daisies, the white portion of rushes, the bark of many young trees, and the tender parts of the stalks of green wheat, oats, or almost any of the larger grasses; but your own taste must in a great measure guide you, if you elect to make trial of any remedy. I should say, however, that the chewing is better to take place before or between meals than immediately after.

If your eyes show signs of fatigue, and you find that objects become blurred when you look at them steadily, cease to use the eyes for awhile, and then, after sufficient rest, if work is resumed, discontinue it at the first indication of fatigue. See that the light is sufficient, and that it falls properly upon your work. Never sit facing it. It is best that the light shall fall upon the work from above and behind. Failing this, it may fall from the side. Never use the eyes at twilight. Any artificial light for the evening is good if it is brilliant and steady. When artificial light is at all painful, it is safer to read or write during the day. Do not read in horse or steam cars, or after you have retired for the night. Many a tedious case of weak sight has been traced to the pernicious habit of reading in bed. Do not read much during convalescence from illness. Before the muscular system generally has quite recovered its healthy tone, we ought not to expect the muscles of accommodation to bear the continuous use to which they are subjected in reading or writing. We cannot be sure that the delicate muscles of the eye are in a condition to be used until the muscles of the leg and the arm have regained their strength and firmness. Above all, take plenty of sleep, and, by retiring early, avoid the evening lights. Exercise and air are also indispensable.

Walk for Health.—What is better than a walk in winter as stimulation to the nerves? How grateful the crisp air is to the lungs! How clear and sweet it is to the nostrils! How it inspires and sustains one in a swinging gait of four or five miles an hour! How the cheeks glow, and the eyes shine, and the muscles tingle with delightful vigor, after such a walk through the winter sunshine! A chaise-ride is not half so good, for it robs the trip of the necessary exercise. Try it, you who seek health and strength. Winter walking, as a "nervine," is a million times better than medicine, and for improving the complexion is worth a whole harbor full of lotions and washes. It will put an edge on appetite that you can't buy at the doctor's, and in promoting digestion is better than a corner drug-shop's entire stock of bitters and pills. If you have never tried it, take a walk. Keep your mouth closed, your shoulders well thrown back, your head up, and remember that your legs—and especially your hips—were given you to walk with. Some people walk with their knees, bodies and shoulders—and no wonder they don't like it. We don't like to see them. There is an art in walking as in other things. If you don't believe it, observe the motion of some shapely woman who knows how to move, or study the gait of a man who has some spring and litheness in him. It is never too late to learn how to walk by walking. And, once learned, it is a delightful accomplishment.

LYING LOVERS.

It was a lover loved a maid
That had a father who
Was thought to be by all the world
Exceeding well-to-do.

"Oh, be my wife!" the lover cried;
"My bride, my queen, my own!"
"You do not love me," she replied,
"I fear, for myself alone.

"My pa he is a wealthy man,
His only child am I;
And all his riches shall be mine
Whenever he shall die.

"But riches, the apostle says,
Unto themselves take wings; oh,
If pa were poor would you love me?"
"I would," he cried, "by jingo!"

"I am so glad—I knew you would—
I in your love am blest;
Pa failed last night," she sobbed and sank
Upon her lover's breast.

"That makes not a bit of difference,"
That gallant lover cried;
"So I have you I care not who May take all else beside."

* * * * *

That night when her lover took his leave,
At twenty minutes to one,
She whispered softly in his ear,
"Darling, I was in fun.

"True, pa has failed, but he his pile
Had duly salted by;
I only wished to try your truth—
Darling how glad am I!
For now I know you would love me well,
Even in poverty."

And as he went home the lover,
Who was by no means green,
He blithely hugged himself and sang,
"I know what failures mean."

PITH AND POINT.

The man who patronizes a second-hand clothing store is never troubled with fits.

A young lady who has a young man "keeping company" with her, who is employed in a telegraph office, calls him "the electric spark."

"Would you like to be lynched?" asked an exasperated Missouri farmer of a horse-thief. "No, I'll be hanged if I do!" was the reply.

Professor in law recitation—"Mr. ——, what is excusable homicide?" Senior, promptly—"Excusable homicide is when a man kills himself in self-defense."

"Your late husband, madam," began her lawyer—"Yes, I know he was always late out o' nights, but now that he's dead don't let us upbraid him," said his charitable widow.

The expression of a boy's face at the end of a straw that lacks two inches of reaching the cider in a barrel is supposed to be the model that the artist selected in the delineation of Adam leaving paradise.

A school-boy, being asked by his teacher how he should flog him, replied, "If you please, sir, I should like to have it on the Italian system of penmanship—the heavy strokes upward and the downward ones light."

The possibilities of the telephone are not exhausted, and there is no telling where the science of acoustics will end. Large steamboats are now daily conveyed by sound from New York to New Haven and vice versa.

"Oils and pomade are no longer used on the hair." This is a sensible edict of fashion. Hereafter a young man can help a young lady to say nothing in particular on Sunday evening without having his vest soiled.

A young man who went to Leadville about six weeks ago writes cheerfully back to his friends: "I have gained three pounds since I came here, and gained it all in half-ounce installments. Haven't been shot in the head yet."

"Beg pardon sir! But, I've just caught these two young rascals making a slide in front of your doorstep, and they say as you gave 'em permission." "It's quite correct; I did, policeman. The fact is, I expect my mother-in-law to luncheon."

A little boy from New York went into the country visiting. He had a bowl of bread and milk. He tasted it, and then hesitated a moment, when his mother asked him if he didn't like it, to which he replied, smacking his lips: "Yes, ma; I was wishing our milkman would keep a cow."

The tramp's last dodge is to ask your advice about going to the next town, and when you warmly advise him to go he says he has much confidense in your good judgment, and will emigrate further on at once. "But," he adds, "wouldn't you advise me to borrow 10 cents before I start?"

A waiter was told by a countryman to "bring something of what he had." The waiter brought a regular dinner upon small dishes, as is the usual form, and set them around his plate. The countryman surveyed them carefully a moment, and then broke out: "Well, I like your samples; now bring on your dinner!"

The Good Horse—The Tipsy Rats.

A friend of mine is employed on a farm near Toronto, Ontario, where a horse belonging to the wife of the farmer is never required to work, but is allowed to live the life of a gentleman, for the following reason: Some years ago, the lady above-mentioned fell off a plank bridge into a stream where the water was deep. The horse, which was feeding in a field close by, ran to the spot and held her up with his teeth till assistance arrived, thus probably saving her life. Was this reason or instinct? Again, a gentleman engaged in the business of distilling at Cincinnati has more than once told me that the rats in his distillery are in the habit of drinking any spirits spilled on the ground or left in open vessels, and that they often become, in consequence, so tipsy that they cannot run, and are easily taken by hand. Which is this?—Nature.

A Small Boat for a Long Voyage.

Mr. Heap, in charge of the United States Legation at Constantinople, in his last dispatch to the Department of State, announced the arrival at that port of Joseph T. Clarke and Francis H. Bacon, in the Dorian, a boat of only two tons, from Boston. A voyage across the Atlantic in so small a vessel excited great wonder in Constantinople. They had encountered a severe storm, in which Mr. Clarke nearly lost his life.

SABBATH READING.

[Written for The Chicago Ledger.]

Will We Know Our Own in Heaven?

Will we know our own in heaven
When we cross that unseen shore;
When our trials all are over,
And we sorrow never more?
Who will be the first to greet us
When we reach the other side?
Will it be our own dear loved ones
Who have crossed the rolling tide?

Oh, what comfort does it give us,
As we muse upon it here!
For it must be they will meet us—
Those who are so us so dear;
And the dread of death's dark shadow
Greatly lessened to us seems,
And we do not fear; the changing
To us seemeth as a dream.

May we each one trust in Jesus,
While we falter here below;
Placing all our sins before Him,
Ever ready then to go
To our loved ones over there;
For to them we trust are given
Crowns immortal, harps of golden,
And a resting place in heaven.

The Despair of the Skeptic.

The sad, pathetic and almost hopeless cry of Robert G. Ingersoll over the grave of his brother has been widely read. It is eloquent with feeling, and shows that his heart is tender and affectionate, and one cannot but sympathize with a grief which is not soothed by any hope of a reunion hereafter. He says, speaking of death: "Whether in mid-sea or among the breakers of the farther shore, a wreck must mark at last the end of each and all; and every life * * will at its close become a tragedy as sad and deep and dark as can be woven of the warp and woof of mystery and death." And "Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities. We strive in vain to look beyond the heights. We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry."

This, then, is the despairing moan of one of the brightest infidels of our country—of one who is doing more to destroy faith in God and immortality than any other! How striking the contrast between such a "wreck," as Ingersoll calls it, and the joyous, hopeful death of a Christian.

I have lately been reading an account of the last hours of Sir Walter Scott. As death approached this great and healthy-minded Scotchman, he asked Lockhart to read to him.

"What shall I read?" said Lockhart.

"Need you ask?" said Sir Walter. "There is but one book." And the words that have comforted the dying and soothed the living for 1,800 years fell gratefully upon his ear:

"Let not your heart be troubled. In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you."

"Lockhart," were the last words of Scott; "Lockhart, I have but a moment to speak to you; my dear, be a good man; be virtuous, be religious! Nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here."

Ingersoll sadly says over the remains of his beloved brother: "We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry;" and, speaking of his dead brother, he says: "He climbed the heights, and left superstition far below."

If such are the results of "climbing the heights;" if to climb is only to look into the black gulf of despair, to hear over the grave only the "echoes of our wailing cry," who would not rather stay in the warm valley of faith and hope?

I would kindly ask Ingersoll, Are not faith and hope better than doubt and despair? And, if so, why make it your life's mission to ridicule, satirize, and destroy the faith and hope of the thousands who find in their religion the only refuge from the sufferings and sorrows of this life? Why labor to make your brother of humanity believe that he is but

The pilgrim of a day?
Spouse of the worm and brother of the clay,
Frail as the leaf in autumn's yellow bower,
Dust in the wind, or dew upon the flower?

* * * * * * * *

A child without a sire,
Whose mortal life and transitory fire
Light to the grave his chance-created form,
As ocean wrecks illuminate the storm.

And then

To night and silence sink forevermore!

If these

The pompous teachings ye proclaim,
Lights of the world and demi-gods of fame,
The laurel wreath that murderer rears,
Blood nursed and watered by the widow's tears,
Seems not so foul, so tainted, and so dread,
As the deadly nightshade round the skeptic's head.

Infidelity is, indeed, the "deadly nightshade," deadly alike to happiness and to virtue. There are exceptions like Ingersoll, who have inherited from their Christian ancestors natures so generous that their sturdy virtues have resisted the deadly influence.

But every blow this modern apostle of infidelity strikes against Christianity is a blow in favor of vice and immorality. To the young man whose faith Ingersoll, by his wit and eloquence, has shaken, I would say, listen to his cry of despair over his dead brother, and compare it with the Christian's triumphant death and joyous hope, and choose the truth.—Isaac N. Arnold.

Not Proven.

I can accord to the scientist nearly all he can claim without in the slightest degree affecting the foundations of my faith. Does he tell me this universe was created millions of years ago? I do not deny it, for my Bible tells me it "was in the beginning," which may have been long before the millions of ages which he claims. Does he tell me that the laws which are in operation today have been in operation for millions of years? I admit it; and only add, that the great Lawgiver existed before these laws. Does he tell me of the boundlessness of space, of the infinitude of worlds? I rejoice the more, for all are the work of my Father's hand. Does he tell me that the laws of evolution show a development from the less to the greater? I accept all that; for, under the gospel, from a sinner I become a saint, and from a saint I shall be exalted above the angels, and shall sit down with the Savior on His throne. I believe in the urvival of the fittest, for the Christian shall survive "the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds." Does he tell me that this evolution dispenses with the Creator? I say, not so. There are many things which are claimed in evolution to which I must give the verdict of the Scotch jury, "Not proven." Yet, were I to admit them all, they would not affect my faith in the wisdom and skill and power of the great Father. —President Jackson.

PERSONALS.

GEN. GRANT proposes to pass next winter in Florida.

REV. THOMAS K. BEECHER, of Elmira, N. Y., has also been D. D.'d.

MRS. CHRISTIANCY has left Washington to join her husband in Peru.

HON. EDWARDS PIERREPONT has gone to England for a two-months' visit.

REVIVALIST MOODY will take hold of beer-stained Cincinnati next October.

ALEXANDER I. of Bulgaria failed to make a match with Queen Victoria's daughter.

THE venerable George Lessard, of Montreal, aged 90, has just married his fourth wife.

EX-MINISTER SCHENCK, with his three daughters, is living in Washington and giving regular receptions.

ROBERT COLLYER has gone to New York, but the wickedness of that city has got a tremendous start on him.

THE London Queen says that the editor of the New York Herald is to hunt the tiger in Bengal next winter.

CLARA JOHNSON, a colored centenarian, died in Spring Garden, Pittsylvania county, Va., a few days ago. She was 111 years old.

THE will of the late Rear Admiral Gordon leaves an estate of several hundred thousand dollars to near relatives, besides legacies to several religious and charitable institutions.

THE coffin of the late Baron Lionel de Rothschild was of lead, in a case of fine elm with a plain black cloth covering. In accordance with Jewish custom it bore no inscription.

WE infer that the other pedestrians took no interest in the clean pair of heels which Weston showed them, and that they would have been much more gratified with any other sort of exhibition.

EX-SENATOR ALCORN, of Mississippi, has promised to help his colored laborers to reach Kansas after the work of the season is over, provided they fulfill their contracts now, and wish to go when the time comes.

AMOS PENDLETON is the name of an aged hermit of Grape island, in Boston harbor. He was an ex-slaver, and because William Lloyd Garrison helped to break up his trade rejoices at this late day that the Abolitionist is dead.

MR. ALVAN CLARK, of Cambridge, Mass., the telescope-maker, is now 76 years old, and still full of energy and skill. For forty years Mr. Clark was a portrait painter, and earned $30,000 by his art before he began his telescope experiments.

MRS. LYDIA MARIA CHILD, the authoress and anti-slavery agitator, is now 77 years old, and lives at her old home in Wayland, Mass. In the course of a recent conversation with a writer in the Boston Herald she spoke of Garrison as a firm believer in Spiritualism.

THE people of Dublin are disgusted to find that the statue of Tom Moore, recently dedicated there, is of zinc instead of bronze, and when it was newly painted several cracks were found in the head through which the rain had beaten, filling the statue about half full of water.

JOHN WATTS, a noted gambler, died a few days ago in Philadelphia. He was a man of great importance aboard the Mississippi steamers in the old times, and his gambling exploits are still recounted. Although a heavy player and clever swindler, he saved no money. His last words were: "I'll bet $10 that I get well."

YAKOOB KAHN, the Afghan ruler, has a decidedly aristocratic appearance. He is of middle height, straight, and well-built. His complexion is that of an Italian, his features being of the usual coarsely aquiline Afghan type. His expression is somewhat stern and careworn, but indicates character and resolution. His beard is short, crisp, and black. He lately rode into the British camp, dressed in an Afghan cloak of the finest material, made with evident attention to a becoming fit.

Whitewashing a Tribe.

Whitewash is too common among civilized people to excite remark, but, among the uncivilized inhabitants of a South Sea island, it once provoked an exciting rivalry. A missionary thus describes the way in which the natives took to whitewash:

What was their astonishment when in the morning they found my cottage glittering in the morning sun white as snow? They danced, they sang, they shouted and screamed with joy.

The whole island was in a commotion, given up to wonder and curiosity, and the laughable scenes which ensued after they got possession of the brush and tub baffle description.

The high-bred immediately voted it a cosmetic, and happy did many a swarthy coquette consider herself could she but enhance her charms by a daub of the white brush.

And now party spirit ran high, as it will do in more civilized countries, as to who was, or who was not, best entitled to preference.

One party urged their superior rank; one had the brush, and was determined at all events to keep it; and a third tried to overturn the whole, that they might obtain some of the sweepings.

They did not even scruple to rob each other of the little share that some had been so happy as to secure.

But soon new lime was prepared, and in a week not a hut, a domestic utensil, a war-club, or a garment, but was as white as snow; not an inhabitant but had a skin painted with the most grotesque figures; not a pig that was not similarly whitened; and even mothers might be seen in every direction capering with extravagant gestures, and yelling with delight at the superior beauty of their whitewashed infants.

IN India 20,000 to 30,000 people perished on their way home from a fair. Possibly while at the fair they had attempted to sustain life on the oyster stew dispensed at said fair.—Boston Transcript.

FARM NOTES.

THE crow destroys more grasshoppers than any other bird. He must, therefore, be one of the blessings in disguise we hear so much of.

EXPERIENCE with the Colorado beetle should prompt the early planting of potatoes; also, abundant manuring and good preparation of the soil. The latter often doubles the crop.

A FARMER who has tried it, speaks in the highest praise of gas tar for painting wagon wheels, stating that it tightens tires and spokes better than anything else that can be used.

A LITTLE dry sand covered over potatoes when they are first put in the cellar will destroy any unpleasant odor they may have. A sprinkling of dry, air-slaked lime will mitigate a tendency to rot.

IT is supposed that eating rich clover pastures wet with dew or recent rains is dangerous to cows as producing bloat. But when dry there is but little danger, if the cows are not too hungry and unused to such food.

CORN-COBS dipped into molasses and suspended from limbs in the plum trees has saved many a crop of plums for a Moreland farmer. He has done this for many years with success. The curculio will lay his brood into the sweetened corn-cob instead of the plums. From six to twelve prepared corn-cobs are sufficient for an ordinary-sized tree.

THERE is a well-known farmer living near Toronto, who, the Toronto Globe says, is in a position to make the following proud boast: Last year four cows on his farm had eight calves, eight sheep had seventeen lambs; one mare had two colts; one goose had two broods of goslings, one of nine and the other of eleven; and, lastly, his wife had twins, a boy and a girl.

A MOST valuable remedy for heaves, and said to be a sure cure: Forty sumac buds, one pound of resin, one pint of ginger, half a pound of mustard, one pint of unslacked lime, one pound of epsom salts, four ounces of gum guiacum, six ounces of cream of tartar. Mix thoroughly, and divide into thirty powders, and give one every morning in their feed before watering.

CLOVER-FIELDS will be benefited by the application of a bushel or two of plaster, as early this month as possible. There is no better place on the farm to put wood ashes than on clover. Circumstances already referred to are tending to make clover a more important crop than we have regarded it as, a preparation for wheat and for green feeding. For this use some of the annual varieties may be sown.

A CORRESPONDENT of Forest and Stream says: "A very successful plan has been tried by placing in Mr. Crow's way a number of grains with a horse hair run through them. He is bound to swallow one, and his note of alarm is soon sounded. It is impossible for him to dislodge the grain, and if he can be watched a sufficient length of time he will be seen to cut his own throat in scratching at it. His usual note is changed, and I can assure you that life to him is such a misery he could 'even wish that he were dead.' It has been noticed that after the note of alarm had been sounded, all the crows in the vicinity will leave that field and approach it no more that season. It is a simple thing, yet all who try it will find i a success."

THE Lewiston Gazette says every paper in the United States ought occasionally to keep the fact before its readers that burnt corn is a certain and speedy cure for hog cholera. The best way is to make a pile of corn on the cobs, effectually scorch it, and give the affected hogs free access to it. This remedy was discovered by accident by E. E. Locke, Esq., at the time his distillery was burned, together with a large lot of stored corn, which was so much injured as to unfit it for use, and was hauled out and greedily eaten by the hogs, several of which were dying daily. After the second day not a single hog was lost, and the disease entirely disappeared. The remedy has been tried since in a number of cases, and has never failed.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

A NICE WAY TO COOK EGGS.—Butter a saucepan; break into it the eggs; do not crowd them; place in a slow oven until the whites set. Thus treated they are more delicate and much more wholesome than fried eggs.

TO CLEAN RUSTY STOVE-PIPES.—Rusty stove-pipe may be made to look nearly as good as new by simply rubbing it over with a bit of cloth moistened with sweet oil. By coating the entire pipe, joints which are unlike in appearance will be made uniform and display a nice luster.

CLEANING DISHES.—Dinner dishes and plates which have had greasy food upon them may be rubbed off with a little Indian meal before putting into water. They are thus prevented from making the water unfit for continued use, while the meal, saved by itself, is good for the pigs or chickens.

HANGING BASKETS.—Pretty ones can be made of the oak balls which drop about the time of the "sere and yellow leaf." Collect quite a quantity and thread them upon wire and arrange just as though you were working with beads. A very pretty design is to commence by making a circle for the top ten inches in diameter, and then work down in the form of scallops or diamonds, gradually narrowing it in to form a graceful shape.

TO WHITEN OLD FLANNEL.—Make a suds of hard soap and soft water; dissolve a teaspoonful of borax and put in the suds; put the flannel in the suds and let it lie a few minutes, then wash and rinse; have ready some cloths dipped in melted brimstone, and wound on sticks; two will be sufficient; put them in a candlestick, or anything to hold them in an upright position; hang the flannel in a barrel, so that the smoke can come up through the middle and around it; light the brimstone candles and set them in the bottom of the barrel and cover closely. If carefully done, they will come out nearly as nice as new.

A VALUABLE HINT.—The most convenient way to prevent loose window-sashes from rattling unpleasantly when the wind blows is to make four one-sided buttons of wood and screw them to the beading which is nailed to the casings of the window, making each button of proper length to press the side of the sash outward when the end of the button is turned down horizontally. The buttons operate like a cam. By having them of the correct length to crowd the stiles of the sash outward against the outer stop of the window-frame, the sash will not only be held so firmly that it cannot rattle, but the crack which admitted dust and a current of cold air will be closed so tightly that no window-strip will be required. The buttons should be placed about half way between the upper and lower end of each sash.

TO EXTERMINATE BEDBUGS.—1. First make a strong solution of common salt and cayenne pepper, and place in every crevice or crack where the bugs are likely to be found. Then take a pan or kettle half full of ashes, and put a shovelful of hot coals on top of them. Throw into the coals one table-spoonful of sulphur, and one teaspoonful of cayenne pepper. Let this remain in the room you wish to fumigate about an hour, being careful to close all doors and windows, and do not leave any living thing, either plant or animal, in the room that you do not wish killed. Two or three thorough applications of this will rid any house of bedbugs, no matter how badly infested. 2. Take one pint of turpentine, one pint of alcohol and one ounce of gum camphor; dissolve the camphor in the alcohol, and then add the turpentine, shaking well before using; use large-size sewing-machine oiler to put it on with; fill every crack and crevice with it before taking the bedstead apart, and it will remove both the vermin and their eggs. 3. Corrosive sublimate one table-spoonful, alcohol or good whisky one pint. When thoroughly dissolved apply with a feather. Bottle and distinctly label; also cork tightly, for the mixture is a deadly poison to human life as well as to vermin. 4. An ounce of quicksilver beat up with the white of two eggs and put on with a feather is the cleanest and surest bedbug poison. What is left should be thrown away; it is dangerous to have about the house. If the vermin are in your walls, fill up the cracks with verdigris green paint.—Various Sources.

Cattle Diseases and Legislation.

Now that the British have put an end to our exportation of live cattle, attention is directed to the contagion that made the prohibition necessary. Some of the States are improving the lesson by exercising their power to stamp out the pleuro-pneumonia, or lung fever, that is spreading among the cattle, and Congress is discussing a bill to prevent the exportation of animals infected with it, and stop their transfer from one State to another. Indeed, the diseases and transportation of cattle have come to be of national importance, involving vast sums to be gained or lost.

Pleuro-pneumonia is an imported disease, and, since it established itself in England in 1842, has caused a loss of $500,000,000 to British farmers. It has also been as expensive in Australia since it invaded that island continent in 1858, and is so widely extended over the great Australian cattle ranges that all hope of getting rid of it is given up. Massachusetts imported the disease in 1859, but stamped it out in eight years, after killing nearly 1,000 cattle. Connecticut has rooted it out several times, but the malady now has a hold in the southwestern part of the State, and has been traced down along the Atlantic seaboard as far as North Carolina. New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania are vigorously at work to destroy the contagion, and, at a recent conference of their officials at Philadelphia, it was stated that pleuro-pneumonia has been raging in the eastern part of the United States for thirty-six years and is now quite violent. The great West was reported free from it, as it exports instead of importing cattle. But it gets its blooded stock largely from the East, and its vast herds are liable to be infected by so slight a cause as freight cars in which sick animals have been transported.

Medical Inspector Drexler, of Allegheny, Pa., attributes the origin of pleuropneumonia to the exposure of the cattle to draughts of air, as they are whirled by car-loads to the seaboard from Western shipping points. Packed into cars so thickly that they trample one another under foot in their misery, they are hurried along for days together without food or water. George T. Angell, of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, estimates that 600,000 cattle, sheep and swine annually lose their lives in this inhuman passage to market from the West. These facts were brought out by Senator McPherson, of New Jersey, in his speech eloquently championing the rights of the poor dumb brutes, as well as of humanity, when the bill to regulate cattle transportation was up in the Senate the other day, and when the matter comes up again at the winter session it will doubtless receive further ventilation. England prohibits the conveyance of cattle for more than twenty hours without supplies of food and water. A number of our States place the limit at twenty-four hours, but as they have no jurisdiction beyond their limits the cattle often go all the way from Chicago to New York without stoppage or refreshment, the shippers not wishing to pay toll at the expensive stock-yards kept up by the railroads. It is a clear case for the exercise of national authority to protect the nation's beef and beef-eaters.—Springfield Republican.

AT Tomie, Siberia, several secret gunpowder manufactories were discovered in houses belonging to the peasants deported there. An investigation has proved that the district local authorities were cognizant of the manufacture, but had kept it secret, having received small bribes.

COOKERY AS A FINE ART.

Excerpts from Miss Dods' Lectures on Cooking, at Hershey Hall, Chicago.]

Miss Dods appeared in a white apron, had on the stage a table filled with implements relating to the art of cuisine, and was assisted by a handy mulatto woman in her illustrations. Her first lesson was in baking a Russian fish pie. The ingredients she announced first as:

One-fourth pound butter.
One teaspoonful baking powder.
One gill cold water.
Half teacupful boiled rice.
Three hard-boiled eggs.
A little pepper and salt.
One pound fresh fish.

She then proceeded to show how she did it, talking in a pleasant voice, with a strong Scotch accent. She made a crust, and, when rolled out, then placed the rice upon it, then the hard-boiled eggs, and then the fish, cut into pieces of convenient size. Then she folded the crust over all, bringing the edges together with the fish, rice, eggs, and the pepper and salt in the center. The pie was then placed in a floured baking pan and put in a quick oven for three-quarters of an hour. The oven was attached to a tin gas stove at one end of the stage.

While the pie was baking, she explained that to boil the rice no milk was used, but, having been washed in cold water, it was thrown into plenty of boiling water and cooked. If there was not plenty of water, the rice would stick together.

When the pie was taken out it did look delicious, to say the least.

Her greatest triumph was with apple dumplings, if looks indicated anything, for that was all the way that reporters had of forming an opinion. The lady took

Four or five apples, according to size.
Twelve oz. flour.
Four oz. butter.
One-half table-spoonful baking powder.
A half-pint cold water.
One oz. sugar.

First, she pared and cored the apples, without cutting them, taking four, but if not so large, she said, she would have taken five. First, she pared the apples, then cored them, leaving them whole, and laid them aside while she made the pastry. She weighed out the flour, and mixed it with the butter by kneading with the fingers. She then added the baking powder before she began to mix it, pouring in the water. If the flour did not take up all the water leave out a little, as this dough must be firm. When firmly kneaded she cut it into as many pieces as she had apples, and rolled each piece into a ball. Then she took the ball of dough in the left hand and the apple in the right and crowded the dough all around the apple, drawing the edges together so as to completely inclose it. Before closing it, however, she dropped into the hole in the apple a spoonful of sugar. Then the dumplings were placed in a floured baking tin and put in the oven for from twenty to thirty minutes, according to the apples. The crust would always be done, but sometimes it took a little longer to cook the apples than at others. When the dumplings had been in a quick oven for twenty minutes, the teacher said, they might be tried with a fork or skewer, and if the apples were found to be soft clear through they were baked enough. The dumplings were put in the oven, and Dresden patties, for oysters, were undertaken. To make the patties Miss Dods took a loaf of dry bread and cut it into slices about two inches thick. They were marked by a cutter and the crust pared off. Then a deep cut was made in the center with a small cutter, but the pieces left in. The next step was to dip the pieces of bread into milk, not holding it in so as to soak it much. Then one egg was beaten up in a platter and the bread rolled in it. Next some sifted bread crumbs were placed in a paper, and the bread rolled in them. The pieces were then dipped into boiling lard and let boil two minutes. They were then taken out, let drip, and then the cap off the cut made in the center by the small cutter was lifted, and, with a fork, the inside was scooped out, and the potpie filled with jelly or prepared oysters, lobsters, etc., and the cap placed back again.

The apple dumplings were done by this time, and were taken out and glazed with the white of egg or milk, by means of a brush, and sprinkled with sugar, being put back into the oven a few minutes to dry the glazing.

A lesson was then given in making cheese cakes. There were put in a bowl two ounces flour, two ounces grated cheese, two ounces butter, and a little pepper and salt, a little lemon juice and a small quantity of cayenne pepper. These ingredients were put in in the order named, and mixed to a dough, rolled out like pie crust, and baked like ginger snaps. The lesson closed with broiling steak and making coffee in different ways.

A TERRIBLY fatal mistake was that made by Mr. F. G. Noonan, of Kansas City, Mo. Mr. N. and his wife were awakened from a sound sleep by a noise, at an early hour in the morning. Supposing burglars to be in the house, Noonan took a revolver and went into the front room in the dark, followed by his wife. She became frightened, and threw her arms around her husband's neck; he, supposing himself assailed by a burglar, fired, killing her instantly. The Noonans are well-to-do people who moved to Kansas City from Milwaukee a few years ago, where Noonan was a prominent merchant. He is a graduate of Yale College.

JOHN WATTS, an old-time Mississippi gambler, died at Philadelphia a few days ago, aged 74 years. Every one who traveled on the Mississippi twenty or thirty years ago will remember him as the leading poker-player on the boats. In ante-bellum days, when cabins were given up to card-parties, and thousands changed hands in a single evening, Watts was cool and unexcitable, and in the days when pistols and bowie-knives proved trumps he could play them well. He patronized a London tailor exclusively, and was always dressed with scrupulous elegance. Although a gambler, he professed to be a man of honor, and never allowed his honor to be questioned. His Waterloo was the great race between the Robert E. Lee and the Natchez, from New Orleans to St. Louis, on which he staked every cent he had—some $20,000. He then went East, and has since lived with a son, whom he educated abroad in the best schools, and who is now a leading physician in Philadelphia.

CADETS IN THE SADDLE.

How the Boys at West Point Are Taught to Ride.

[West Point Letter.]

The drill for to-day was "school of the soldier mounted," which took place in the great riding hall. As the title indicates, the drill is an exhibition of individual skill in horsemanship. It is said to be a great favorite with the boys, but the severity of the training they have to undergo before attaining the degree of skill deemed necessary for an officer is something they never forget. The record of broken arms, strained wrists, dislocated shoulders, fractured legs, and days spent in the hospital by reason of limbs rubbed raw, attests the fact that there is no child's play in the teaching at West Point. They don't do things here for fun, and little sympathy is wasted on the unfortunate youth who in his early efforts in the saddle comes to grief with a broken bone. He is more likely to get reprimanded for his awkwardness than to be condoled with. There was a great crowd present at the hall when the drill began, too large, indeed, to find room in the small galleries of the place; so, when these were full of ladies, the more agile among the male spectators climbed up on the window-sills and the like places, while other crowds besieged each of the four large doors of the building. This is the one occasion on which the observer might be justified in supposing that the work was done a good deal for show, because here it is that the excited spectators applaud every boy who goes through well. Let him take every head, and he is certain of a hearty round of applause. The comments of the spectators are often very amusing. When the boys commenced to use their revolvers, some one in the gallery anxiously inquired if they had "real bullets" in them, and seemed rather relieved when assured that they did not, and there was consequently no danger of any stray lead finding its way upward. When the order was given to dismount and mount at speed, the area of the hall was instantly a scene of galloping horses, riders jumping off, others jumping on, some down in the tan bark, others clinging to the mane and bridle, desperately struggling to get astride, horses rearing and plunging, and generally a remarkably lively time for all; then the women began to utter little screams, which increased to a general shout when one of the boys made a spring for the horse's back (there were no saddles), went clear over it, and plowed up the bark in the middle of a rush of galloping beasts, to the imminent danger of his brains. "Why, this is quite dangerous!" exclaimed an individual in the gallery, indignant at the idea of the boys being made to run such risks. The good gentleman seemed to suppose that the services were merely for show. It is needless to say that the boys did well; they always do; but, while none fall below a certain level, there are vast differences between them above that level. Some of the boys take wonderfully well to the work, and feel as much at home cutting and slashing about on bare-backed horses as in a rocking-chair, while to others it never becomes easy. They do the work, but it is hard. The actual movements of the drill with saber and pistol are few. The soldier is started from the company to make the circuit of the hall. Putting his horse to a gallop, he begins by firing at a head on a post, returns his pistol to the holster, draws his saber, and, at full speed, makes a thrust at another head on a post, then a cut at one lying on the ground, then jumps a hurdle, and, in jumping, slashes a head from a post beside it, or thrusts at a suspended ring on a level with his own head, and, lastly, makes a right thrust at another head on a post. To go through this performance on a horse without a saddle, and a big pair of spurs on one's heels, is not an easy task, and if any one thinks it is he had better try it in the nearest riding-school. The different cuts and thrusts are, of course, as against infantry or cavalry.

"Alive To-day and Dead To-morrow."

Mark Randall, a brakeman on an Erie freight train, with Conductor D. King, at 4 o'clock this morning was struck on the head by the high bridge, on the grade just west of Goshen, and dangerously hurt. A brother brakeman warned him of the danger in time to have saved him had he instantly dropped. Instead of that he ran a little further, and then turned to see how near he was to the bridge. The brakeman who had warned him hurried forward and held the body in position, keeping it from falling off until the train was stopped. He was brought to Middletown, and Dr. Burke Pillsbury was called and pronounced his injuries fatal. This was the man who saved Erie train No. 12 from being wrecked near Monroe last winter. The train with two engines was going up the Oxford grade, when one of the forward cars was thrown from the track by a loose wheel. The train was almost at the top of the hill, and was running very fast. The man, who was stealing a ride between the baggage-cars, signaled the engineers, the train was stopped and an accident prevented. He leaves a wife at East Sandy, Venango county, Pa., and a tender letter, which he had written to her only a few days before the accident, was found in his pocket. In it he said: "I think I can send for you three weeks from to-day, if nothing happens. This is very uncertain business, alive to-day and dead to-morrow. It is as bad as a battle-field for hurting men, but I am as careful as I can be. Only to think of it, twenty-three days and we will be together again."—Middletown (N. Y.) Press.

WORM SPECIFIC OR VERMIFUGE.

SYMPTOMS OF WORMS.

THE countenance is pale and leaden-colored, with occasional flushes, or a circumscribed spot on one or both cheeks; the eyes become dull; the pupils dilate; an azure semicircle runs along the lower eye-lid; the nose is irritated, swells, and sometimes bleeds; a swelling of the upper lip; occasional headache, with humming or throbbing of the ears; an unusual secretion of saliva; slimy or furred tongue; breath very foul, particularly in the morning; appetite variable, sometimes voracious, with a gnawing sensation of the stomach, at others, entirely gone; fleeting pains in the stomach; occasional nausea and vomiting; violent pains throughout the abdomen; bowels irregular, at times costive; stools slimy, not unfrequently tinged with blood; belly swollen and hard; urine turbid; respiration occasionally difficult, and accompanied by hiccough; cough sometimes dry and convulsive; uneasy and disturbed sleep, with grinding of the teeth; temper variable, but generally irritable, &c.

Whenever the above symptoms are found to exist,
DR. C. McLANE'S VERMIFUGE
will certainly effect a cure.

IT DOES NOT CONTAIN MERCURY

A Very Natural Mistake.

A young man from one of the back towns came in to buy a present for his girl recently. His wondering gaze being fixed by the gorgeous display in a dry-goods window, he entered the store and bashfully stopped in front of a pretty young lady behind the counter.

"How much are those?" he inquired, pointing at a pair of handsomely wrought nickled-plated garters in the window.

"Seventy-five cents," replied the young lady, sweetly, handing out the articles in question, and blushing slightly.

"I think they are kinder pretty, don't you?" inquired the young man, anxious for somebody else's opinion.

"Very; they are the latest style," replied the young miss.

"Everybody wears them, don't they?" continued the young man.

"Almost everybody," said the young lady affecting an unconcerned air.

"I was going to get them for a girl that I know. Do you think she will like them?" said the young man.

"I should think she might—I don't know," returned the young lady blushing again.

"Well, I don't hardly know myself," said the young man, picking up one of the dainty articles, and examining it closely. "You don't suppose they are too large, now, do you?"

"Why—I—I—" stammered the young lady, the blush growing deeper.

"They seem sorter big, like," continued the young man, not observing her confusion, "but of course I wouldn't be certain. She's middlin' size, but not very fat, and mebbe these would be a little too loose. I should think she was just your bigness, and if these would fit you, of course they'd fit her. Now, just suppose you try them on, and if—"

"Sir!" exclaimed the young lady behind the counter, in an awful voice, that lifted the young man's hat on the end of his hair, "you are insulting;" and she swept away to the rear end of the store, leaving the bewildered young man standing in dumb amazement, holding in his hands what he supposed to be a beautiful pair of bracelets. And when one of the men clerks came and explained his mistake, the young man from the back town struck a direct line for his team, and in a very brief space of time was tearing toward home at a rate threatened to irretrievably ruin the old family horse. He won't buy any bracelets until he's married.—Rockland Courier.

Sabbath Singing at Sea-side Hotels.

Tea over, and the week-day machinery cleared away form the parlors and piazzas in all the houses, the piano is opened, the Carmina Sacra got out, and for an hour or two the whole village is vocal with the sober strains of "Hamburg" and "Mear," or the lilting inspiration of "Hold the Fort" and "Pull for the Shore." As music it doesn't touch the highest artistic mark, certainly, but it is soothing and sympathetic. Thoughtless misses and stalwart young swells, who for six days a week know little melody but "Conosci il suol" or Madame Angot, feel the gentle infection, and those who came to sneer remain to sing. Quaint, isn't it, to see young Biceps, just arrived with all his blushing Springfield honors thick upon him roaring away like a sturdy, red faced, six-foot sucking dove, and rasping his manly larynx with an intractable chromatic, as he looks over the book with sweet Nelly S——, the daintiest little devotee who ever carried a poor fellow's thoughts skyward on the wings of earthly sentiment! But there is nothing like proximity. Biceps won't be the worse for a little vicarious devotion; and if Nelly can make him available in "convertible" (or other) bonds, why shouldn't she? So none of your scoffing, you æsthetic heathen! If you don't like the music, or the spirit of it, light your cigarette and take a stroll down the promenade. By the time you get back the singing will be over, and the crowded piazzas in much the same tide of unsanctified gossip and flirtation as on ordinary evenings.—Charles Carroll, in Harper's Magazine for July.

A Little Romance.

A rather sad story is related of a worthy young gentleman who had his ears boxed by a very beautiful young lady in the streets of the city of Rome one day last winter. As soon as the girl saw the face of the man she had assaulted she discovered that a mistake had been made, and begged ten thousand pardons.

"You must forgive me," she said pleadingly, "I mistook you for another."

The gentleman forgave the blushing maiden, but could not forget the box, the blush, the apology, and all the rest, and he determined to see the girl again, if possible. He did see her—she was a shop girl; nevertheless, he fell so much in love with her that he offered her his heart and hand. She refused both, saying she was engaged.

He then tried to forget her, and had nearly succeeded in doing so when he received a letter from her asking him to go and see her at a hospital. He found the poor girl dying, and from her lips he heard her story—the old one, "Love and abandonment!"

She asked him not to let her baby die of hunger. He promised, and when the girl died he took the child and placed it with proper people. He did more—he sent a challenge to the girl's seducer, fought him, and though he did not kill him, disabled him for life.

LINCOLN AND DAN RICE.

[St. Louis Republican.]

That veteran showman, Dan Rice, is on a professional tour through Illinois, and a rural republican editor there, whose loyalty has been touched by some of his ring witticisms, calls him "one of those bitter and aggressive democrats known in ante-bellum days as "fire-eaters." Though Dan's politics are of very little consequence to himself or anybody else, it is only fair to say that he claims to be "an old-line Whig." Whether it was this devotion to the dead party which aroused Mr. Lincoln's sympathies, or—what is more likely—he wanted to draw upon the inexhaustible fund of fun for which Dan is so famous, it is certain they were always warm personal friends. And singularly enough, this friendship, which began probably in Lincoln's early days, was continued by him after he became president, and when it might be supposed the pressure of care and responsibility would drive all circus memories out of his mind. Whenever Rice visited Washington with his show, during the gloomy years from 1861 to 1865, he was invited to come to the White House after the evening performance, and usually the presidential carriage was waiting for him, so that he might get there as soon as possible. Lincoln received him in his private office, and all ceremony being laid aside the two would exchange stories and jokes, live over bygone times and scenes in which the humorous predominated, and have a mutually refreshing season of it. On one of these occasions, when, as usual, orders had been given to admit nobody, a card was brought up. Lincoln rebuked the servant for the unwelcome interference, and then looking at the card, said, "Well, Dan, there's no help for it; we must let him in. He's a big bug from Massachusetts and it won't do to deny him now, that he's sent in his name. But you stay and I'll soon get rid of him." Accordingly, in a few minutes a genuine representative of the highest respectability of Boston, made his appearance, and saluting the president with profound dignity, announced himself as a committee appointed to present a set of resolutions lately passed at a large republican meeting in his state. These resolutions, as Lincoln knew, embodied a rather severe criticism of administration policy, at that time too mild to suit the Massachusetts "stalwarts." Listening attentively to the preliminary remarks of the Boston gentleman, he took the paper; but without making any reply to the contents or comments, said: "Beg pardon, Mr. ——; but before we proceed further, let me introduce you to my particular friend, Mr. Dan Rice." Dan stood up and delivered his best bow, but the committee was struck dumb with amazement and indignation. To be introduced to a circus clown by the president of the United States was too much for him. He grew red in the face, stared first at one and then at the other, and then at last managing to stammer out a few words of leave-taking, departed in haste. As the door closed upon him, Lincoln turned to Rice with a hearty laugh, and said: "Dan, wasn't that well done? Didn't it take the wind out of him nicely?" Dan admitted that it was a perfect success, and the interrupted conversation was resumed with renewed zest.

This anecdote—the authenticity of which is unimpeachable—ought to put Dan Rice's loyalty far beyond all suspicion, and he can afford to defy republican malice now, henceforth and forever.

A Woman of 92 in the Hay Field.

Elizabeth Leibesberger, aged 92, resides in Richmond township, this county, and is, in all probability, one of the richest maiden ladies in the county. She owns several beautiful farms in Richmond township, where she has lived nearly all her life. She has silvery gray hair, is neat and trim in appearance. A few days ago her farm hands commenced hay-making. To their surprise the aged lady and landowner made her appearance in the hay field, rake in hand. She was suitably attired for the occasion, her skirts and dress being well gathered in and tucked back so as not to drag or give her any trouble in moving over the field. She said she was going to show them how to work. This was greeted with a clapping of hands and cheers. Miss Leibesberger went to work in good earnest, tossed the hay over and over, raked it into rows from one end of the field to the other, and then helped to take it on piles, and finally assisted in loading and raking after the wagon.—Reading Eagle.

A Big Find—$20,000 in an Old Trunk.

On the 22d of last May, Daniel Corker of South Mexico, died, as it was thought in rather poor circumstances. B. R. Cauthorn was appointed administrator of the estate, and a few days since M. Y. Duncan and J. J. Steele, as appraisers, visited the house of Corker to appraise the property of deceased. After going over various old notes, etc., they were about to leave when they saw an old leather trunk in the corner, which they kicked open more out of curiosity than with the expectation of finding anything valuable in it. When will wonders cease? In that trunk were nearly $20,000 in old, rusty gold coin and musty bank notes. The coins and notes all bear an old date, showing that Corker did not believe in banking his money, but hoarded it up. Corker, in his will, leaves $1,000 to each of his children, and the rest to his wife. He has one daughter in Texas, a Mrs. Chase. Jack Allen's wife, one of his children, is dead, but leaves a child. Corker made his money milling and farming, or rather he made his money by saving it.—Mexico (Mo.) Ledger.

At a meeting of the representatives of the Wabash and Great Western railways, held in the city of New York, terms for the formation of a new company to build an extension of the Wabash from Toledo to Detroit, were agreed upon. The Grand Trunk company having agreed with the Great Western, the work will be undertaken jointly by these companies, each of which it is understood is to have an equal voice in the management and control of the new road. The representatives of the Great Western were Vice President Gray and Mr. Bald; of the Wabash, President Solon Humphreys and General Wagner Swayne. Counsel are now engaged in reducing to writing the specific terms of the compact, but the work of the formation of the company may be regarded as being definitely settled. The engineers of each of the three companies are to select an engineer who will have charge of the laying out and construction of the new line.

KANSAS LETTER.

HUMBOLDT, KANSAS, JULY 7, '79.

EDITORS COURIER:—Seven weeks have passed since we took our departure from our old and much-esteemed county of DeKalb, to float west with the tide of emigration and seek a new and western home. Our bark, in following the channel of civilization, wealth, intelligence and enterprise, landed us in the fertile valleys of southern Kansas, on the bank of the clear waters of the Neosho river, in the enterprising little town of Humboldt, which is beautifully situated on the eastern bank of the Neosho. It is one of the most flourishing little towns in south eastern Kansas, with a population of about 2500. Seven church-spires embellish the town, which is generally regarded as one indication of progress, refinement and good taste. The citizens are a church-going people. Their social and moral disposition will balance favorably with our best eastern towns. Educational facilities are good, and all branches of business ably represented. There are two fine gristmills with a water power equal, perhaps, to any in the state; a very popular and creditable bank with a worthy set of officers. Several very fine drygoods, drug, hardware and grocery stores, all appear to be doing a thrifty and lucrative business, some doing a wholesale business with other villages in the surrounding country. Two good newspapers are published here; each have a good circulation and represent the interest of rival political parties. Hotel men who usually take an interest in the comfort of their guests, fearing that some fastidious wayfaring man might perchance call to sojourn for the night and find fault with the accommodations, meals not being served in as good order, or as palatable and delicious as they had enjoyed at Delmonico's, Grand Central, Fifth Avenue, or at some of the sumptous hotels at Saratoga. In order to guard against such a foul accusation against the good name of the town, six hotels have been established to pander to the comfort of the weary traveler. While we are all very agreeably impressed with the appearance of the place, and appreciate the kind hospitality and sociability of her people, yet our sojourn is only temporary, of only a few months duration, long enough time to select a better field for my business and a permanent location.

During the first two weeks of our stay at this place, the family expressed a degree of solitary deprivation in the loss of our old family news comforter, the COURIER, and I can assure you its first appearance was hailed as a welcomed messenger. I have just returned from a tour through the western portion of this state and find the crops in that section presenting a very gloomy appearance, in consequence of the long drought in that section, this summer. Along the line of the Atchinson, Topeka & Santa Fee railroad, from Harvey county west, crops are almost an entire failure, with the exception of corn, which was invigorated by a bountiful rain last week, but came too late to be of any benefit to wheat or oats. In connection with the drought, in the western part of the state, it has been visited with those unsatiable pests, the grasshoppers. While this annoyance is not to be regarded as a perpetual institution, engrafted in this state, yet when they do make their appearance their progress is marked by a total destruction of the crops; but it is to be observed that in the settling up of the country, and as the progress of the cultivation of the soil spreads rapidly, their visits become less frequent. In the eastern portion of this state, crops are reasonably good, with the exception of the fruit, which may be said to be almost an entire failure, which I suppose is attributable to the severity of last winter. Kansas as a fruit-growing state can compete successfully with any state in the Union. Apples, peaches and grapes, grow luxuriantly, and are of the richest fragrance. The greatest trouble, and which accounts for the scarcity of the apples, is that the early settlers did not take sufficient interest in the cultivation of fruit to set out orchards. This important improvement on a farm deserves attention at the very first convenience, from the fact that it takes years to mature into fruit producing capability. In regard to the grass crop it is very fine, more particularly in the southern part of the state which is generally conceded to be the best stock-raising portion of the state, and perhaps unsurpassed in the Union. The section referred to embraces the counties of Chase, Lyon, Greenwood, Woodson, Allen, Elk, and Wilson. Along the valleys of the Cottonwood, Neosho, Verdigris, Tell, Caney, and Elk rivers, the bottom lands along these rivers are covered with very deep-rich soil, while the hills intervening are covered with a luxuriant growth of nutritious grass, some years supporting stock all winter without the use of hay, and fattening them on it. It certainly would surprise some of our eastern stock men to witness the speedy growth of stock on the prairie grass.

In regard to the health of the country, our family experience, so far, is that it is highly commendable. The atmosphere is fine, clear and invigorating. You will never experience that oppressiveness in the atmosphere which produces that dull lassitude which people experience in those miasmatical districts where the atmosphere arising from low, stagnant cess-pools is so impregnated with malaria as to cause fever and ague and its kindred diseases. In midsummer the sun shines very hot, but the intensity of the heat is greatly ameliorated by a cool, refreshing breeze (sometimes more breeze than is desirable) which is always sweeping over the prairies with its salubrious and invigorating influence, dispelling all noxious vapors. The heat of the day is followed by cool nights, giving ease and comfort to the quiet slumberer. The surface of the country is beautifully rolling, the elevations not steep enough to produce wash-outs, but of such a grade as to carry the waste-water off to the rivers, which are generally deep, and the bottom-land seldom overflowing, and never standing but for a short time. There are no stagnant pools or swamps in Kansas.

On my trip west I had the pleasure of traveling a short distance on the old Santa Fee and Smoky Hill trails, the names of which will sound familiar to some of those brave and courageous men who parted with their friends and dear ones, buckled on their armor, and took up the line of march on the overland route, battling with the savage Indians through the western wilds and settling quickly, by force of arms, any contest the savages might allege as to right-of-way through the forest, until they reached the goal of their ambition and halted in the gold-fields of California. Nearly all traces of the old trails are obliterated; occasionally the traveler's attention is attracted by the ruins of some old fort or stockade, used in defense of the whites, but what different scenery is presented to the travelers view! Its aboriginal glory is fast fading away; the sturdy arm of the husbandman is sowing the seed of wealth and intelligence; the hills that were the habitation of the savage Indian in his rude wigwam, are now covered with beautiful towns and cities. Civilization, wealth, intelligence, science, genius and industry have found their way to this western world. The plains, where once roamed the buffalo, wolf, deer, and antelope uninterrupted, are now dotted with churches, colleges, court-houses, school-houses and such manipulations of the white man's genius and his mental superiority over its original inhabitants. Let the traveler ascend to an eminence on the prairie, cast his eye over the beautiful landscape around him, see the rolling prairie that nature has clothed with garments of green, varigated with beautiful flowers, the farm houses, the orchards, the green hills and dales, the timand streams in the distant valleys, all tend to make a panorama of exquisite rural beauty. The din of the church-bell is heard to reverberate over the wide-stretching prairies, impressing the hearer with the connection of his duty to that Supreme Being from whom comes all these bountiful mercies and earthly comforts he is permitted to enjoy.

Fearing I may weary your patience, I will now close. Respectfully yours.

J. C. JACKSON.

The Ross Abduction.

Mr. Christian K. Ross, father of the boy Charlie, who was abducted from his residence in Germantown five years ago, in answer to a letter received from a lady residing in Charleston, S. C., says: "I may say here that the newspaper report of my object in going to North Carolina is not correct. I did not go to see a child there, but to investigate a matter remotely connected in the place to which I went. The matter is still undergoing investigation, and I cannot tell what may be the final result. While we have suffered beyond what any mortal can understand, yet we have the comfort to know that many a little fellow has been rescued from want and misery through the search for our Charlie, and we believe the public have reaped largely the benefit of the sacrifice we made, for, had I compounded the crime, I feel certain we would have had our son long since; but, declining to do so, I have suffered and the public have been benefited, for I do not think a child will be taken soon again for a ransom."

Snuff in the Senate.

On each side of the vice-president's seat in the United States senate are fastened two old snuff boxes, which are kept filled by the attendants. They are the result of a custom inaugurated almost at the foundation of the government, when snuff-taking was a universal habit. Thurman is the only senator who makes a habit of using snuff, but sometimes a senator will stop and take an occasional pinch, while the many visitors to the chamber take a little out of curiosity. At first the box was kept on the vice-president's desk, but in those days so many of the senators used the article, and so frequently forgot to bring their boxes with them, that it was resolved to place two public receptacles for it, and in the annual expense of the senate is always found the item of snuff. The aged door-keeper, Isaac Bassitt, stated to your correspondent that he had often seen Henry Clay leave his place in the midst of a speech, walk gravely to the box, take a pinch and continue his remarks. "When I was a page, nearly fifty years ago," said he, "many of the senators would give me a sign which indicated that they wanted snuff, and I would carry the box to them. Nearly all the senators used snuff in those days. Henry clay was in the habit of giving me 50 cents a week to keep his box full of snuff, and I have never forgotten that when he left here for the last time he owed me 50 cents for this service. I never brought a bill against the estate," said the old gentleman, smiling, "and I guess the debt is outlawed by this time."

Jap Women.

A Yokohama letter to the Louisville Courier-Journal has the following about Japanese women: To begin at their heads, their hair is simply horrid. It is saturated with oil and then puffed in all shapes and ornamented with brass balls on the end of long pins, stuck in the sides of the head. Their dress is about a yard and a half square of goods. Some finer than others, folded about the person from the waist downward and crossing in front, with not a gather either back or front, and you may imagine how ungraceful it would be. To keep this from flying open, they bend their bodies just a little forward as they walk. The rest of the body by many is covered by a piece of cloth folded Mother Washington style, across the chest, but always low in the neck. A Japanese woman's foot with her shoe on is remarkable. A piece of wood lies against the bottom of the foot, about half way to the heel, raised about two inches from the ground by pieces running cross-ways of the foot. This is fastened on by a string running between the toes, as are the sandals. As they walk, the shoe clings to the toes, but falls from the back part of the foot, which makes a peculiar clatter which you can hear at all times. One peculiarity about Jap. women and girls is that every one has a baby, and they keep it strapped to their backs in true Indian style. They marry early, and I met girls of 12 and 13 almost bent to the earth by a big baby suspended to their backs. I cannot tell of all we saw.

The Origin of Croquet.

Croquet players, who have begun to indulge in their favorite and fashionable sport, will be interested in the origin of the game. Croquet is not, as many suppose, of modern birth, but may be traced through its various stages to Persia as far back as the eighth century. Its origin was polo, which the Persians played with a long handled mallet called chugan. In the ninth century the game made its way into the eastern Empire, the original mallet changing its form to a long staff ending in a broad bend filled with a net work of gut strings. "Thus," says a writer on the subject, "there appeared in the east as belonging to the great sport of ball play on horseback the first shapes of two implements which remodeled the whole play life of mediæval modern Europe, the chugan being the ancestor of the mallets used in croquet, and of an endless variety of other playing clubs and bats, while the bent staff, with its net-work, was a primitive racket."

We find that the original ball games in which sticks were used were played on horseback, and instead of polo being an outgrowth of these sports played on the latter are the changes made in the Persian game of chugan, which, as has been said, was the parent of all our games in which artificial means are used to propel the ball.

The translation from the chugan of Persia to the short-handled mallet used on foot was easy and natural, and the substitution of a club came by gradual changes, the hand being probably the original impliment, which was superseded by a round stick.—Baltimore News.

Some Personal Recollections of the Early Days of the War.

[Detroit Free Press.]

There has been considerable controversy over this venerable dame, whom Whittier has immortalized in song as "Bravest of all in Frederick Town." Some claim that she is a myth; that there was no such person in existence, and that the scenes which Whittier has so graphically described were only figments of the poets fancy. That Barbara Freitchie lived, there is at present no question, and, also, that she was alive at the time Stonewall Jackson visited the city of Frederick is also proved beyond a doubt; but for the rest of the story, from all the facts I can gather, there seems no authority other than the poem. At the time when these events were claimed to have occurred Dame Barbara was very old and very decrepit, so much so that she hobbled around with a large staff, and it is doubtful if she could have mounted the stairs to the attic for the purpose of waving the little silk flag which she kept carefully laid away in a bureau. That she had no great love for the confederates is shown in the curt speeches she is said to have made to some of them who happened to cross over the bridge and sat down on the piazza at the end of her house, which was at the end of the bridge, overhanging the creek. "Off with you!" she said, with many uncomplimentary personal illusions, and poked them with her staff. This certainly, was not very complimentary, and probably wasn't intended to soothe their feelings, as we learn that Barbara had that worst of female weapons, a "sharp tongue," and, though so very old, she knew how to use it, as her nephew, a secession sympathizer, could testify. Barbara used to speak of him as an "arrant knave," and whenever she drew her quarterly allowance he always got a bit of advice not at all in keeping with his secesh proclivities. I am not inclined to consider as authentic the account of the shooting of the flag staff, and of Dame Barbara's picking it up, first, because the rebel army did not enter Frederick City on the occasion named. They came down the Bounaughstown road, toward the city, but turned off before reaching it, and took a road running in the other direction, so that they would have left Barbara's house behind them. Another reason is that we don't believe Stonewall Jackson would have ordered his troops to fire at a private house in that way, especially if Dame Freitchie was in sight, for it is established on good authority that he had great respect for aged women, and it was his special delight to engage them in conversation. Considerable romance has clustered around this venerable dame, and we should hesitate to detract an iota from the honors that cluster around her and make her famous. But let us not do injustice to the illustrious dead by giving credence to unworthy tales.

Barbara Freitchie's work is over,
And Jackson rides on his raids no more;
Honor to her, and let a tear
Fall for her sake on Stonewall's bier.

And not for her sake alone, but for his, for Stonewall Jackson was a remarkable man—certainly one of the most illustrious of our times. No more preminent character was developed by "our late unpleasantness." There are many who believe that had his life been spared through the war there might have been a different ending to the conflict. He could truly be said to be a host in himself, and it is doubtful if the loss of many thousand men would have crippled the confederate army as did the loss of this one man. Certain it is that the next great battle between the army of the Potomac and the army of Northern Virginia brought defeat to the latter, and they gained no more substantial victories. The battle of Gettysburg was the turning point of the war against the confederates, and from that time their fortunes declined till they culminated in the fall of Richmond and Petersburg, April 2, 1865.

A PRIVATE OF A MAINE REGIMENT.

GENEROUS RUSKIN.

How He Gave His Pretty Wife to His Friend Millais—His Platonic Marriage.

Between 30 and 35, Ruskin met and was delighted with a very pretty and graceful young woman of social position and nice culture. I should say he had fallen in love with her were he not of so peculiar a physical temperament. He admired her sufficiently to ask her to be his wife, and she appreciating his gifts and scholarship, and flattered by the preference of such a man, accepted his offer. He questioned her it is reported, as to the nature of her affections; expressed the hope that it was spiritual rather than emotional, mainly platonic in character, as he confessed his own to be. As may be inferred, she answered in the affirmative, and doubtless believed very firmly every syllable she uttered. It would be strange, indeed, if any woman should imagine or allow herself to be less ethereal of sentiment than any man on the planet. With the mutual understanding that theirs was to be a union of minds, they were married. They seemed to get on pleasantly for a few months—at least it seemed so to the husband, absorbed as us[illegible]y and writing. He greatly admired her beauty—he probably regarded her more as a picture or a statue than a woman—and never wearied of praising it. Desirous to have her portrait taken he choose his friend Millais, who, with Holman Hunt, Charles Collins, Dante Russel and others, formed and still form the pre-Raphaelite school, to transfer her features to canvas. She gave the painter a number of sittings, and the husband was so much concerned in the work, that he sometimes watched its progress. Millais, as is well known, is handsome and winning—he was especially so when young, he is barely 50 now—and was drawn at once to the young and lovely wife of his friend, an attraction that appears to have been reciprocated. In plain parlance, Millais and Mrs. Ruskin fell head over heels, or heels over head, if you like it, in love with one another, without the least intent on their part. Ruskin himself is said to have preceived the fact, although the lovers had not been in the slightest indiscreet or conventional, or even to have intimated one to the other the condition of their hearts. The author of "Modern Painters" is as generous as he is chivalrous. He did not, as ordinary men would have done, fly into a jealous rage, nor did he have a scene with his wife. He told her gently what he had perceived and assured her of his continued friendship and esteem, and of his earnest desire to promote her happiness at any price. She turned crimson at the words, as if they had been a revelation to her own soul, which in part they have been. She could not believe the thing possible at first—the surprises of the heart are usually overwhelming—but very soon she acknowledged the truth, and the painter did likewise. The critic condemned himself for dullness in thinking a platonic marriage natural or satisfactory, and announced his willingness, yea, gladness, to assist the pair to a felicity they were obviously fitted for. Instead of putting any obstacle in the way, he would remove the only one to their love and happiness—himself—and he kept his word faithfully. Under the peculiar circumstances there was no trouble in obtaining a divorce. The matter was managed privately, without scandal, and in due time Mrs. Ruskin, became Mrs. Millais, who is. They have proved to be, from all accounts, a most harmonious couple, and they are of much to one another to-day as they were during the honeymoon. Moreover, Ruskin continues to be the firm friend of both, visiting them regularly and sharing in a reflected manner in their happiness—a fact which demonstrates the largeness and nobility of Ruskin's nature. Millais' famous picture—it has been engraved and is very common—"The Huguenot Lovers," is declared to be, as respects the young woman, almost a faithful portrait of the artist's wife, and the alleged fact has added not a little to its popularity.

"Out of Sorts."

Dr. John Todd says some people are always "out of sorts." The weather is always just what they don't want. I met one of these men awhile ago, a farmer, who raised all manner of crops. It was a wet day, and I said, "Mr. N—, this rain will be fine for your grass crop." "Yes, perhaps; but it is bad for the corn, and will keep it back. I don't believe we shall have a crop." A few days after this, when the sun was shining hot, I said "Fine sun for your corn, sir." "Yes, pretty fair; but its awful for the rye. Rye wants cold weather." Again on a cold morning I met my neighbor and said. This must be capital for your rye, Mr. N—." "Yes, but it is the very worst weather for the corn and grass. They want heat to bring them forward." The world is full of such complainers. They keep society in ferment. Every one that comes in contact with them is made unhappy. Their faces are long, their spirit is sour, their words are doleful. With such people everything is "out of sorts." Whether the weather is hot or cold, dry or wet, whether the sun shines or is obscured by clouds, under all circumstances, there is the same gloomy outcry. If the weather is good for the wheat it is bad for the rye; if it is good for the corn it is bad for the wheat. Thus they drag through their lot of complaining, and nothing that God can do for them, nor the whole relm of his providence, renders them at all comfortable.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

NO LESS than four horrible murders were committed in New York and vicinity July 4. The most prominent was that of John F. Seymour, a cousin of Bishop Seymour, of the Diocese of Springfield, Ill., who is also the Dean of the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church. A theory exists that Mr. Seymour committed suicide. His domestic relations, however, were happy. He had no enemies, and no pistol was found. Two friends engaged in a quarrel at Staten Island over a trivial matter. Both carried loaded revolvers, and one shot the other before he had a chance to draw his weapon. The third case was the shooting of a man by a former employe in the streets of Nyack. Finally, one member of a steamboat excursion party shot another through the head for refusing to drink with him.

A LADLE of molten steel upset in a Scranton (Pa.) rolling-mill, fatally burning two workmen.

AMONG the serious accidents occurring on the Fourth, one of the most melancholy was the partial overturning of an overloaded excursion steamer on Lake Quinsigamond, near Worcester, Mass., whereby a large number of the passengers were pitched into the water, and seven were drowned. A somewhat similar accident occurred near Trenton, N. J., where the breaking down of an overcrowded wharf gave a crowd a wetting and a scare, [illegible] drowning three persons.

[illegible] HINES, of Alden, N. Y., killed his wife and himself. Both were old.

JOSEPH AKINS, a fruit gardener, living in Westmoreland county, Pa., shot and killed instantly his wife a few days ago, and, after telling his nearest neighbor that he had killed the "old woman," placed the muzzle of the gun under his chin and fired and killed himself. Akins was 71 and his wife 73 years of age.

MANTON MARBLE, the well-known New York editor, was married last week to Mrs. A. Williams Lombard. The couple immediately sailed for Europe.

JOSEPH B. BUZZELL, convicted of being accessory to the murder of Miss Susan Hanson, in November, 1874, was hanged at Concord, N. H., on the 10th inst. He died in nineteen minutes without a struggle.

THE WEST.

THE cleverness of a pair of thieves who took advantage of the absence of all but the cashier at dinner resulted in a daylight robbery of a bank at Galesburg, Ill., and the loss of about $12,000 in money.

THE heaviest storm experienced since the establishment of the signal-service at St. Paul, Minn., occurred on the 3d inst. The storm extended all over the State of Minnesota, Northwestern Wisconsin and Southeastern Dakota, doing much damage to buildings, railroads and crops. From the former State reports of casualties are received as follows: At Vasa, Goodhue county, nine persons were killed and thirty injured by lightning and the fall of a building. At Winnebago, the wife of Nathaniel Stevens was killed by lightning. At Mountain Lake, Lawrence Lawless was killed by lightning. Red Wing reports $100,000 damages to property in the city. Every town in the south and east of the State suffered heavily, but details are wanting. At Menomonee, Wis., a house was carried away by the flood, with two persons not since heard from. At Warrenton, Wis., the house of Mr. Rush was carried off, with his family, including Mr. Rush, wife and daughter, a young lady about 20 years of age, all being drowned. Another young lady, daughter of Mr. John Davis, of Rush river, was drowned in attempting to get out of the house, which was flooded with water to the depth of several feet. Ten miles northwest of Lemars, Plymouth county, Iowa, two young men named Kass were killed. They saw the storm coming, and ran into a barn for shelter, when the wind struck the building with terrific force, completely demolishing it and crushing them to death in the ruins. The aggregate loss of life by disasters connected with the storm throughout Minnesota will approach twenty. The wounded will probably reach fifty, thirty-six being injured by the wreck of the Orphan Asylum at Vasa. The damage to property is great, but there is no data for exact estimate.

A ST. PAUL dispatch says that "Seventeen persons at Lanesboro, Minn., were poisoned by some substance supposed to be tartar emetic in lemonade at a picnic. Some are dangerously sick, and recovery is doubtful."

ARCHBISHOP PURCELL has returned to Cincinnati from his Eastern travels. A local journal says "he is in good health and spirits, and his appearance sets at rest stories about his having become insane. He is well satisfied over the result of his journeyings among his friends in the East, and expresses himself as being very hopeful of the future. Up to the present time money returns have not been large, but the effort in that direction has not fairly begun."

JUSTICE FIELD, of the United States Supreme Court, sitting in the Circu Court at San Francisco, has decided against the validity of the ordinance whereby it was proposed to terrorize the Chinese into good behavior by having the queues cut off of all those who should be imprisoned for petty offenses in the county jail.

OF all the crews shipped by the ubiquitous ship Pinafore at the port of Chicago, the one that was enlisted in the church choirs was the most capable. On account of the excellence of the music given by this party there has been a general desire expressed to hear them again, and Col. Haverly is, of course, willing to gratify this "long-felt want," so long as it puts money in his purse. The original Chicago Church Choir Pinafore Company are now playing an engagement at Haverly's Chicago Theater, and will remain there until further notice.

A SIOUX FALLS, Dak., dispatch says that Mrs. E. Lee and babe, of that city, and Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, of Red Wing, Minn., were drowned while attempting to cross a swollen stream in a wagon. Mr. Lee and a young girl who were with the party escaped.

A BISMARCK (Dakota) dispatch says the four Cheyenne Indians who wounded Sergt. Kennedy, of the signal service, and killed a private accompanying him, were hanged, in accordance with the sentence of the court, at Miles City....The total number of deaths resulting from the destruction of the orphan asylum at Vasa, Goodhue county, Minn., by the recent storm, is thirteen.

CHICAGO elevators contain 3,822,035 bushels of wheat, 3,199,922 bushels of corn, 360,381 bushels of oats, 92,800 bushels of rye, and 78,303 bushels of barley, making a grand total of 7,553,351 bushels, against 7,097,434 bushels at this period last year.

A TRAGEDY of an unusually sensational character was enacted at Edgington, Rock Island county, Ill., a few days ago. A young man named Thomas Richards was engaged to marry Miss Matilda J. Robbins, the daughter of one of the solid farmers of the county. The engagement was made with the unwilling consent of her parents, who yielded reluctantly, and the day for the wedding was named. When the young lady's brother, Lee Robbins, heard of it he swore it should never occur. He went to Edgington, half a mile away, and borrowed a revolver. His first plan was to shoot Richards, but the latter evaded him. Robbins then went back to his home and up-stairs to the room where his sister was dressing for her wedding. The folks below heard the discharge of a pistol and after a few seconds another report. Going to the room, the father found his son and daughter both lying on the floor of the girl's bedroom in a pool of blood. They lay side by side. Robbins first shot his sister and then himself. The ball entered her forehead and came out above her right ear, causing instant death. Robbins shot himself in nearly the same place, the ball lodging in his brain. He was alive when his father found him, but in an unconscious state. He remained in this condition half an hour, when death came to his relief. The most affectionate relations had existed between the dead brother and sister up to the hour of their deaths.

A DISPATCH from Bodie, Cal., says: "A terrible explosion of a powder magazine took place near the old Standard incline. The works were blown to atoms, and everything near them leveled to the ground. Many men were killed. The number is not known at this writing. About twenty wounded men have been found thus far. At this time no estimate can be made of the number of killed or wounded."

THE SOUTH.

MRS. SARAH A. DORSEY, a wealthy Mississippi widow, who died recently at New Orleans, bequeathed her entire estate to Jeff Davis....A Cincinnati dispatch of the 8th inst. says: "The trial of Buford, the murderer of Judge Elliot, at Frankfort, Ky., several months ago, was set for commencement before Judge McManama, at Owenton, Ky., to-day. When the case was called this morning witnesses for the State were present, but Buford's witnesses, with the exception of three or four, were absent. The Judge declared his determination to try the case at this term of court, and, after ordering that the absent witnesses be fined, adjourned the court until morning."

CONSIDERABLE excitement has been produced at Memphis by a fatal case of yellow fever, the victim being Frank Mulbrandon, an Irishman, aged 47, a shoemaker by trade. A post-mortem examination, held by six of the leading physicians of the city, including Dr. R. W. Mitchell, late Medical Director of the Howard Association, at present a member of the National Board of Health, and Dr. G. B. Thornton, President of the City Board of Health, revealed the fact that the patient had died of yellow fever. All the physicians declare it a sporadic case.

FOUR or five cases of a pestilent fever, and pronounced by physicians genuine yellow fever, were reported to the Memphis Board of Health on the 10th inst. The public announcement of the existence of these cases of the deadly disease created a wild panic among the populace, and a perfect stampede of citizens began at once, the trains being unable to carry away hundreds who desired to leave. An official order was issued by the Board of Health advising the people to remove their families away from the city until it could be ascertained whether the fever would assume an epidemic form. This official recognition of the existence of the pestilence in the city had the effect of heightening the excitement and hastening the departure of everybody that was ready to leave. The news spread along the river, north and south, and St. Louis, Vicksburg, New Orleans, and other cities at once took the alarm, and the authorities proceeded to establish a quarantine against Memphis.

GENERAL.

CAPT. EADS is entitled to draw $500,000 from the Government on account of a twenty-six feet channel at the mouth of the Mississippi, according to a recent decision of the Attorney General.

NIMROD SPOTTENHUBER, convicted of the murder of John Iveson, at Lebanon, Pa., last December, has just been hung there.

NEW money-order offices were opened on the 1st inst. at 327 places in this country. ....From various causes 105 lives were lost on steamboats the past twelve months, against 102 the preceding twelve. During the past twelve months thirty-one lives were lost by accidents ashore; the previous twelve months, forty-seven. In 1875 the number of lives lost on steamboats was 607; in 1876, 394; in 1877, 224; in 1878, 202.... The census of Nebraska, just completed under the authority of the State Government, returns a total population of 384,410, being an increase of 72,662 since last year. The increase since 1870 is 261,417....A letter of instructions from Attorney General Devens is published. It is to the effect that the refusal of Congress to appropriate money for their fees does not prevent United States Marshals from performing all the duties of their office. They will, however, be compelled to take their chances of ever getting paid through an appropriation hereafter.

ALANSON WORK, one of the old original Illinois Abolitionists, has just died at Hartford, Ct., aged 80 years.

AT the latest advices from Port au Prince, Hayti, a large part of the city had been destroyed by fire, business was suspended, and the revolution had compelled the authorities to close the Custom House....In the beginning of the South American war the Chilians seem to have been better prepared, especially in the matter of naval force, than their allied enemies. A number of important advantages were gained and a great deal of damage done, some of it of a decidedly barbarous character, along the Peruvian coasts. The late naval engagement, in which two Chilian ships were sunk, while the Peruvians lost but one, was apparently a turning point in the tide of success. The latest events of the war are a considerable battle, in which the Chilians lost 1,300 men in killed alone, and another small engagement, with results equally favorable to the forces of Peru and Bolivia. The Senate of the Colombian Congress has authorized the President of that republic to offer his mediation for the settlement of the matters in dispute between the belligerents.... A dispatch from the City of Mexico says a part of the crew of the Mexican war steamer Libertad, at Vera Cruz, mutinied and seized the steamer while the commander was on shore. Simultaneously some officers in the Vera Cruz garrison attempted to raise a revolt. Nine of the rebels were killed. The steamer Libertad went to sea, and other steamers went in pursuit.

ADDITIONAL advices from Mexico announce that the Mexican war-vessel Libertad, the crew of which mutinied, returned to Vera Cruz on the 30th of June and surrendered. There were several dead bodies and prisoners on board, some of the crew having made a counter revolt at sea.

M. DE LESSEPS, giving his views of the Darien canal scheme before the French Geographical Society, estimates that the cost of that enterprise will not exceed 250,000,000 francs, or $50,000,000.

SIX HUNDRED Mormons arrived at New York from Europe in one day last week.

WASHINGTON.

FROM reports made to the Treasury Department, says a Washington telegram, it appears that during the last five months the increase in the national resources in the matter of excess of exports amounted to $108,000,000. At this rate the excess for the year would be about $260,000,000. From these facts the inference is made that for the fiscal year the returns will be substantially as follows: Domestic exports, $698,000,000; foreign exports, $12,400,000; total exports, $711,000,000; imports, 441,800,000; excess of exports over imports, $269,300,000. With every prospect of extraordinary crops in this country and of short crops abroad, it may fairly be said that the excess for the last half of the year 1879 will probably be larger than the excess for the first half of the year.

THE following circular has just been issued by the Treasury Department:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
WASHINGTON, July 3.

To Collectors of Customs and Internal Revenue, Assistant Treasurers, and other principal officers of the Treasury Department: Hereafter, when submitting nominations for appointment to subordinate positions under your direction, you will state, in addition to the other information now required, the service of the nominee in the Union army or navy during the Rebellion.

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

IT appears from a Washington dispatch that the projected ship-canal across the isthmus is receiving considerable attention in official circles, and is likely to be made the subject of earnest consideration by the Cabinet at an early day. The Pacific railroad interests are said to be hostile to the canal scheme, and may be expected to oppose it powerfully if they enter the fight.

THE Postoffice Department decides that packages of tobacco bearing an internal-revenue stamp can go through the mails as fourth-class matter.

POLITICAL.

A WASHINGTON dispatch to the Chicago Evening Journal says the friends of Secretary Sherman have actually begun a vigorous campaign, with the object of securing for him the nomination for the Presidency.

FOREIGN.

OWING to the general feeling of insecurity in Russia, the contemplated international industrial exhibition is postponed from 1880 to one year later....The cable announces another coal-pit disaster near Glasgow, Scotland. Thirty-one persons were in the mine at the time of the explosion. Four were burned alive. Twenty-one corpses have been recovered, and it is probable all in the mine are dead....It is reported that the ex-Khedive of Egypt has been arrested at Naples.... Prince Bismarck gave a dinner at Berlin in honor of Hon. Andrew D. White, the newly-arrived United States Minister, on the 2d inst.... The Cuban Government is reported to have asked Spain to send to that island and distribute among the sugar plantations about 40,000 troops, to be employed in the double capacity of guards and field-hands. This step is proposed as a preliminary measure of the policy about to be adopted for the gradual emancipation of the slaves.

IN the British House of Commons, last Saturday, the Government agreed to the motion of Henry Chaplin (Conservative) for the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the causes of the agricultural depression, and how far they were created by, or remediable by, legislation. The matter caused great debate.... A Paris dispatch says that M. De Lesseps has just signed the treaty giving him the concession of the isthmus granted by the United States of Colombia. Matters are now to be pushed with the greatest activity. A new company will be immediately constituted with a capital of 440,000,000 francs....The Manchester (Eng.) Guardian says the ruinously low prices obtained for cotton goods are leading to a very decided curtailment of production. There are signs of an extensive adoption of a system of short-time working in the factories at Oldham, and it seems very probable this movement will rapidly spread....The French Minister of Commerce estimates that the demands of France for foreign grain during the current year will not fall short of £20,000,000.

THE military court convened to inquire into the circumstances of Prince Louis Bonaparte's death censured Lieut. Carey for making no attempt to rally his escort and save the Prince. A court-martial was thereupon organized to try the Lieutenant. Its labors had not been completed at the date of the last Cape Town dispatches. The defense claimed that Carey did not know that he was expected to exercise any special care or guardianship over young Bonaparte, and that, in fact, he was not in command of the party when the killing occurred.... A correspondent at Berlin draws a gloomy picture of the state of Russia, owing to the Nihilists, the failure of the crops, and the ravages of the corn-beetle. Fifty thousand rubles have been appropriated to exterminate the beetle....The depopulation of Iceland by emigration has fairly begun. A party numbering 250 persons arrived in England from that island the other day. They are on their way to America and intend to settle in Minnesota....The cable continues keeping the world informed of De Lesseps' proceedings. The latest bulletin is to the effect that subscription books for the canal company will be opened in London, Paris, Frankfort and New York in a few days. The shares will be of £20 sterling each.

THIRTEEN HUNDRED sheep from Boston, infected with foot and mouth disease, were slaughtered at Liverpool last week....The hop crop in England threatens to be a more disastrous failure than for years past....The city of Irkutsk, Russia, was the scene of a very destructive and extensive conflagration on the Fourth of July. Fourteen of the city's fifteen wards were laid waste.... In the German Reichstag it has been determined to postpone the operation of the new tariff, except on four articles, until the 1st of January next. On flour and fats the tax will take effect immediately, and on grain and wool on the 1st of October. The postponement of the tax on other articles is due to the Government's acknowledgment that the preparations for the general enforcement of the tariff will not be completed before the new year.

THE St. Petersburg Golos estimates that the cost to Russia of the war with Turkey amounted to £150,000,000, and that the deaths in the Russian army numbered 200,000....The remains of the French Prince Imperial arrived at London on the 10th of July....A Paris dispatch denies the reported sinking of a steamer, with great loss of life, on the river Doubs.... A Rome dispatch says the contributions of Peter's pence for the first half of the present year increased £28,000 compared with the corresponding period of 1878.

THE Prince of Bulgaria has been sworn in at Tirnova, the ancient capital of the country. His first act was to dissolve the constitutional assembly, the place of which will be taken in due time by a regular legislative body....John Joseph Mechi, a noted scientific agriculturist, writes to the London Times as follows: "Another week of flooding storms and low temperature has put a finishing stroke to the agricultural disaster. It is now too late for the crops to recover. They are considerably injured, even on well-farmed and drained lands, while on ill-farmed and undrained lands the matter is simply ruinous. The wheat will suffer less than the spring crops. Weeding is hopeless, and, unless we get the promised hot, dry weather many grass and clover crops, and even peas, will rot ungathered."....From St. Petersburg it is reported that liberty of worship has been granted the dissenters from the orthodox or state church. The dispatches say this enfranchisement affects 12,000,000 people, but convey no information as to any enlargement of the religious privileges of Catholic and other denominations.

Quick Wit Wins.

Years ago, into a wholesale grocery store in Boston walked a tall, muscular-looking man, evidently a fresh comer from some backwoods town in Maine or New Hampshire. Accosting the first person he met, who happened to be the merchant himself, he said:

"You don't want to hire a man in your store, do you?"

"Well," said the merchant, "I don't know; what can you do?"

"Do?" said the man; "rather guess I can turn my hand to almost anything—what do you want done?"

"Well, if I was to hire a man it would be one that could lift well, a strong, wiry fellow; one, for instance, that could shoulder a sack of coffee like that yonder, and carry it across the floor and never lay it down."

"There, now, Capting," said the countryman, "that's just me. I can lift anything I hitch to; you can't suit me better. What will you give a man that will suit you?"

"I'll tell you," said the merchant; "if you will shoulder that sack of coffee and carry it across the store twice and never lay it down, I will hire you a year at $100 per month."

"Done," said the stranger, and by this time every clerk in the store had gathered around and were waiting to join in the laugh against the man, who, walking up to the sack, threw it across his shoulder with perfect ease, although extremely heavy, and, walking with it twice across the store, went quietly to a large hook which was fastened to the wall, and, hanging it up, turned to the merchant and said:

"There, now, it may hang there till doomsday; I shall never lay it down. What shall I go about, mister? Just give me plenty to do and $100 a month and it's all right."

The clerks broke into a laugh, and the merchant, discomfited, yet satisfied, kept his agreement, and to-day the green countryman is the senior partner in the firm, and is worth a million dollars.—Utica Observer.

Cabbage-Tree Ned's Story.

A writer in the Boston Commercial Bulletin, upon life in Australia, relates this yarn: One of the stories told me by the driver as we jolted along had relation to the depth of the mud which covered the road. I have heard the same story in various forms since, for Ned was in the habit of telling it to every passenger that he carried to the diggings. I have also heard the same story assigned to a California driver. No matter; I know it was told to me by Cabbage-Tree Ned in 1852.

"You see, young fellow," said he, "I was driving along, keeping well to the right of the road, where the mud was shallowest, for I knew that I had a heavy load which 'ud prevent the coach from floating; and, besides, none o' my horses could swim. I had just got to about where we are now when I noticed what I thought was a hat moving along on the top of the mud, just a little ahead o' me on my left.

"I could not make out what it was at first, but at last I seed it was a hat, and I felt kind o' frightened. Not that I'd be frightened at a hat, but what I was frightened at was that the hat was moving along in the same direction as myself without any visible means. Jingo, thinks I, now here's a go; what the deuce can it be? By and by I came up abreast of it, and then got a little ahead of it. Then I seed there was a face under the hat—jingo, if it wasn't a man.

"'Hallo, friend,' says I, 'What are you tramping through the mud in that way for? Come along here and I'll give you a lift in the coach.'

"'What would I get into your coach for,' he cried, 'and leave my own horse?' And sure enough he was riding a horse, for I saw the ears of the animal just ahead of him sticking out of the mud, but the horse being tired was swimming low; yes, the mud was very deep that day."

Marrying Off the Princess Beatrice.

English paragraphists marry the Princess Beatrice about twice a week. They are now arranging a marriage between her Royal Highness and Prince Louis of Battenburg, brother of Prince Alexander I. of Bulgaria. The story goes that the Prince and Princess are mutually inclined, and that Prince Leopold is acting the part of friend and brother in the matter. But (says the London correspondent of the Irish Times) it is said that the course of love does not run smooth, because it does not run in a channel of Pactolus. Dropping metaphor, the Prince is poor, having little but his pay as a Prussian Lieutenant, and that is less than the salary of an Irish police constable, and would hardly keep a young couple in saurkraut; but, now that Alexander has dropped into a crown and scepter, it is believed he will do the handsome thing by his brother, in which case they say her Majesty is not likely to play the role of stern parent. There is another version of this wooing in high places, according to which Prince Louis is merely courting for his brother Alexander.

Old Hickory's Bluff Way.

Long years after the capture of Stony Point, when Andrew Jackson was President, a visitor at the White House remarked that the Postmaster in his town (who "held over") was an enemy to the President—had even been heard to call him "a scoundrel"—and urged the removal of the ill-mannered officer.

"What sort of a person is he?" inquired the President.

The visitor admitted that the Postmaster was an aged and honorable man, and incidentally remarked that he was one of the survivors of the battle of Stony Point?

"What!" said the President, rising from his chair. "Was he really with Anthony Wayne at Stony Point?"

"He certainly was," replied the visitor.

"Well, then," said Old Hickory, "by the Eternal! he has a perfect right to call me a scoundrel every day in the week, and to be Postmaster during his natural life."—Hartford Post.

Charles O'Conor.

A New York correspondent of a Philadelphia paper writes: "As I came up Wall street this morning I met Charles O'Conor, who, according to tradition, is the leader of the New York bar. I never fancied the man. In all my active journalistic experience I have never run across a kind word spoken, a kind deed done by Charles O'Conor. But for all that he is a historic figure, and his name will figure in encyclopedias as one once borne on campaign banners in a Presidential campaign. His connection with real-estate men made him rich in early life. His advocacy of Nelson Chase's claim to the estate of Mme. Jumel made him richer. He wears his hat on the back of a small head, is as pale as a white turnip, rarely smiles, often sneers, and has eyes that roll like those of Barnum's Albinos."

Roasted to Death by the Sun.

An Indian named Maracle, living on the Tyendinego reserve, in Canada, was literally roasted to death by the sun, the other day. He partook freely of whisky until he had become drunk, and then lay down in the sun near his dwelling. His daughter tried to arouse him, could not, and, on visiting him some hours afterwards, found that he was not sleeping, but dead. In taking off his clothing parts of his flesh came off with them, the flesh being roasted by the heat of the sun.

ALL SORTS.

CHICAGO must soon mourn the loss of three representative preachers. Unitarianism must part with Collyer, Episcopacy with Dr. Harris, and Presbyterianism must surrender Dr. Patton—each man being a leader in his denomination.

SOUTH and Central America are at present fairly clouded with the sulphurous smoke of war. Peru and Chili are fighting each other, with a fair prospect of drawing Bolivia into the melee. Paraguay has a revolution; ditto Panama; ditto Mexico.

A WRITER from California says the ground-squirrel in that State is the great pest of the farmer. He says the injury to the growing crops from these rodents last year amounted to not less than $1,500,000. Every method is used to destroy them—strychnine, phosphorus, arsenic and gunpowder—and yet they flourish and multiply.

THE religion of the British army has lately been made a cause of inquiry on the part of the British Government. Contrary to a somewhat general expectation, it is found to be very largely Protestant. Out of 94,842 men, 73,870 are Protestants, 62,260 being of the Church of England, 7,125 Presbyterians, and 3,985 of other Protestant sects; while 20,872 are Roman Catholics. Nearly all have received schooling, and a large number of all sects receive good-conduct pay and school certificates.

IT is a singular fact that not one of the imperial Napoleons has died in France, or on French soil. Napoleon I., the founder of the family, died a prisoner on the British island of St. Helena, in the South Atlantic ocean; his son, Napoleon II., died in Austria; his nephew, Napoleon III., died an exile in England; and now his grandnephew, the young man whom the French imperialists have hoped would one day rule France as Napoleon IV., has met his fate at the point of Zulu spears in South Africa.

THE Canadian Government has concluded that visits from foreign troops bearing arms are open to objections, and that it is advisable hereafter to discontinue this style of excursions. Some pains are taken to remove the impression that this determination has been influenced by any apprehension of possible invasions by Irish-American military organizations for the capture of Canada. Our friends over the border are not in the least nervous on this score; they only think that militia from the States are not desirable visitors on general principles.

GREAT properties melt rapidly away in England as well as the United States. John Vaughan, of the firm of Bolckow, Vaughan & Co., of Middleborough, died in 1868. He left a place called Gunnergate Hall and $2,500,000 to his son Thomas. In eight years the latter was a bankrupt, and even the Hall was sold out under the hammer. The billiard room cost $200,000; in some of the rooms the leather coverings of the seats cost $90 per yard; single fireplaces, $10,000; bedsteads, $7,500; spittoons, $120 each. No wonder Thomas Vaughan went under.

THE Khedive of Egypt has been deposed. This deposition is the result of the immense debt piled up by that ruler. The money was borrowed principally from England and France for the carrying out of great projects in which those countries were interested. The creditors have secured the removal of the debtor! But if this may be done with Egypt, why not with Turkey. If indebtedness is to cause the partition of kingdoms and the knocking down of old and the putting up of new dynasties, it will be a better and cheaper way than to do the same thing by war.

TWELVE sets of telephones have been sent out to Sir Garnet Wolseley for use at the seat of war in South Africa. The great advantage of the telephone over the telegraph is that the General can carry on confidential talk with the officer at the district station, or a soldier can creep out toward the enemy's lines and whisper back the information as to position. A fine wire, the thinner the better, is all that is needed. This the soldier carries in a reel upon his back, a mile weighing only a few pounds. This will be the first time the telephone has been used as an instrument of warfare.

IT has been so habitual to associate the name of Edward Payson Weston with defeat and failure in his numerous pedestrian undertakings of late years that it seems difficult to realize that he is the same man who has developed such extraordinary speed and endurance in the contest for the long-distance championship, in London. He has surpassed all previous records within the same time. There is this to be said to Weston's infinite credit—that whether in success or failure he is exemplary in his habits, and is not subject to the lapses into over-indulgence and intemperance that have proved the downfall of so many promising athletes. His victory in the present contest will be all the more gratifying to his countrymen in America since it illustrates the power of moral force when allied to physical strength, perseverance and pluck.

ESTIMATING the population of the country in 1880 at 46,500,000, and assuming 300 as the number of Representatives in Congress under the next apportionment, The Washington Republican calculates that the Southern States will lose seven, while the Northern States will gain fourteen Representatives. It estimates that the Northeastern States will lose seven, while the other Northern States will gain twenty-one, making a net gain of fourteen; also, that Texas and Missouri will each gain three, while the other Southern States will lose thirteen, making a net loss of seven. Assuming that the population will be 50,000,000, as Mr. Elliott estimates, and that the number of Representatives will be 300, the Republican assigns 213 Representatives to the Northern States, and eighty-seven to the Southern States. According to this estimate the strength of the Northern States in the Electoral College will be 257, while that of the Southern States will be only 119. According to the first estimate, Iowa and Kansas will gain four Representatives each, Illinois, Michigan and Minnesota three each, Nebraska two, and Wisconsin one. Of course the re-apportionment will not be made until after the next Presidential election. If it were made before then, the politicians would have to revise their calculations.

PERSONALS.

SENATOR MORRILL, of Vermont, is 69.

SENATOR HAMLIN, of Maine, is 70 years old.

SENATOR HOUSTON, of Alabama, has just passed his 68th year.

PRESIDENT HAYES owns a section of land near Bismarck, Dakota.

SENATORS THURMAN, Chandler and Kirkwood are each 66 years of age.

DANIEL F. DAVIS, the Republican nominee for Governor of Maine, is only 36 years of age.

GEN. HAZEN, having failed to establish his military record to his satisfaction in a military court, is now going to try a civil court, and has sued Gen. Stanley for libel.

EX-UNITED STATES TREASURER JOHN C. NEW has become President of a mining company which claims to own $7,500,000 in gold hidden away in Northern California.

THE great magnate of South Wales is Sir Watkin William Wynn, who owns 90,000 acres in the principality. He is a member of Parliament for Denbighshire, as was his father from the age of 24 to his death, at an advanced age.

JAMES C. FLOOD draws $62,500 from the national treasury four times a year, that sum being the quarterly interest on $5,000,000 invested in 5 per cents. It is said, moreover, that he recently has put another $5,000,000 in 4 per cents.

THE Emperor of China is the stoutest monarch in the world, and the Emperor of Germany the tallest, though even he can boast of seventy-two inches, while his nephew, Prince Adalbert, stands six feet six inches in his stockings.

JAMES LABRABEE, of Stark, N. H., a veteran woodsman of 86 years old, has furnished spars and masts for 500 vessels; he has not been ill for fifty years, and can still remain up day and night for two days at a time while engaged in his work in the forest.

CLARA JOHNSON, a colored centenarian, died in Spring Garden, Pittsylvania county, Va., a few days ago. She was thought to be 111 years old. She remembered when Bainstre Tarleton, the cavalry chief of Cornwallis, struck terror about the country side, and saw Greene's troops when they were foraging through Pittsylvania on the road north.

COL. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, once said to the late Thomas H. Benton, who had a fine, large way of deporting himself: "Senator Benton, why do you talk to yourself so much?" With great dignity Benton replied: "Col. Marshall, I can tell you very earnestly and truly why I talk to myself. I love to talk to a great man, and I love to hear a great man talk."

ONCE, while Randolph, of Roanoke, was debating a question in the Senate, he said it was a shame that the "noble bull-dogs of the administration should waste their time in worrying the rats of the opposition." He was called to order, but the President ruled in his favor. Thus encouraged, he pointed his long finger at the members of the opposition, and fairly screamed: "Rats, did I say? Mice! Mice!"

THE late Baron Lionel de Rothschild, though proverbially fond of money, was equally fond of his friends, and his manner of evincing this toward Mr. Solomon Herschel, the grand rabbi of Duke's Place, had something in it which was singular and whimsical. When any good speculation was afloat, he deposited on his account a certain sum proportionate to his own risk, and whatever profit accrued was carried by him to the rabbi, to whom he gave a full, true and particular account to a fraction. On such occasions he invariably dined with the rabbi, and—perhaps they did not have a good time!

AUBURN COURIER.

THEO. REED, ROB. J. LOWRY } Editors.

THE Italian Chamber of Deputies has passed a bill proposed by the Ministers, providing for an annual expenditure of $12,000,000 for twenty-one years in building railroads. The peninsula should be pretty well "gridironed" with roads by the time the money is all disposed of.

COL. BRACKETT, who commands at Fort Custer, some time ago sent Capt. Sanderson with a detail of soldiers to gather up the bones on the Custer battle-field. He piled them upon an eminence a few feet from where Custer fell, inclosing them in a structure made of cord-wood, pyramidal in shape, and eight feet high. It can be seen from Fort Custer, twelve miles distant.

The agreement of the Eastern Telegraph Company with the representatives of the British Government requires the construction of a telegraph line from Durban, in Natal, to Delagoa bay, thence to Mozambique, Zanzibar and Aden, to be opened to Zanzibar by July 31 and to Aden by Dec. 31. The Government is to pay an annual subsidy of £35,000 for twenty years, and is to have an official director on the boards of the companies. Rates are to be limited to 5 shillings a word between Durban and Aden, and to 3 shillings 9 pence between Aden and London.

PITTSBURGH is one of the blackest of cities by reason of the smoke from its manufactories; but a plan is being tested that promises to make it clean. The proposition is to wash the smoke, and the way of doing it is thus described: "The washing is done by passing the smoke through the spray caused by paddle-wheels revolving in a tank of water holding soda ash in solution. The tank and wheels are placed in the flue, between the furnace and the chimney, and, the wheels being made to revolve in the direction of the chimney, the draught in increased." The smoke after being thus treated, will not soil a white handkerchief.

THE most costly school building in the world is probably the new Polytechnic Institute in Hanover. The late King of Hanover commenced the construction of a magnificent palace, upon which he expended above $5,000,000. When his Government was overthrown and the kingdom of Hanover became a province of Prussia, the building was found in a half-finished condition. For several years the windows were boarded up and the empty rooms became the residence of bats and birds. At last the German Government resolved to alter the building and adapt it to the uses of the polytechnic school. The work has been going forward for several years, and is now nearly ended.

THE failures of farmers are becoming alarmingly frequent in England. In 1870 they numbered 229; in 1875, 354; in 1876, 480; in 1877, 477; in 1878, 815, and in the first half of 1879, no fewer than 614. In addition, the facts are well known that farmers in many counties are now losing their capital, that landlords find great difficulty in re-letting at any price, and that the remission of rents has only met a portion of the difficulty. If the land of England becomes less and less able to compete with that of other countries in the growth of meat and cereal crops, the alteration in the conditions will have an effect not only on the persons immediately concerned, but on England as a whole.

THE profitableness of wholesale dealing in unclaimed baggage is not so certain as some people might think, at least it did not prove particularly remunerative to a general baggage agent of the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and St. Louis railroad. He had had accumulated on his hands 400 pieces of unclaimed baggage, which were advertised to the extent of a column and a half, in itemized form, six times in a Cincinnati daily, as being for sale at a certain date if not claimed by that time. The sale came off as advertised, but when he came to figure the cost of advertising, and the amount realized from the sale, he found that the expenses, even after getting the newspaper to knock off 20 per cent., were $1.80 more than the sale realized. The advertising bill amounted to 360-odd dollars and the sale to just $1.80 less. The agent paid the $1.80 and dropped the subject.

M. FERDINAND DE LESSEPS, that sprightly little old man, now 78 years of age, who completed the Suez canal in 1869, and who, at the International Canal Congress at Paris, a few days ago, convinced engineers of the practicability, and capitalists of the probability of the profit, of piercing the isthmus at Panama, was present at a dinner given in London by the Lord Mayor, on the evening of June 12, to the members of the Literary Congress and the Telegraph Conference, and made a speech on his favorite subject. He said he was sure the canal would be finished in eight years, and that in September he should invite subscriptions to the capital. His idea seems to be to raise the money by a great number of small subscriptions. As to the amount required, he contented himself with a clever remark. It had been said there was somebody who had more wit than Voltaire—it was everybody; and he would say there was somebody who had more money than Rothschild or Baring—it was everybody. This septuagenarian had in the morning of the same day visited the Literary Congress, where, as soon as his presence became known, he was elected President of the session, and he then made a speech on the Panama canal. After devoting the afternoon to business in the city, and sitting through the long dinner in the evening, he appeared about midnight at Mrs. Millais' party, having his hostess, Mrs. Douglas Murray, on his arm, and spent two or three hours in that brilliant company. When last heard from, at 2 o'clock in the morning, he was waltzing airily with a young lady who might have been his granddaughter.

How Annie Louise Cary got in jail out in Virginia City, Nev.: When the Strakosch company arrived there Miss. Cary and Marie Litta set forth without escort to find Piper's Opera House, where they were to sing that night. Having, as they thought, followed directions, they pulled up at the Court House. They marched about the corridors for some time, seeking entrance to the body of the theater, and finally penetrated the jail corridors, where a heavy gate clanged in their faces. The ladies demanded admission. The turnkey said they couldn't enter without a permit, though he kindly volunteered to take any message they might wish to send to their brother. "Great heavens! what brother?" exclaimed Miss Annie Louise, with impatience; "we want to go up on the stage." "There ain't any stage to this 'ere jail, Miss." "Jail, jail!" and the sweet singers fainted.

ONE of the strangest cases of suicide on record recently occurred near Hagerstown, Ind. Several weeks since a farmer by the name of George Hoover, smitten by the charms of a grass widow, expressed to some friends his intention of leading her to the hymeneal altar. Mr. Hoover was a member of the Dunker Church, one of the laws of which prohibits a male member from marrying a divorced woman. The church, on being notified of his intention, warned him to desist, and if he took the step he would certainly be expelled. He paid no heed to the warning, but married the widow, and, in consequence, was turned from the church. The expulsion was so embarrassing to him that life soon after became an unbearable burden, and he commenced a slow process of starvation, partaking of an insufficient quantity of food to sustain life. His wife and friends begged him to eat, drink, and live, and the church, when they saw that he was earnestly bent on self-destruction, offered to reinstate him as a member, but all in vain. Each day he ate less than on the preceding one, and, after about five or six weeks of voluntary starvation, he died.

An Anecdote of Queen Victoria.

The Queen was not 20 years of age when she ascended the throne. Coming into possession of power with a heart fresh, tender and pure, and with all her instincts inclined to mercy, we may be sure that she found many things that tried her strength of resolution to the utmost. On a bright, beautiful morning the young Queen was waited upon at her palace at Windsor by the Duke of Wellington. He had brought from London various papers requiring her signature to make them operative. One of them was a sentence of court-martial pronounced against a soldier of the line, that sentence that he be shot dead. The Queen looked upon the paper, and then looked upon the wondrous beauties that nature had spread to her view. "What has this man done?" she asked. The Duke looked at the paper, and replied: "Ah! my royal mistress, that man, I fear, is incorrigible. He has deserted three times." "And can you not say anything in his behalf, my Lord?" Wellington shook his head. "Oh, think again, I pray you!" Seeing that her Majesty was so deeply moved and feeling sure she would not have the man shot in any event, he finally confessed that the man was brave and gallant and really a good soldier. "But," he added, "think of the influence." "Influence!" the Queen cried, her eyes flashing and her bosom heaving with strong emotion. "Let it be ours to yield influence. I will try mercy in this man's case, and I charge you, your Grace, to let me know the result. A good soldier, you said. Oh, I thank you for that. And you may tell him that your good word saved him." Then she took the paper and wrote, with a bold, firm hand, across the dark page, the bright, saving word—"Pardoned!" The Duke was fond of telling the story, and he was willing also to confess that the giving of that paper to the pardoned soldier gave him far more joy than he could have experienced from the taking of a city.—London Journal.

NO SURRENDER.

The Issue Between the Republican and Democratic Parties.

"The Contest Begun, and God Give the Victory to Freedom and the Right."

Eloquent Speech of Hon. Frank H. Hurd, of Ohio, in the National House of Representatives.

MR. CHAIRMAN: A session of unusual excitement appears to be drawing to a close. Questions of the greatest interest to the people of the United States have been from the first day until now the subject of discussion, and it seems a proper thing at its termination to inquire into the result of it, and inquire whether or not the action of the majority of this House meets with the approval of the American people.

My colleague from Ohio [Mr. Garfield], who has just taken his seat, has seen fit, in answer to the positions which have been maintained by the Democratic party in the progress of the argument, to enter upon a disquisition as to the nature of the Federal Government and the relations of the States to that Government under the constitution which they created. Never in all my studies of the political history of this country, never in all my knowledge of the political debates which have taken place in the Congress of the United States have I heard such views of consolidation advanced as have been suggested to-day by that gentleman.

He advanced the extraordinary proposition that the Union preceded the States, when the seventh article of the constitution declares:

> The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution between the States so ratifying the same.

But in order that all doubt might be removed upon the subject, that the constitution and the Union was the creature of the States, it was declared in the Tenth amendment of the constitution:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Nor is the opinion of the highest judicial tribunal in this country wanting upon this proposition. In the case of Lane county vs. Oregon, the following is the decision of Chief Justice Chase, to be found on page 76 of 7 Wallace:

> The people of the United States constitute one nation, under one Government, and this Government within the scope of the powers with which it is invested is supreme. On the other hand the people of each State compose a State having its own Government, and endowed with all the functions essential to separate and independent existence. The States disunited might continue to exist. Without the States in union there could be no such political body as the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of the present discussion it is not necessary to enter into an elaborate consideration of the doctrine of State rights or the powers of the Federal Government. It is sufficient for the bill now under consideration that we should inquire as to whether it is within the scope and the powers of the Federal Government to pass laws to interfere with elections in the States, and only so far as this question is involved do I propose to discuss the doctrine of State rights at all.

At the beginning of this session of Congress the Democratic party declared three propositions. We insisted that the army should be kept away from the polls; that the test oath should be repealed, and that laws should be enacted for the impartial drawing of jurors; and that the Federal Government should not exercise authority over elections held within the States. We insisted and maintained that because of and by virtue of the constitutional provision that the House of Representatives alone shall originate money bills, the representatives of the people had the right to insist that the grievances of which they complained should be remedied before appropriations should be made for the support of the Government.

In the discussion which has continued for three months, one of the most earnest and able that has ever occurred in an American Congress, the Democratic party has maintained these propositions. It is not necessary to enter into the details of the argument; it is sufficient for my purpose to briefly recapitulate them.

We said that the measures to which we objected were unconstitutional; we said that there was no such person as a voter of the United States, as such; that every man who had a right to vote had it because of State authority and under State laws and that therefore the Federal Government, not creating the voter, had no power to interfere with him in the exercise of his rights of franchise.

We insisted that, under the laws as they now stand, there is no such thing as a national election; that under the provisions of the constitution in order that there should be a national election it was fundamental that Congress should fix the places, times and manner of holding such election. In that event there might be a national election, but that is not this case, for in every instance the times, places and manner of holding elections are fixed by the constitution and the laws of the States, except in a single instance, as to the time. The States having exercised power upon the subject there is no occasion for the exercise of power by the United States, and to say that the United States and each State at the same time possess the power of fixing the time, place, and manner of holding elections is to say that two sovereignties possess the power to do the same thing at the same time on the same subject-matter, which is itself an absurdity. We maintain as to the army, that it being a creature of Congress, it has no power to be within the limits of the sovereign States except as the constitution of the United States provides, and then only for the purpose of suppressing domestic insurrection or repelling the armed enemies of the United States, and then only at the request of the Legislature thereof, or the Executive of the State if the Legislature be not in session.

More than that. We have referred to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States approving all these propositions and declaring that the voters were voters of the State, and that the Federal Government has nothing to do with them. To these decisions gentlemen on the other side, with one or two exceptions, have absolutely refrained in this debate from referring. In addition to that we urged the argument that the laws that we sought to repeal enabled Supervisors to come into the State and interfere with State elections for the selection of State officers, and we also referred to the fact that in the State of New York and other States the greatest outrages had been committed by the arrest of citizens without warrant by officers who had not seen them commit any offense against the laws, and who, upon bare suspicion that an offense was intended, had arrested them. We showed from experience how in the South justice had been made a farce; that jurors were drawn in the interest of partisanship, and the cases were decided in the interests of partisanship, and that the courts had absolutely failed to administer justice to the people in that great section. We referred to the city of New York, where, on an election day, more than five thousand American citizens were imprisoned by the authority of the Supervisors of Election, and afterwards discharged by a Judge of the United States Court, who decided that there was no authority to arrest, and that they had been guilty of no crime. More than that, we referred in our argument to the great doctrine of civil liberty, and maintained that the measures we sought to repeal were inimical to freedom, un-American in spirit, and, in the end, would prove subversive of free government.

No more manly, no more dignified, no more logical debate so far as the Democratic side of this House is concerned was ever conducted on this floor; but in what way were our arguments treated by gentlemen on the other side of the House? With the exception of half a dozen speeches the pretended answers to our arguments might as well have been made on any other subject as upon the bill now before the House for consideration. When we said that these measures were violative of the constitution of the United States Republican orators replied that on this side of the House the majority were Confederate Brigadiers who had attempted to overthrow the constitution of the United States.

When we referred to the fact of the outrages committed on American citizens, they replied by citing the outrages committed at Andersonville and other prisons in the South during the war, and when we urged that the powers of the army should be so limited and qualified that it might not be used to overthrow the liberties of the people, they said, your side was whipped by that army, and therefore you are opposed to it. Never in all my knowledge has a debate been so honestly conducted as this has been upon our side of the House; never have arguments been more unfairly met than have our arguments by gentlemen on the other side. There are honorable exceptions, of course. It would be invidious to name them, but I will venture to mention the names of two, and I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Hawley] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Robeson]. As the result of this debate bills have been passed and sent to the President of the United States and have been vetoed. The veto power was designed by the constitution as a power to prevent unconstitutional legislation, hasty or ill-considered legislation, or to enable the Executive to protect itself against encroachments from other branches of the Government. I defy any gentleman to point me to any argument in the debate upon the adoption of the constitution which did not give in favor of this provision one or the other of these reasons.

And in the history of this Government, from the day of its foundation until now, the veto power was never before exercised to prevent the repeal of a law or to prevent the enactment of a general appropriation bill. Certainly never before was the veto power exercised to practically take away from one of the two houses of Congress a power which is conferred upon it separately by the provisions of the constitution itself. The power to originate bills of revenue is a power which belongs to us, and it is a power which, if the President interferes with it as he has done by this veto in this case, he can absolutely take away from us.

What reasons have been urged in these extraordinary vetoes? Chiefly that the bills we sought to pass took away from the executive authority the power to enforce the law. Because we would not let him use the army on election day to keep the peace at the polls he said we took away from him the power to enforce the laws.

Sir, the army is the creature of Congress. The constitution declares that the Congress may raise an army. The constitution declares that appropriations for the army shall not last longer than two years. The constitution declares that Congress may make rules and regulations for the government of the army, "rules and regulations;" "rules" coming first, "regulations" afterward. Therefore the army is absolutely the creature of Congress. Whether it shall be used to execute the laws or not is for Congress to say and not for the President. He must take the army as we give it to him, for the purposes which we declare it shall be used for, we being the power to create it.

Strange to say, the President and his advisers and the gentlemen on the other side of the House seem to have lost sight of the constitutional provision which gives the President the power to execute the laws. The language of that instrument is that the President of the United States may call upon the militia of the several States to execute the laws. There is the power given to him for the execution of the laws; not the army, unless Congress says so, but the militia of the States, because the constitution so provides.

Never for an instant did our bills interfere with the power of the President over the militia of the States but only over the army—this creature of ours. The President has the militia of the States from one end of the United States to the other to aid him in executing the laws on election day or at any other time, at the polls or anywhere else.

What is the result now, after the vetoes? Some gentlemen have said that the Democratic party has backed down, has surrendered. Sir, when we entered upon this fight we did not expect to gain the victory in a day. When power has for twenty years been intrenching behind all possible legislation, we cannot dislodge it in a moment. We entered upon this contest knowing that many a battle must be fought, many a victory be gained, before the ultimate triumph could be achieved.

In the Forty-fifth Congress we said to the President, your army—our army, I mean—our army shall not be used as a posse comitatus. In the Forty-sixth Congress we have said our army shall not be used as a part of the police force. And before the Forty-sixth Congress shall have closed its term, I say to gentlemen that we will have taken from the statute-book every law which proposes to use this creature of ours at the polls to intimidate American citizens in the exercise of their highest prerogative.

I would have gentlemen on the other side and the country remember that there has been no surrender of the principle with which we began this contest. We claim that the representatives of the people, by virtue of their power to originate appropriation bills, can secure redress of their grievances by stopping the supplies for the support of the Government, either of the President or of any other branch of the Government, unless our views on the subjects to which the appropriations relate are carried out. I say to gentlemen on the other side and to the country that so long as the Democratic party is in a majority in this House it will never surrender that grand, healthful power which more than any other made England a free nation, and which was put into our constitution in order that the legislative authority might have a wholesome method of controlling executive power.

Mr. Chairman, this extra session has made up the issue between the two parties. The Democratic party declare that the army shall be kept from the polls; that juries shall be impartially drawn; that the test-oath shall be repealed, and that the Federal authority shall not interfere in elections within the States. Upon that question the Republican party takes issue with us. Confidently appealing only to the patriotism of the country, the Democratic party goes into this contest. Never in all the history of this land have more important questions been submitted to the American people for their determination. They relate to the pure administration of justice; they concern the gravest questions of constitutional law; they affect the fundamental principles of civil liberty. Every man who runs for any office in any State and every citizen who goes to the polls to deposit his ballot is interested. The whole method of ascertaining the popular will in the republic is involved in the issue.

So far-reaching are these principles that if upon this issue the Republican party shall be successful, then all the power over elections in States would be drawn to the Central Government. The States would lose their places in the federative system, and whether the army shall be used at the polls or not would be a question not of right and of constitutional law but of Executive discretion. Such a result means the end of the republic and the uplifting of the empire. Can there be any doubt as to a controversy like this? In Russia, where absolute despotism silences individual opinion, it might be doubtful. In Germany, where imperial power sustains itself by an immense standing army, it might be doubtful. In France, where the people under Monarchs and Emperors for ages have slumbered, it might be doubtful. But here in free America, with the traditions of our English ancestors, and with the sacrifices and triumphs of our American forefathers in behalf of civil liberty, it cannot be doubtful. Shall civil liberty perish upon its own threshold and by its own fireside? Shall the beacon-light which has shone from our shores for the encouragement of struggling freemen everywhere flicker in its socket and go out even as they are gazing upon it? Shall the sun of free government in this continent ere it reaches the meridian sink into night? Shall the shadow and the cloud of the army darken our free fields, and free rivers, and free lakes, and free prairies, and pollute the air so that a freeman cannot breathe it? The century of triumph just ended protests; the bright prospects of our future protest; the hopes of the world protest; and, what is practically of more value, the Democratic party, with its majority of half a million of American people, protests.

Gentlemen, the contest will soon begin. Ay, it has already begun. I hear the whispering of American inquiry; I hear the mutterings of Anglo-Saxon resolve. I hear the tread of the legions forming, with the banner of civil liberty above them. The contest has already begun; and God give victory to freedom and the right!

INDIANA ITEMS.

WM. ALLISON, of Plainfield, received a fatal sunstroke the other day.

THIS season gives the most bountiful wheat harvest ever garnered in Indiana.

THE employes of the Indianapolis, Dayton and Columbus road have struck for their back pay.

TRACK-LAYING on the Frankfort and State Line Narrow-Gauge railroad began at Frankfort last week.

CYRUS W. MCKAY, an old citizen of Morgan county, died at the residence of his brother, near Clayton, recently.

NOBLE C. BUTLER, of New Albany, the new Clerk of the United States Courts, has assumed charge of the office.

ALLEN NORCROSS, the oldest citizen of Wells county, died a few days ago. He had come to that part of the State in 1832.

THE Trustees have elected Dr. A. J. Thomas, former editor of the Vincennes Sun, Second Assistant Physician of the Insane Asylum.

GEORGE WEST, a resident of Sullivan county, was fatally bitten on the foot by a rattlesnake. The snake clung on with a tenacious grip until torn off.

AT Mooresville a young son of Louis Apple, aged 6, while playing in his father's grist-mill, fell between the wheel and stonework, crushing and killing him.

THE Blue River starch works at Edinburg shut down last week until September. Since starting up last September they have used nearly 250,000 bushels of corn.

W. H. MYERS, of Fort Wayne, has the contract for building the new jail at Plymouth. The building will be erected on the lot north of the Court House. Work will be commenced at once.

JOHNSON, the escaped convict from the penitentiary, who had been beleaguered in a swamp near Memphis, Clark county, has made his escape, notwithstanding the close vigilance with which he was guarded.

THE fifteenth annual convention of the Indiana Sunday-School Union held a three-days' session at Richmond last week. There were 550 delegates in attendance, which is in excess of any previous convention.

THE following Indiana graduates of West Point have been assigned: Wm. A. Shunk, Eighth cavalry; Francis H. French, Nineteenth infantry; Luther C. Wellborn, Fifth cavalry; Will P. May, Fifteenth cavalry.

A TRAIN of cars set fire to a wheat field, belonging to Matthias Wright, near Shelbyville. The exertions of all hands employed on the farm, together with the entire force of section hands, were required to save the crop.

A BOY in Crawford county married when he was 17 and was a father at 18. He lately married a second wife, and now, at the age 80, is happy with a second child. There is sixty-two years' difference in the ages of the two children.

MRS. MARY I. JAMES was badly burned about the face and hands, recently, at Walton, by the explosion of a can containing powder, which she threw into an open stove, supposing it empty. Two small children of a neighbor were also burned—one, it is supposed, fatally.

THE Central Law School is being arranged for in Indianapolis. It is regularly incorporated, with Byron K. Elliott, Charles P. Jacobs, and ex-Reporter James B. Black as regular professors, with several lecturers of ability from the bar of the State. Prospects are flattering. The term begins Oct. 1.

HENRY FREDERICK, aged 15, while hunting near his home at Mauckport, set his gun against a small tree. A gust of wind shook the tree, causing the gun to fall and discharge, the load taking effect in the lad's hip and arm, inflicting a dangerous wound.

IN removing the remains of the Fontz family from an abandoned grave-yard a few miles southwest of Richmond, workmen discovered the body of David Fontz, one of the oldest settlers of the county, in a perfect state of petrifaction, the change from flesh to stone being complete.

HENRY P. BROKAW, SR., died at Terre Haute, the other night, of general debility, in the 83d year of his age. He was one of the original pioneers of that part of the West. Coming from his home in New Jersey in 1816, he became a successful merchant, a citizen of integrity, and a high officer in Masonry.

THE Directors of the North Lake and River Association of Northern Indiana have concluded to locate at Syracuse, on the shore of the Nine-Mile lake. The objects of the association are for horticultural purposes and the scientific propagation and cultivation of fish, promotion of literary attainments and cultivation of physical and mental health.

GEORGE P. HOOVER, who has been starving himself to death for the last three months, died last week. Mr. Hoover was a wealthy farmer living five miles northwest of Hagerstown. His wife died less than a year ago, and he married again, some four months after, a grass-widow, in direct violation of a well-known law of the "Dunkard" Church, of which he was a prominent member; he was turned out of church, and violently opposed in his course by his children, all of which seemed to prey upon his mind until he became deranged, laboring under the aberration that everything was poisoned, and refused to eat or drink. Sufficient, however, was forced down him to maintain life until his system gradually went down.

Behold the King.

He loved her as his own soul, and he called on last Sunday at her residence on South B. street to put a $250 engagement ring on her finger.

"Can we sail down the stream of time, pet, in the same boat?"

"Yes, George, down to the shoreless sea of eternity, and beyond in the mystic spirit-land, our souls shall still entwine, and——. Oh, my, there he goes now?" and the young girl, tearing herself from George's arms, rushed to the window and looked out longingly for several minutes.

"What's the attraction?" asked the young man, somewhat annoyed.

"He's just too sweet for anything," murmured the maiden, too much absorbed to hear George's voice. Then he got up and looked out, and saw the endman of the minstrel troupe passing along on the other side of the street, and, fully understanding the situation, he calmly sat down and waited for the show to pass.—Virginia (Nev.) Chronicle.

Strawberries.

On the threshold of summer nature proffers us this, her virgin fruit. Let me not be afraid of overpraising it, but probe and probe for words to hint its surprising virtues. We may well celebrate it with festivals and music. It has that indescribable quality of all first things—that shy, uncloying, provoking, barbed sweetness. It is born of the copious dews, the fragrant nights, the tender skies, the plentiful rains of the early season. It is the product of liquid May, touched by the June sun. It has the tartness, the briskness, the unruliness of spring and the aroma and intensity of summer.

Then the delight of "picking" wild berries! It is one of the fragrant memories of boyhood. You stoop low. You part away the grass and the daisies, and would lay bare the inmost secrets of the meadow. Everything is yet tender and succulent; the very air is bright and new; the warm breath of the meadow comes up in your face; to your knees you are in a sea of clover; from your knees up you are in a sea of solar light and warmth. Now you are prostrate like a swimmer; then like a devotee before a shrine, your rosary strung with luscious berries; anon you are a grazing Nebuchadnezzar or an artist taking an inverted view of the landscape.

Then the delight, in the abstract and in the concrete, of strolling and lounging about the June meadows; of lying in pickle for half a day or more in this pastoral sea, laved by the great tide, shone upon by the virile sun, drenched to the very marrow of your being with the warm and wooing influences of the young summer!—Locusts and Wild Honey.

A Miser's End.

Marvin Banning, of Hadlyme, a miser and a hermit, died recently, aged 74, and he is said to have starved himself to death. Having early developed habits of industry, shrewdness and rigid economy, he accumulated an ample fortune before reaching the age of 50. He said he never had time to look for a wife, and he lived alone, his diet for the past ten years being raw pork and hard bread. Sometimes he denied himself food and fire for long periods in the coldest weather, and many supposed he was really very poor. When he was dying, however, he told his attendant that treasures were concealed in and about his house, and since then several bags of silver and gold, aggregating $3,000, have been found in a barrel of butternuts in the garret, while a box containing gold and silver and several thousand dollars' worth of United States and other bonds was unearthed in the cellar. Banning was a shareholder in the Saybrook National Bank and a large depositor in several savings banks, but the amount of his property is not known. As he left no will, it all goes to his sister, a Mrs. Wright, of Deep River, who is in very needy circumstances.—New Haven (Ct.) Palladium.

The Enchanted Pin.

Some tricks in "Parlor Magic" printed in juvenile publications are very amusing, as well as very simple, "The Enchanted Pin," for instance. To perform this trick you take a common brass pin, such as a man sometimes uses to fasten his shirt-collar when a rear button flies off. To satisfy your audience that the pin doesn't contain a false bottom, let them have it in their hands to inspect. This will convince them that there is no deception about it. Now, bend the pin in two places—first, about one-third from the head, and second, the same distance from the point, so that the business end will project upward. Again show the pin to your audience, in order to satisfy them that it is the same pin, only bent—bent on mischief. Now, place the pin on a hard-bottomed chair, and, when a late visitor enters, invite him to sit on the chair. The effect will be magical. If the ceiling is not more than ten feet from the floor, the probabilities are that the man will arise so spontaneously that his head will make a dent in it. This innocent little trick never fails to amuse an audience, and if such amusements received more encouragement in the domestic circle there would be fewer poems written, asking "Where is my boy to-night?"—Norristown Herald.

The Jews Behind the Plow.

The Farmers' Review is rather enthusiastic over the statement that the Jews are establishing agricultural colonies in the West and South. The enthusiasm is a little premature, though the scheme seems to be generally approved. The Review predicts for Jewish agriculture in America within the present century a success that shall be a marvel of agricultural history. "With the Hebrews once fairly enlisted, we shall see farming prosecuted as a business with a thoroughness and success heretofore unknown, either abroad or at home."

IT was Beau Brummel who said that the finest perfume of the toilet was the perfume of clean linen. There is one city in the United States where there is clean linen galore; that is Troy, N. Y. It is the great shirt-manufacturing city of the country. It has forty firms, which pay $1,829,880 for wages, to 11,719 persons, and $2,000,000 for rent, machinery, and material. In return they receive $5,292,000 for nothing but collars, cuffs, and shirts. Troy, it is claimed, makes three-fourths of all the cuffs and collars used in the world.

IT is not definitely known whether Gen. Grant will return home this fall or wait till next spring.

AUBURN, INDIANA, JULY 17, 1879.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

Another invoice of six hundred Mormons arrived in New York from Europe on the 9th inst.

◆

The South Bend Herald of last week, very gracefully, and justly, sits down upon Senator Winterbotham. The sooner the democracy of Indiana sheds such scabs the better.

◆

Advices from Memphis and other places in the south indicate that the yellow fever excitement is abating. No new cases have been reported at Memphis since the 10th inst. People are returning to the city and business is reviving.

◆

A certain independent-greenback-no-party newspaper, down in the 11th district, contained an editorial last week intimating that the editors might be induced to adopt republican principles, if the "necessary" encouragement is offered before the next campaign.

◆

A Washington dispatch says: "The amount for the Ohio campaign fund collected in the treasury building alone has reached $5,000. An agent of the committee was on hand on pay day to receive these voluntary contributions. The few who refused to pay are under investigation."

If there is a democratic newspaper in the state published by an ex-Union soldier, we don't know it. There may be such a thing, but if so we have never heard of it.—Sullivan Union.

Here's one.—Bloomington Courier.

Here's another.—Hendricks County Democrat.

And here's another.

If Mr. Hendricks were a wise man, he would consider one vice presidency in the hand worth two presidencies in the bush.—Courier-Journal.

If Mr. Waterson were a wise man, he would consider himself the obstinate ass that he is reputed to be by the western democracy. Henri evidently considers $100,000 in the hand worth more than Tilden's chances for the presidency.

◆

Ben. Harrison had concluded not to accept an appointment on the Mississippi river commission, but on the receipt of a telegram from Hayes not to resign, and being informed that the Commission is to go on a junketing tour to Europe, Benny has decided to hold on, and go abroad at the expense of the government, and at the same time draw his little salary of $5,000 per annum, as a member of the commission.

◆

The state elections this year will be: Kentucky, August 4, state officers and Legislature; Californa, September 3, state and judicial officers, four congressmen and legislature; Ohio and Iowa, October 7, state officers in part, and legislature; Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Wisconsin, November 3. Governors are elected in all the states named except Mississippi, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin.

◆

Henri Waterson, in speaking of Mr. Hendricks, says; "He may be the means of defeating Mr. Tilden. He may be the means of defeating his party."

If to defeat Tilden in his efforts to secure the democratic nomination is to defeat the democratic party, then we presume we are to understand that Tilden controls the destiny of that party. Is Tilden to be a dictator? if so the sooner his defeat is accomplished the better, and the man who brings about that defeat, will deserve the thanks of the party and the country.

On the 13th of June, A. Conover and Joseph Houser forged a draft on the Third National Bank of New York for $325, which was presented at, and paid by, the First National Bank of Bryan, Ohio. A requisition from the governor of Ohio was placed in the hands of Sheriff Leas, of this county, for the arrest of the guilty parties. The sheriff proceeded to Kendallville on the 13th of this month, and arrested Joseph Houser and Oscar Blair, supposing Blair to be Conover. The prisoners were brought to this county and tried. Blair was acquitted, and Houser was bound over and is now in jail at Bryan.

The New York Sun of the 14th inst. suggests that "it is rather surprising that Gen. Winfield S. Hancock is not brought forward more conspicuously as a democratic candidate for president. And adds that "there are many strong points in his favor. As a soldier and a citizen Gen. Hancock is without reproach. He is said to be personally popular with the many thousands who have served under him. It is not unlikely that before the nomination he will be a good deal more talked about than he is at present." Gen. Hancock was a soldier of unquestioned bravery and courage, he is a statesman of great ability, and would make a strong candidate for vice president on the next democratic ticket. The west demands a western man for the head of the ticket.

The Auburn Courier has hoisted the name of Thomas A. Hendricks for president in 1880. Thomas has been on the fence so long that he can't run, consequently the Courier will be compelled to substitute some other name.—Adams County Union.

That is only R. H. Weamer's "independent" political opinion. It is very evident that friend Weamer has not "been on the fence" long enough to publish a newspaper on the independent political principle; it takes an expert rider to do that successfully.

In the treasury department proper, at Washington city, there are about three thousand clerks employed; a number of them are veterans who served in the Union army. How agreeable it must be for these old soldiers to be subject to political blackmail to the tune of $10 to $20 each, for the purpose of electing stay-at-home Charley Foster, governor of Ohio, and defeating their old comrades Major-General Thomas A. Ewing and Brigadier-General Americus V. Rice. Oh, how the republicans do love (?) the soldiers!

* * * With the exception of the COURIER, all the county papers are converted to sound financial doctrine; and even the latter paper, at times, exhibits signs of being under conviction.—Waterloo Press.

If the Press advocates any particular financial doctrine, or if the editor of that paper has any settled opinion of his own upon the questions of finance, the people would no doubt be glad to know what that opinion is, inasmuch as the Press claims to be the "only original" representative of republican ideas in DeKalb county. The lesser lights, viz: Republican, Record and Herald, anxiously await the manifesto.

◆

In Sandusky, Ohio, they had a "big blow out" on the fourth. Addresses were made by Garfield, Gov. Bishop, Charley Foster and Gen. Ewing. The latter was the only one of all the speakers who had the bad taste to refer to politics; and as might be expected, his remarks are not doing him as much good as he anticipated. — Waterloo Press.

Doesn't the Press know that Garfield was the orator of the day? that he delivered his oration before any of the others spoke? that by a preconcerted arrangement between Garfield and Foster, the former, not being a candidate, took occasion to refer to the political status of the country, warning the people against state rights, and predicting another war, etc.? that Gen. Ewing in his speech simply alluded to the statements made by Garfield? If our worthy cotemporary read the speeches alluded to, he certainly knows the facts will not justify his criticism. Gen. Ewing's speech is acknowledged, even by his opponents, to be a masterly effort, showing ability and statesmanship, while that of Foster consisted principally of farm statistics and figures garbled from agricultural reports. Garfield is the man who had the bad taste to refer to politics, and he no doubt regretted his mistake before Gen. Ewing got through with him.

HE HAS ENTERED THE PORTALS.

Death of Wm. Allen, Ex-Governor of Ohio.

That distinguished statesman and patriot, surrendered to the dread conquerer of all, at half-past one o'clock, last Friday morning at his home near Chillicothe, Ohio. His death was sudden. An Enquirer corespondent says:

"He was down to the city on Monday, and talked to his friends as usual, evincing a lively interest in what was going on in the busy world, socially, commercially and politically. There had been nothing to indicate a serious failure of health or vigor. His physical condition during the past winter was not, perhaps, as good as it had been during the fall and summer; but there was nothing of a character to excite apprehension. The first approach of his final illness was perhaps between nine and ten o'clock Thursday morning, when he complained of feeling a slight faintness. But this passed off and was only momentary.

HE ATE A HEARTY DINNER AT NOON, after which he went upstairs and retired for his usual afternoon nap. About four o'clock he came down, complained of not feeling well, and said he had not slept any while in his room. Going out upon the porch he soon became sick at the stomach.

The extremities were cold, pulse slow, with pains in the arm. Under treatment—chloroform, laudanum and warm drinks being administered — the cold stage gradually gave place to the febrile stage; the extremities became warm, skin more natural, breathing better and pains relieved. By midnight the fever seemed to subside and he rested well. His condition remained favorable until one o'clock, when quinine was administered. There had been nothing to indicate that

THERE WAS A CRISIS PENDING.

In this apparent state of affairs, at half past one o'clock the governor got out of bed, and walked to his chair. In the act of sitting down, instantly, and without a struggle or a moan,

HE SANK INTO HIS CHAIR—DEAD!"

Thus another faithful and distinguished public servant of great ability and integrity, has passed over the shore. Gov. Allen has represented his people in both branches of congress, and more recently as governor of the great state of Ohio. His whole life was pure and honest and the legacy of his character and his history, which his family, his state and his country share in common, is one of which they need not be ashamed.

Iowa is as highly favored as Mississippi. If the latter has the Okolona States, the former has the Lamars, Plymouth county, Sentinel. The Iowa fanatic gets ahead of the Okolona fool. While the one slashes around generally, the other confines himself almost exclusively to the "nigger," and here is what he says upon that interesting subject:

"While the amiable idiocy that prevailed in congress during the reconstruction days was at its height, the nigger was enfranchised.

He was invested with the ballot on the pretty theory that he was a man and a brother, with an infusion of sand in his make up.

It was given him on the school girl notion that affection for the party that gave him his freedom would make him its perpetual instrument.

But the nigger is less serviceable to the republican party as a voter than he was as a slave.

He needs too much coddling—too much protection.

He can only vote the republican ticket when surrounded by a cordon of republican bayonets.

There is no grit in him.

There is more voting energy and party strength in a dozen raw Irishmen than in a thousand well-fed niggers.

There is not an ounce of stalwartism in a ton of nigger.

The more nigger the less strength.

As a slave, the picturesque misery of the nigger was an unfailing armory of party weapons—as a freeman there is no romance in him—cowardice is not romantic.

All over the south he is throwing his ballot for rebels and traitors, when he votes at all.

He is too cowardly to vote his convictions, or too stupid to have convictions.

When the stalwarts get into power in 1880, he must either be disfranchised or compelled to vote right."

The free nigger is a fraud."

We conclude that the Iowa lunatic is not in favor of the exodus, and that he has not subscribed a nickel to make that republican state a paradise for the colored men of the south. If Barnum or some other showman could get possession of these two monstrosities they might be turned to profitable account. —State Sentinel.

Badly Injured.

A. J. Carmer, a well-known farmer, living about two miles from town, was seriously, though perhaps not fatally, injured at his residence last Saturday night at about ten o'clock. It appears that he had been to town that evening, and on arriving home went out to the barn for the purpose of putting up a team which his wife had been using. Upon entering the stable, as he tells it, he saw a man standing at the oat-bin, at sight of whom he immediately started for the door; but further than this he is unable to state. He was found a short distance from the door, lying senseless on the ground in a pool of blood, a copious stream flowing from an ugly gash in the top of his head. Drs. Casebeer, Chamberlain and Matheny were called in to dress the wounds, and found an opening through the top and a little to the right of the scalp, the skull having been driven down on the brain. Mr. Carmer was immediately put under the influence of chloroform, and the doctors proceeded to examine the skull, fourteen pieces of which were removed, some quite large, leaving an open space of about 1½ by 2 inches. Terrible hemorrhages took place while the operation was being performed, but they were readily subdued under the skillful treatment of the doctors, and, up to the present writing, the unfortunate man was doing well.

Many theories have been advanced as to the manner in which he received his injuries, prominent among which are, that he was assaulted from behind by the man whom he claims to have seen in the barn, or that, in his fright upon emerging from the door, he fell and was kicked in the head by his horses. So little evidence can as yet be gleaned concerning it, that it is difficult to arrive at anything definite. If he recovers, however,—and appearances are now favorable,—the cause of the accident will be of little import to his relatives and friends.

BUTLER, IND., July 12, '79.

The soldiers of the late war met at Ballinger's Hall. A. F. Pinchin was chosen chairman and C. S. Stoy secretary; the chair stated the object of the meeting which was to decide the manner of attending the reunion to be held at Auburn, on the 19th and 20th of September next. Motion that we organize a soldiers' club, carried; motion that all soldiers record their names, giving regiment and rank, carried; motion that we assist in making the reunion a success, carried; motion that we organize as a company, carried; motion that we furnish music, carried; motion that we are in favor of a sham battle, carried; motion that we are in favor of camping out, carried; motion that we will assist financially, carried; motion that we adjourn, carried.

A. F. PINCHIN, Chairman.
C. S. STOY, Sec'y.

Immediately after adjournment the meeting was called to order for the purpose of organizing a soldiers club composed of the ex-soldiers of Wilmington and adjoining townships; motion that A. F. Pinchin be chairman, carried; motion that C. S. Stoy be secretary, carried; motion that D. D. Diehl, Isaac Daily and C. S. Stoy be a committee to draft resolutions for the government of the association, carried; motion that all present be a committee to solicit members to join the club, carried; motion that the chair appoint an executive committee, carried, the chair apointed J. D. Woods, John Madden and H. H. Capp executive committee; motion that we meet one week from this evening, at Ballinger's hall, Butler, Ind., carried; motion that the proceedings of the meeting be published in the Butler and Auburn papers, carried. The following are the names of soldiers present who joined the association.

TUTT'S PILLS

INDORSED BY PHYSICIANS, CLERGYMEN, AND THE AFFLICTED EVERYWHERE.

THE GREATEST MEDICAL TRIUMPH OF THE AGE.

TUTT'S PILLS CURE SICK HEADACHE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE DYSPEPSIA.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE CONSTIPATION.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE PILES.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE FEVER AND AGUE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE BILIOUS COLIC.
TUTT'S PILLS Cure KIDNEY Complaint.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE TORPID LIVER.
TUTT'S PILLS IMPART APPETITE.

DR. TUTT has succeeded in combining in these pills the heretofore antagonistic qualities of a STRENGTHENING PURGATIVE, and a PURIFYING TONIC. Their first apparent effect is to increase the appetite by causing the food to properly assimilate. Thus the system is nourished, and by their tonic action on the digestive organs, regular and healthy evacuations are produced. The rapidity with which PERSONS TAKE ON FLESH while under the influence of these Pills, indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, melancholy, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system. Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents. Office 35 Murray Street, NEW YORK.

NOTICE.

Whereas the Board of Commissioners of De Kalb county, Indiana, at a special session, held on the 4th, day of July 1879, made an order establishing a county work house, as provided by an act of the general assembly of the state of Indiana, for the establishment of work houses &c. approved March 31st, 1879; and designating the county asylum, or poor farm, as such county work house. Therefore notice is hereby given that said county asylum or poor farm is now ready for occupancy and use as such.

The work is light and pleasant, and such as anyone can go right at. Those who are wise who see this notice will send us their address at once and see for themselves. Costly outfit and terms free. Now is the time. Those already at work are laying up large sums of money. Address, TRUE & CO., Augusta, Maine. 23-1y.

Portable Mulay Saw Mill,

With improvements recently made is unequaled as a neighborhood mill. It can be run by either steam or water power, and is especially adapted to the engines used for threshing.

It may be operated by either two or three men, and will cut as much lumber in proportion to the power and number of hands employed as mills of larger capacity.

It makes smooth and even lumber, leaves no [illegible] and will cut any sized log up to four feet in diameter. It may be transported from one locality to another and re-erected ready for sawing in from two to three days, and can be made profitable in localities where there is not sufficient timber to justify the erection of a large mill. Send for descriptive circular, price, etc., to CHANDLER & TAYLOR, Indianapolis, Ind.

Auburn Courier.

—Board the train for Pleasant Lake to-day.

—Houston delivers ice to any part of the city.

—For choice stock, go to Houston's meat market.

—Oh! for a huge refrigerator in the seat of our—county.

—Geo. Grund, by-the-way, has got back from Ft. Wayne.

—Go to Schaab, Beugnot & Co's. for choice family groceries.

—Those new linen pants of John Leasure's are real pretty.

—See those 25 cent suspenders at McQuiston & Ralston's. 28-3.

—When you buy meat at Houston's you always get what you want.

—The mite society at Mrs. Hollister's last evening was enjoyed by all.

—Fort Wayne is beside herself. She has a full-fledged female lawyer.

—Highest price paid for butter and eggs, at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's.

—For glass fruit cans and sealing wax, go to McQuiston & Ralston.

—S. U. Tarney and daughter, Miss Etta, visited Fort Wayne recently.

—A load of dry stove-wood, split fine, would be acceptable on subscription.

—A sweet temper is to the household what sunshine is to the trees and flowers.

—Summer clothing cheaper than ever before heard of, at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's.

—The new side-walk from the court-yard corner to the bank is a good one, and some more just like it are in demand.

—The county commissioners will meet in special session on the 11th day of August.

—Mrs. L. B. Harris returned Tuesday afternoon from a six weeks' visit to Chicago.

—Linen and alpaca coats and dusters, linen and white vests at McQuiston & Ralston's. 28-3.

—The crop of wheat now being harvested, is said to be the largest ever cut in DeKalb county.

—Salt cheaper than in any other town in Northern Indiana. $1.20 per bbl. at McQuiston & Ralston's. 28-3w.

—Mason's self sealing fruit cans, cheaper than ever sold, in this market, at McQuston & Ralston. 28-3w

—Cook Ford made a trip to Fort Wayne last week, and, like everybody else, he lost his umbrella.

—The millinery store of Mrs. A. J. Little, next door to the postoffice, is not kept open after supper.

—Table linens, towls, towlings, napkins, gloves, hosiery and embroideries, go to McQuistion & Ralston's. 28-3.

—Our correspondence from Newville was indavertently omitted last week. We will look out for it hereafter.

—McQuiston & Ralston, will close out all their fish, during the next two weeks. Now is the time to buy them.

—Mrs. Geo. Weamer, who had been rusticating for a week or so at the village of Angola, came home Saturday morning.

—Cheapest place on earth to buy dry-goods, clothing, groceries, hats and caps, notions, etc., is at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's.

—Fred. Clark has captivated a daisy up in Jackson, but the darling's papa doesn't know anything about it. Be cautious, Freddie.

—Those who desire to borrow money on first-class security, will do well to consult Thos. H. Sprott. See his card in another column.

—Henry McIntyre says he's sick, very sick, but the symptoms indicate, though rather late in the season, a severe attack of spring fever.

—Get a bargain, in one of those zephyr shawls. They will be sold without regard to former prices, at McQuiston & Ralston's. 28-3w.

—We are under obligations to Conductor Fitch, of the Saginaw road, for favors shown. He is a pleasant and courteous gentleman.

—This kind of weather, when the thermometer stands 95 above Cairo in the ice-box, tends to make one's spirits droop—wilt away—or wither, so to speak.

—Buy your dry-goods, clothing and groceries of Schaab, Beugnot & Co., as they can and will seel you goods cheaper than any other store in northern Indiana.

—Postmaster Rainier is rusticating in Nebraska this week. Gone out to look up some land that he traded for recently. He will be gone about three weeks.

—Miss Anna Wood, a very pleasing young lady, now of Port Huron, Mich., is again visiting her mother at this place, after an absence of over ten months.

—Billy Rainier was taken suddenly ill last Monday, at about noon, and was compelled to go home. His complaint was billous fever, and, though quite sick for a day or two, he is again on his pins and out, looking a little thinner, but wearing the same smile as of old.

—The hardware store of Vageding & Son, at Avilla, was burglarized by tramps last Saturday night. Loss, about $100 in cutlery and small change. No arrests.

—Frank Davenport, the west-side druggist, wins the first premium on a rat story. He caught a big one the other night, and it—but ask him about it yourself.

—McQuiston & Ralston will give special bargains in summer clothing for the next 30 days. They are BOUND to CLOSE OUT their stock to make room for FALL GOODS. 28-6.

—Charlie Emanuel puts on more agony with his new barouche than anybody. He sails around the boulevards like a bloated bond-holder, and smiles on all who pass him.

—Mrs. A. J. Little has in stock some of the finest ruches in the city, to which she would call the attention of ladies desiring anything in that line, or in millinery goods generally.

—It has been reported that T. C. Mays will shortly embark from St. Louis with a Pinafore troupe, and we learn for a fact that it is a fact. May he return loaded with lucre.

—Those parties to whom Marshal Scott lent shovels, for use on the gravel-train, and who have not returned them, are requested to do so at once. By so doing they will save trouble in the camp.

—Mrs. E. D. Hartman is still in a very low condition at her home on south Main street. As soon as practicable her husband will accompany her to Chicago, there to consult celebrated physicians.

—Johnnie McIntyre, stand up and give an account of yourself! Where in all creation were you on Tuesday evening, the 15th, when that gay little crowd of young folks called to give you a surprise-party?

—"The road to fortune is through printer's ink."—P. T. Barnum.

The experience of P. T. Barnum ought to satisfy people that advertising pays. Advertise in the COURIER, and reap a rich reward.

—A new hard wood side-walk has been laid in front of the stores of W. J. Austin and Jno. L. Davis. A good example, and it would incite blessings from many a foot-sore pedestrian if others would follow suit.

—"Success depends upon a liberal patronage of printing offices."—John Jacob Astor.

John Jacob was a good boy; he understood his business. If he was in DeKalb county now he would be advertising in the COURIER.

—Hank Little, typo, job-printer, pressman and general bossee at the Republican office, says it's telling on him; he's wasting away. Stay right with it, old man, and you'll yet reap a harvest in the sweet bye-and-bye.

—A lage stock of dry-goods, bought before the advance in the eastern markets, at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's., which will be sold 15 per cent. lower than all competition. Call and examine goods and prices before buying.

—An excursion to Detroit, over the Saginaw road, $2.25 for the round trip, will pass through Auburn Wednesday, July 30, at 5:55 a. m. It will be a grand affair Tickets good for three days.

—Sam. Pommert, our jolly but emaciated barber, has sworn off; that is, his wrestling days are o'er. Little Elza Shaffer got the best of him, the other day, and now Sam says he'll shoot the first man that lays his hands on him.

—We see daily occurrences of brutality and cruelty to those animals which are man's most faithful helpers—particularly horses; and, as a rule, he who shows kindness toward animals will exhibit the same characteristics to his fellow-men.

—By an unpardonable oversight we neglected to mention last week that G. P. Smith, of the junction, spent his fourth at Fort Wayne. He also spent the fifth and sixth and several dollars, arriving home early on the morning of the seventh.

—Thos. E. Ahern, proprietor of the north side lunch and sample room, opposite the Saginaw and Muncie depots, at Fort Wayne, is prepared to furnish his customers with the best of everything in his line. Travelers will do well to call on him.

—Mrs. Dr. Smithson was in Auburn yesterday, looking after her truant husband and his "sister." She failed to find them.—Fort Wayne Sentinel. Our reporter says that they have "folded their tents," as it were, and skipped for greener pastures.

—We also forgot to mention that Charlie Pommert fourthed at Fort Wayne. We saw him taking a "lemonade" up Calhoun street, in the evening, and as a matter of course he was the center of attraction. He had a damsel swinging on each handle.

—Amos Miller, from Hicksville, a brother of Bruce Miller of the firm of Miller & Getrost, was in the city last week, helping the above-named firm to invoice. He was also in Kline d to invoice dress-maker's goods in the evening. No reference to allusions.

—Mr. John Brandon made his annual visit to the COURIER office to pay his subscription last Monday. Mr. Brandon is almost eighty-one years old, he gets about without much effort, has his second sight and hears as well as ever, which is unusual with persons of his age. He is still strong in the democratic faith.

—We would respectfully state to our Spencerville correspondent that our rates for local advertising, of whatever nature and by whomsoever sent, are five cents a line. The other suggestions sent with your items will receive prompt attention.

—Miss Celia Rank has relinquished her place in the millinery establishment of H. H. Stamets, and is now visiting the family of H. C. Bell. We are sorry to learn that she intends to return home after making a brief visit among friends with whom she has associated here.

Cy. Boughan and wife, now of East St. Louis, came home but a short time ago, at the instance of the doctor, who recommended a change of climate for their little baby, aged two years. The change was of no avail, however, as its little soul passed in to the spirit land Saturday.

—From our old friend and associate, Will. Covey, of the Bentonville (Ark.) Advance, we last week received the startling announcement that the Fourth of July this year, in Arkansaw, was visible on the 4th of this month! "Rackensack" must be off the track this year.

—The DeKalb county lawyers excurt at Rome City to-day. Gentle reader, pause and reflect how much heart-rending and conscientious lying it will take to replenish the funds thus lavishly expended. A rise in whisky is expected. —Fort Wayne Sentinel, July 10.

"People who live in glass houses," etc., etc.

—A petition is in circulation for the appointment of Henry McIntyre as deputy oil-inspector, under the new law, for the counties of DeKalb and Steuben. Henry is a worthy, straighforward young man, in every way capacitated for the position, and we hope he may secure it and get oiled all over.

—A rural gentleman (?) dropped into Billy Rainier's popular resort, a few days since, and wanted to borrow a pipe and some tobacco; said he had a match. Billy told him that he had some nice cigars, at only a nickel apiece, but the r. g. said cigars were "too rich for him," and passed out in search of other victims.

—Those who shake will rejoice to know that quinine is not to be taxed hereafter for the purpose of making Philadelphia manufacturers of the article millionaires. This act of justice to the unfortunate people who have chills and fever, and to all who need quinine, has been demanded for years, but the republican party was opposed to it.

—Lute Wright bought a fine hound pup, about two months ago, which he had in training for hunting and for which he paid $20; but the doggie is now in a happier hunting-ground, some unprincipled cuss having shot him last Saturday night. And now Lute is on the trail of "that feller."

—Since dispensing with our watchman, Geo. Durkee, the boys have taken matters all into their own hands, and the streets for a few nights past have been a perfect pandemonium. This we think is wrong, because, aside from the disturbance to people who are trying to entice Morpheus, it leaves the field open to burglars; and some of our merchants will doubtless soon realize this fact.

—While prowling around the Swineford house, a day or two since, in search of whom we might devour in the way of notable personages who were stoping there, we learned to our infinite surprise and satisfaction that, together with a number of others, Mr. Swineford himself was a regular boarder. He so stated to us, personally, and that's how we know it.

—W. J. Austin spent a few days at Wabash recently, returning Thursday of last week, and the boys put up a job on him. Every one of them who met him would ask "where he'd been and when he got back," and W. J. finally got on his ear; but now, when he meets a man, woman, or child, he just relates his little story without being asked, and then passes on.

—Up to yesterday (Wednesday) noon, Sherm. Hollister has fed, at his neat city restaurant on the west side of the square, eleven hundred and forty people, exclusive of his regular boarders, who number from ten to fourteen—or, including the writer, will average about nineteen—and all this since the beginning of court. We consider this a pretty good showing.

—The COURIER regrets exceedingly to announce the departure, to-day, of C. H. Hoyt, who has been amongst us in the drug business since February. He goes back to his old home and business in Liberty Center, Ohio, where his family now is, and will leave a number of friends to remember his gentlemanly dealings with all, as well as his pleasant countenance.

—Drs. Casebeer & Matheny last week purchased the entire drug-store of C. H. Hoyt, and it will hereafter be managed under the firm name of Casebeer & Matheny. These gentlemen are both practicing physicians and thorough busines men, well known to our citizens and countrymen, and we have no doubt but that their venture will prove a successful one.

—County Clerk Moss left yesterday for Chicago, whither he has gone partly on business and more especially to consult a physician in regard to his health, which is now much poorer than when he returned from his recent trip. He had a slight hemorrhage last Monday while coughing, and necessarily feels some concern about it. We trust he may be benefited by his trip.

—The Delphos Herald gets off the following; and it is just about as true to nature as any pen-picture could make it. Gaze on it: "Did you ever notice the poor chap that stands in the front picture of an almanac with fish and scorpions and bulls and twins, etc., around him? Did you notice that he was naked and had nothing in his stomach? Well, that poor fellow used to edit a country paper and take his pay in 'I'll pay my subscription next week.'"

—The gravel-train last—let's see, was it Sunday or Monday? Well, anyway, a good force of hands turned out, under the supervision of Tom. Scott, and the train made three round trips to Pleasant-Lake, the result of which was thirty-six car-loads of fine gravel. As before stated, it is to be put on some of our streets, and it will be a decided improvement. Many of the boys who went along had only pleasure for their object, and from all accounts they got it.

—Our handsome young friend, Brown Matheny, has "made up" his mind to "stick" to the printing business no longer; not because it "imposed" on him, or injured his "form," but because he has got a "fatter take," printermatically speaking. To put it in plain United States, however, he has quit the Republican office and is now rolling out pills and dishing up quinine at his father's new drug-store. Go in and see how easily he falls into the business.

—Hi. Weaver conceived the happy idea of removing the real-estate from his body and cooling his boiling blood, a few days since, and with this aim in view he repaired to the "swimmin' hole" just south of the Eel River depot. But alas! poor Hiram! While enjoying the waters of the limpid stream and battling with the tide, a frisky colt in the adjoining field got away with his pants, thus compelling Hi. to await the shadows of evening or sneak home by a circuitous route. He chose the latter, and says he never saw so many females promenading around that end of town before.

—There are a few young men in this village who have fallen into the disgraceful habit of making ungentlemanly remarks concerning girls and ladies who are passing by, some of which are often heard by the ladies themselves. Men who are guilty of this, display a lack of refinement in an eminent degree and are utterly devoid of the principles which mark the true gentleman, ignorant of the common courtesies that are due to a lady. Some comment, as a lady passes, is quite natural; but the loud tone of voice in which they are made, and the character of most of them, is abominable.

—In commenting on a little item in a recent number of the COURIER, relative to the prize offered by the Wabash Courier, the Valparaiso Messenger speaks its little piece thusly:

"The proposition of the Wabash Courier covers the whole state of Indiana. Will the junior of the Auburn COURIER compete for the prize? We are ruled out."

Well, no; scarcely. Considering that we already receive the Wabash Courier gratuitously, it would be a foolish expenditure of—time; and besides, Bro. Zimmerman, we, like you, are "ruled out." However, if we had been afforded the opportunities you have, and had done as nobly in such contests, (as you have—not), we'd give it up. Now let up. Selah.

—We have before us the premium list of the North-Eastern Indiana Agricultural Association, for 1879. The fair will be held at Waterloo, on the 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10 days of October. The premiums offered are liberal in all the departments. One of the most important is the premium on road-work, which is as follows:

Best worked road district........ 25.00
Second best................. 15.00

Entries in this class must be made by the supervisor of the district, previous to August 1. A committee will then be appointed to inspect the road, make report and award the premium. In making the award, the committee will take into consideration the previous condition of the road, quality of the soil, and the skill and judgment displayed in the construction.

The premium awarded will be expended in the district receiving it for its further improvement. Incorporated towns are excluded from competition in this class.

This premium applies to DeKalb county only.

—Same old story—fifteen-ball pool, beer and trouble—and the circumstances in the bloody affray, as we get them from a COURIER reporter, are something like this: Conrad Beighler, of south Auburn, and a knocker from Knocktown, named Simmons, got infatuated last Monday in the mysteries of fifteen-ball pool, which, of itself, is applied externally and does no harm; but Conrad and his opponent got some internal invigoration in the way of several bowls of beer, and then they couldn't mix; some controversy arose, and Beighler got mad and placed his head rather abruptly against a beer-glass in the hands of Simmons, at which he kept bucking away until he could see stars, when he stated that he was no hog and that he had enough. Conrad is said to be a quiet, peaceable man, while Simmons is reported as a quarrelsome, notorious rowdy. If the latter has not already gone, he should be bounced.

Be sure to get the Genuine.

As there are Baking Powders sold in bulk for Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder, which is not his, be sure to get the genuine; which is put up in cans, securely labeled, and made only by Steele & Price, all of whose preparations are uniform and reliable. Buy it only in cans.

—J. Henry Breens created some stir in his neighborhood, a few days since, by firing off his little gun rather promiscuously and scaring several females until their hair was about to turn gray. He was promptly sat down upon by the sheriff, and is now in jail, and we learn from Deputy Clerk Harris that a certificate to adjudge him insane has been filed. Whether he is now insane or not, we are too busy to state; but he was certainly "a little off" the day he banged at the women with the shot-gun.

—We reserve to ourselves the right to make such changes in correspondents' items, or communications, as we deem advisable; and we think every one will see the propriety in this when told that only about one man in fifty, selected from the professions—such as physicians, lawyers, ministers, judges or professors—can furnish manuscript suitable for publication in a newspaper without some corrections, either in grammar, orthography, punctuation or capitalization. Yet so it is.

For Sale.

An extra No. 1 three-spring wagon, for sale at a bargain. Inquire of S. U. Tarney. 27 & 29.

Universally Admired.

Dr. Price's Unique Perfumes are now universally admired. It is truly remarkable to see how like the freshly gathered flowers are all of Dr. Price's odors for the handkerchief. They are the fashionable perfumes. They are the sweetest and most lasting odors in the market.

Money to Loan on Farm Property.

In sums of $300,00 to 10,000 for 5 years at 8 per cent. secured by first mortgage in improved farms worth 3 times the amount of loan exclusive of buildings. No commission charged. Payments of 100,00 dollars or over accepted at any time. Apply to

Like to Obtain.

No doubt the public would like to obtain what it requires at as cheap a rate as possible, and many times are induced to purchase cheap articles, which are in reality the dearest in the end. Dr. Price's Special Flavoring Extracts costs a few cents more, yet they are the cheapest, for they require much less in quantity.

Insurance Law.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND, July, 1879.

EDITORS AUBURN COURIER:—The auditor would respectfully inform you that the Indiana Legislature at its last session directed the Governor to appoint some one to act with the Attorney General and the Auditor of State as an Insurance Commissioner. The Governor accordingly appointed Hon. John A. Finch to that position. The duty of such commissioner is to codify the present laws of the State relating to the business of Insurance, and to prepare a draft of a new law covering the entire subject.

In the preparation of the new law, the commission will endeavor to learn the views of the people interested as policy-holders, and of the officers and the agents of the companies. Any suggestion upon the present law, or upon any supposed necessity for a new law will receive careful consideration. The commission will feel under obligations for anything that may be offered. Any thing in this way pertinent to the work of the commission, may be sent to Hon. John A. Finch who will act as chairman of the commission. M. D. MANSON,
Auditor State of Indiana.

Spencerville.

—A. Kinsey, dealer in furniture, and undertaker, has got out some new and very nobby cards.

—The Whitney family, from Boston, gave one of their entertainments at this place on the night of the fourth. It was a decided success.

—Messrs. Baltz and Scott, will give a grand bowery dance at this place on next Friday, the 18th. There will be a fantastic parade in the evening. Let everybody come.

—Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Taylor, (nee Miss Esther Emanuel) of St. Louis are now visiting their old home. Their many friends are invited to call, as they will return to St. Louis in the course of a week or two.

—Mr. J. A. Provines has purchased a nobby "secretary" for the postoffice.

—Mr. Sumner has put up a very neat sign on his harness shop.

—Mite socials will soon be in order.

—Mr. Cahill's hardware store and the Masonic lodge are now building.

—It is now proposed to incorporate Spencerville, and a petition will be gotten up to that effect. We are decidedly in favor of this move.

—S. Warner's barber shop has undergone some essential repairs. It is newly lathed and plastered, and has a nice new floor.

THE OWL-CRITIC.

A LESSON TO FAULT-FINDERS.

"Who stuffed that white owl?" No one spoke in the shop;
The barber was busy, and he couldn't stop;
The customers, waiting their turns, were all reading
The Daily, the Herald, the Post, little heeding
The young man who blurted out such a blunt question;
Not one raised a head, or even made a suggestion;
And the barber kept on shaving.

"Don't you see, Mister Brown,"
Cried the youth with a frown,
"How wrong the whole thing is,
How preposterous each wing is,
How flattened the head is, how jammed down the neck is—
In short, the whole owl, what an ignorant wreck 'tis!
I make no apology;
I've learned owl-eology.
I've passed days and nights in a hundred collections,
And can not be blinded to any deflections
Arising from unskillful fingers that fail
To stuff a bird right, from his beak to his tail.
Mister Brown! Mister Brown!
Do take that bird down,
Or you'll soon be the laughing-stock all over town!"
And the barber kept on shaving.

"I've studied owls,
And other night fowls,
And I tell you
What I know to be true!
An owl cannot roost
With his limbs so unloosed;
No owl in the world
Ever had his claws curled,
Ever had his legs slanted,
Ever had his bill canted,
Ever had his neck screwed
Into that attitude.
He can't do it, because
'Tis against all bird laws.
Anatomy teaches,
Ornithology preaches,
An owl has a toe
That can't turn out so!
I've made the white owl my study for years;
And to see such a job almost moves me to tears!
Mister Brown, I'm amazed
You should be so gone crazed
As to put up a bird
In that posture absurd!
To look on that owl really brings on a dizziness;
The man who stuffed him don't half know his business!"
And the barber kept on shaving.

"Examine those eyes.
I'm filled with surprise
Taxidermists should pass
Off on you such poor glass;
So unnatural they seem
They'd make Audubon scream,
And John Burroughs laugh
To encounter such chaff.
Do take that bird down;
Have him stuffed again, Brown!"
And the barber kept on shaving.

"With some sawdust and bark
I could stuff in the dark
An owl better than that.
I could make an old hat
Look more like an owl
Than that horrid fowl,
Stuck up there so stiff, like a side of coarse leather.
In fact, about him there's not one natural feather."

Just then, with a wink and a sly normal lurch,
The owl, very gravely, got down from his perch,
Walked round, and regarded his fault-finding critic
(Who thought he was stuffed) with a glance analytic,
And then fairly hooted, as if he should say:
"Your learning's at fault this time, anyway;
Don't waste it again on a live bird, I pray.
I'm an owl; you're another. Sir Critic, good-day!"
And the barber kept on shaving.

THE CANDIDATE'S TREAT.

If any stranger had a desire to see the old-time Kentuckians in their true colors he should have happened in on one of their county-seat or cross-road gatherings, either on "court day," upon occasion of a stump speech from some favorite candidate, or at a "military muster." While the most untutored of young girls in short linsey frocks would be tempting the passing crowd with an exhibition of ginger-cakes, with the quaint invitation, "Gentlemens, won't you buy some cakeses?" a boisterous crowd would perhaps be gathered around and intensely interested in a horse swap—always one of the marked events, especially if either steed had any pretensions as a "quarter-nag." Another part of the public square would probably be occupied with a foot-race or a wrestle, while throughout the day a "ring" would be formed now and then, from which, after a noise for a while like the tramping of wild horses, two or three pugnacious chaps would emerge much the "worse for wear;" at least with black eyes and a bloody proboscis, perhaps part of an ear missing, the victorious party to be marched off to the nearest tavern or doggery, to celebrate his success by a "treat all around."

But a "candidate's treat" was indeed an event. With a whisky-barrel rolled out into an open space, the head knocked in, and the announcement loudly made that it was "Col. Jack Crafty's treat," the hunting-shirt crowd would gather quickly around; and, as the two or three floating gourds could be seen in full play, ladling out the fiery stuff, some sharp and provident chaps might be seen—at least they have been accused of it—slyly laying in a future supply at the candidate's expense; they first filling their mouths with a plentiful charge, and then quietly stepping on one side to spout the contents of their cheeks into long, straight-handled gourds, concealed under their hunting-shirts!

Dealing with the subject of "treats," I don't know whether a rather remarkable exploit and some very sharp practice in this line, accredited to the renowned Davy Crockett, has ever gotten into print or not: but, at any rate, I hear of it somehow, and it is too characteristic of the broad and practical joking of that period not to preserve. As related, Davy, on one occasion, found himself in a close place in a political canvass, and at a cross-roads grocery, surrounded by a lot of thirsty partisans and "nary a red" to treat them with. But then, as now, coon-skins, if not a legal tender, were at any rate current at a certain valuation; and, having one, he handed it over to the dispenser of "tangle-foot" for what it would command in the way of drinks. The man, after making a draught upon the barrel of whisky behind the counter, threw the coon-skin up into the loft through a hole over his head, and Davy, noticing it, sent one of his handy followers behind the edifice, who, with a crooked stick, fished it out from between the logs, tendering it for another set of drinks. One coon-skin is so like another that, in the haste of a driving business, and not too much light in his den, the grocery-keeper kept it going in a lively manner all the afternoon until his barrel was quite drained; and, after the crowd had departed, and he got a chance to count up his profits, expecting to find quite a pile of coon-skins in the loft, he found to his grief that the one coon-skin represented almost the sum total. But the worst of it was, perhaps, he never heard the last of it as a first-rate trick; for even a population as given to jollification as was that in the line indicated never recognized cross-road grocery-keepers as public benefactors.

I must not omit the story told of one of these noted frequenters of "treats" and "musters" who, on his way to the village one day, was commissioned by a neighbor to get him a pint of spirits of turpentine. The veteran toper had had his frolic fairly out, and was reeling home as best he might, when night, and the stupor caused by whisky, and cold together overtook him, and he was constrained to quietly lie down by the side of the road, and, as it happened, in the edge of a small puddle of water. It was a frosty night in November, and there he slept; and, as his friends afterward declared, would probably have perished, for he was frozen in and they had to break a thin crust of ice to get his clothing loose in the morning, only that, in his craving for something more to "drink," he happened to get a swig at the bottle of turpentine in fumbling about his pockets toward morning, and that, warming him up, saved his life, when probably the dose would have burned out the stomach of a better man.

Another one of this same stamp, only that he was an ex-member of the Legislature, took a notion that he must have a wife—the object of his serious attention living in the next county, where, at suitable intervals, the old bachelor Colonel had paid his devoirs with the most earnest purpose possible to "settle down and quit all his wild ways."

The affianced was an elderly spinster, accredited with not a little acidity of temper; but, as the Colonel himself was conscious of being thoroughly good-natured, he thought, despite the warnings of his friends, that he could venture on the somewhat-hazardous enterprise.

Finally, with the lady's consent gained, and the day set for the ceremony which was to make the two happy for life, the Colonel set out on his way thither—he was on horseback, of course—and stopped over night at the country tavern where I happened to be sojourning for a few days. Proud of his success, he couldn't conceal his exultation, but proceeded to tell us "all about it," and the next morning he disappeared on his gallant bay in the edge of the forest, his fine stovepipe hat and superb black suit fairly shining as his steed pranced out of view.

A few days afterwards, the Colonel reappeared alone, dusty, chop-fallen, fairly shabby in appearance; one coat-tail had almost parted with its fellow, but had been sewed on with white thread, and big stitches at that; his ping hat looked as if he had been standing on his head in it in a thunderstorm; his nose looked like a boiled beet, and he was chewing tobacco furiously. As he rode up to the tavern door, a sympathizing crowd gathered round, and the old 'Squire, who kept the hostelry, anxious to know what had happened, fired at the Colonel the query—"Whether he'd been struck by lightning?"

"Worsen't that, 'Squire, I reckon," was the despondent reply. "I only got drunk, had a fight, and lost one day on the road to Coonville and so got there the day after the time fixed; and—dog on the woman—she kicked me! flung me higher'n a kite. She's harder on a chap than the banks; for you know, 'Squire, they always give 'three days' grace.' And the worst of it is, I'm out of pocket for this 'ere suit of store-clothes."

Civilized Indians.

There is no doubt that the five civilized tribes—the Cherokees, Choctaws, Creeks, Chickasaws and Seminoles—have advanced more steadfastly than was expected of them. A lady correspondent who recently visited the Indian Territory says that she was surprised at the number of educated men, women and children. In the male and female seminaries of the Cherokees she found young gentlemen studying Latin and Greek and the higher mathematics, and beautiful young girls, who were fine musicians, good French and German scholars, and who, in point of intellect, grace, beauty and refinement of manner, would be an adornment to any society. There is a freedman's school near Muscogee, supported by the Creeks. Negroes who were the slaves of the Creeks send their children to it. Just beyond is an Indian school, and the correspondent says that the contrast is wonderful—the Creeks being infinitely superior. This picture, given in the New York Graphic, of so fine an Indian prospect, is marred by the Kansas City Times. The Times interviewed the Rev. G. W. Ingalls, who is just from the Territory. Mr. Ingalls says that, from a general rendezvous in Arkansas up into Kansas and down into Texas, hundreds of white men have of late begun to prey upon the heretofore happy tribes. Horse-stealing is the special mission of these men, but they often go into Atoko, McAlister and Muscogee at night and commit alarming depredations. He thinks that the Government should bounce the whole kit of Marshals and put in men not leagued with the desperadoes.

Proof Spirit.

Proof spirit was so called because in the prescientific age it was customary to levy duty on spirits by rough-and-ready process called the "proof," which was conducted as follows: A small heap of gunpowder was wetted with the spirit to be tested, and the wet spirit was then ignited. If the spirit was strong, the gunpowder became ignited, and flashed off very soon after the spirit was lighted; but if the spirit was weak, the water left behind it wetted the gunpowder, so that it did not catch fire. A careful investigation of the true constitution of the spirit showed that the weakest spirit capable of igniting the powder had the following composition by weight: alcohol, 49.24; water, 50.76; and the specific gravity of 0.920. This is known as proof spirit. Spirits either stronger or weaker than this are spoken of as overproof or underproof. Thus, a spirit was said to be 25 per cent. overproof if 100 measures of it would, on dilution, yield 125 measures of proof spirit. It was underproof if 100 measures only contained seventy-five measures of proof spirit. In these days, though the terms are still retained, the estimates are made by the hydrometer.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

New and Interesting Statistics in Regard to Present Local Indebtedness of the United States.

The July number of the Princeton Review contains an article, "Local Government—at Home and Abroad," in which some new and important statistics are given in regard to local debt and taxation in the United States. The writer, Mr. Robert P. Porter, of Chicago, has made two inquiries—one to find out the debt of 130 cities now and ten years ago; the second to find out the entire local debt of the United States. Here is the first investigation, which he brings down to 1876:

	1876.	1866.
Municipal debt 130 cities	$644,378,663	$221,312,000
Assessed value property of same	6,175,082,158	3,451,619,281
Annual taxat'n same	112,711,275	64,080,098
Population of same	8,576,249	5,919,914

The aggregate municipal indebtedness of these cities, as will be seen, was in 1876 over 10 per cent. of the assessed value of property; whereas in 1866 it was only 6 per cent., showing an increase of indebtedness of 4 per cent. of the valuation of property. It will be seen that debt increased upward of $420,000,000 in the decennial period ending 1876, a yearly increase of $42,000,000. The percentage of increase is about as follows: Debt, 200 per cent.; taxation, 83 per cent.; valuation, 75 per cent., and population only 33 per cent. In 1870, the census reports give the total indebtedness of the United States as follows: State debts, $352,866,698; county debts, $187,555,540; town and city debts, $352,866,698; total, $868,676,758. Leaving out the State debts, there remains $515,810,000, which was then put down as the total county, town and city debt of the country. Mr. Porter's investigation shows conclusively that the municipal debt alone, to say nothing about town and county debt, of 130 cities, representing a population of only 8,576,249, exceeded in 1876, by $128,568,603, the county, town and city indebtedness of the entire country in 1870; or, still more appalling, that in six years the indebtedness of these cities had exceeded by $316,134,143 the bonded and floating indebtedness of all the towns and cities in the United States.

The second investigation he brings down to the close of 1878, but has only been able to obtain complete returns from the following States:

	Total Local Debt, 1878.	Total Local Debt, 1870.
New York	$244,079,859	$127,599,090
Massachusetts	89,091,156	40,940,657
Illinois	51,811,091	37,300,938
Ohio	41,305,840	12,809,916
Wisconsin	9,931,158	3,651,475
Minnesota	5,272,230	2,436,795
Kansas	18,473,197	4,848,976
Missouri	35,843,185	29,048,805
Connecticut	17,151,337	9,518,006
Georgia	26,130,351	15,209,918
Rhode Island	12,259,564	3,025,149
Total	$548,789,528	$286,179,060

Debt, then, in these eleven States has almost doubled, but the following table shows that the value of property has increased at no such ratio:

State.	Total Assessed Valuation of Property, 1878.	Total Assessed Valuation of Property, 1870.
New York	$2,755,740,318	$1,967,001,178
Massachusetts	1,568,938,210	1,591,983,112
Illinois	1,201,183,110	482,899,515
Ohio	1,574,645,763	1,167,731,697
Wisconsin	423,596,290	333,209,838
Minnesota	220,930,689	84,135,332
Kansas	137,896,643	92,125,969
Missouri	614,726,228	556,129,969
Connecticut	344,406,977	425,433,237
Georgia	235,659,530	227,219,519
Rhode Island	258,062,818	244,278,854
Total	$9,353,606,515	$7,172,148,179

In comparing the two sets of figures it is seen that the debts of 130 cities jumped from $221,312,000, in 1866, to $644,378,663 in 1876. On the other hand, by adding in county and township debts, the increase is from $286,179,060 to $548,789,528—the one at a rate of 200 per cent. the other less than 100 per cent.

In addition to the above returns the paper presents incomplete returns from Pennsylvania, aggregating a debt of $87,329,180; New Jersey, $36,502,722; Maryland, $34,000,000; Louisiana, $20,000,000, and Kentucky, $12,000,000. According to this calculation, which is as nearly correct as possible until after the census of 1880 is taken, the total local debt of the country at the close of the year 1878 was $1,051,106,112, exclusive of State debts.

REMEDY.

The Princeton Review article covers about twenty-five pages, and points out the different systems of local government now in operation in the various States of the Union, and indicates the general characteristics of these types. It also gathers up in one compact whole the work of the various commissions appointed by different States to devise plans for the better government of American cities. While Mr. Porter admits the force of the proposition of the New York commission in regard to the property qualifications of voters, he brings forward interesting figures from the city of Philadelphia to show that, in the second great city of the country, such a provision would not work to advantage. The city of Philadelphia contained, August, 1876, 143,936 dwellings. It is estimated that 5,000 have been built since that time, so that in round numbers Philadelphia now contains 150,000 dwellings. The number of votes cast at the last municipal election was 127,520, and it is not claimed that the city contains more than 135,000 voters. It will thus be seen that the great bulk of voters are either owners of houses or tenants paying rents. The provision recommended by the New York commission, requiring the payment of an annual rental of $250 as a qualification for voting, would exclude a large and reputable class of citizens, while it would not exclude the tenants of low grog-shops and other disreputable establishments, who, in most cases, pay a higher rent.

In this way all the propositions now before the different State Legislatures of the United States are carefully examined, and their advantages and disadvantages pointed out. In no one of these plans does the reviewer see a remedy. Thorough reform needs time and patience, and the working out of natural laws. New experiments and tinkering only aggravate the disease. A return to the pure self-government of the Revolution might help. The self-government of to-day hates trouble and loves self-indulgence—hence the deplorable condition of our cities. Self-government is a hard task-master. It expects every man to do his duty, not optionally, but as a public obligation. Let this be done and our "large cities with the banded masses of unsympathetic foreign-born, with universal suffrage as the basis power, will no longer drift without helm through tides and rocks, by negations through imbecility and corruption, but an intelligent, manly, and affirmative administration would become practical."

A Crystallized Woman.

Another very remarkable instance, we are informed, says an English paper, has just come to light as to the preserving or petrifying effects of nitrate of soda. A well-known and influential city firm, who have very extensive connections with South American planters, miners, etc., have recently received from Peru a curiosity in the shape of what may be termed a a crystallized female body, which, as their correspondents advise them, was some time since discovered by a set of miners at Pisagua, in that country, completely imbedded in one of the great nitrate of soda deposits peculiar to the district. The body is described as having the appearance of a petrified mummy, and is stated to be in a singular state of preservation. This curiosity has already been seen by several of our best-known naturalists and analysts, and it is believed that the woman, who apparently was of middle age, must have perished either through accident or design at a remote period of the past, probably, as some even go so far as to say, two or three thousand years ago. That her death was violent there is little room to doubt, inasmuch as when discovered the body was in a recumbent position, partly on the side, with chest slightly crushed, as if through a severe fall, the legs drawn up, and the fingers and toes contracted. The hair is in a most perfect state, and maintains its contact with the skull in a peculiarly astonishing manner, and the mouth is open, displaying the teeth and tongue, which are plainly visible. The extremities are remarkably small and perfect—even the nails being in their respective places. The hair on the head, we should add, appears to be plaited in a very peculiar manner, and is of great length and thickness, though in some parts detached, owing to part of the skull having been destroyed. The curiosity at present is at the offices of the firm who have imported it from South America, but we understand that arrangements are being made that it shall be publicly shown at the Westminster Aquarium at an early date.

The Sand Blast.

Among the wonderful and useful inventions of the times is the common sand blast. Suppose you desire to letter a piece of marble for a gravestone; you cover the stone with a sheet of wax no thicker than a wafer, then cut in the wax the name, date, etc., leaving the marble exposed. Now pass it under the blast, and the wax will not be injured at all, but the sand will cut letters deep into the stone.

Or, if you desire raised letters, a flower, or other emblem, cut the letters, flowers, etc., in wax, and stick them upon the stone; then pass the stone under the blast, and the sand will cut it away. Remove the wax, and you have the raised letters.

Take a piece of French plate glass, say two feet by six, and cover it with fine lace; pass it under the blast, and not a thread of the lace will be injured, but the sand will cut deep into the glass wherever it is not covered by the lace. Now remove the lace and you have every delicate and beautiful figure raised upon the glass.

In this way beautiful figures of all kinds are cut in glass, and at a small expense. The workmen can hold their hands under the blast without harm, even when it is rapidly cutting away the hardest glass, iron or stone, but they must look out for finger-nails, for they will be whittled off right hastily.

If they put on steel thimbles to protect the nails it will do little good, for the sand will soon whittle them away; but if they wrap a piece of soft cotton around them they are safe. You will at once see the philosophy of it. The sand whittles away and destroys any hard substance, even glass, but does not affect substances that are soft and yielding, like wax, cotton or fine lace, or even the human hand.—Portland Argus.

"Check" Never Pays.

The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, nor is it the man with the largest mouth who gets the most favors in the world. Yesterday forenoon a very quiet stranger entered a real estate office on Griswold street and softly asked if he could use a blotting-pad for a moment. One was handed him and he sat down to a table, looked around, and said:

"Ah! thanks; but have you pen and ink?"

They were furnished him. He tried the pen on the pad, shook the ink around and modestly continued:

"If you could spare a sheet of paper?"

A sheet was handed him. He wrote a brief letter, folded it up, and whispered:

"I shall have to beg an envelope of you."

An envelope was passed over, and when he had directed it he looked all over the table, under the table, up to the ceiling, and inquired:

"You couldn't lend me a stamp, could you?"

A 3-center was handed out, and when it had been licked on, the stranger rose and started out, saying:

"As you have no office-boy, I suppose I shall have to take this letter to the office myself."—Detroit Free Press.

Deadly Jewels.

In all ages jewels of price have been a ready incentive to crime, but not a few cases are on record in which they have been the agent of the crime, instead of its cause. Cæsar Borgia possessed a ring, with a sharp-edged setting, which would occasionally scratch the hand of some guest whom he was greeting with special cordiality; and no one who received this compliment was ever known to survive it more than a day or two. A similar fatality attended a celebrated decoration much used by two or three of the Russian Czars. When clasped around the recipient's neck, its point was apt to puncture the skin, if awkwardly handled, and death speedily followed. One of the native Princes of India, when about to fall into the hands of his enemies, swallowed a sharp-pointed diamond, which caused instant death by cutting a vein in his throat. A diamond in the possession of a noble French family, which was said to have caused the death of all its owners in turn, put the climax to its malign influence by ultimately forming part of the famous necklace which played so fatal a part in the history of Marie Antoinette.

HOME DOCTOR.

BURNS AND SCALDS.

These injuries are not essentially different in their nature, the difference being simply that one is caused by moist heat, and the other by dry. They are often so slight as to be of little moment, but occasionally they are so severe as to require the most prompt and energetic treatment.

When a burn does not break the skin, it is of little consequence, and should be treated like any ordinary inflammation. Keeping cold water upon the part until the smarting ceases, and then the application of glycerine, or, if this is not tolerated, common lard rubbed upon the burned surface, is all the treatment necessary. If blisters are formed, they should be pricked to let out the water, and then a poultice of slippery elm bark and water, or a mixture of beeswax and lard melted together and spread upon a cloth, may be applied with great comfort to the patient.

But if the injury is more extensive, covering over a large surface, and especially if the tissues of the skin are destroyed, the difficulty is necessarily distressing and often dangerous. In such cases the nervous system may become affected, so that the patient will have severe chills, the pulse may be small, frequent and feeble, the breathing becomes oppressed, there is a tendency to delirium, and death may occur as a result of the shock to the nervous system. In general, if one limb is entirely involved, or a greater part of the trunk, the prospect of recovery is small.

The treatment in the severest cases should be both constitutional and local. The shock to the nervous system is best relieved by a prolonged hot full bath. The patient should be immersed in water at 100 degrees, save the injured part, and the temperature of the water should be increased until it cannot be tolerated any hotter. The bath should be continued until the nervous prostration is relieved, or from thirty to forty minutes.

If the burns are deep, a good application is a thick solution of gum arabic, which may be prepared in a few minutes by dissolving the gum in hot water. After it is applied, it may be dusted over with powder, and so the tissues underneath will be completely protected. Another good remedy is collodion and sweet oil, in the proportion of one part of the oil to two parts of collodion. This may be kept in an air-tight bottle for any length of time, and may be applied by a camel's-hair brush. It immediately forms a firm covering to the exposed surfaces, and so takes the place of the destroyed cuticle. If these substances are not at hand, common dry flour may be dusted upon the injured part to the depth of half an inch or so. All liniments to "draw out the fire" are worse than useless, for there is no fire there to draw out. It should be borne in mind that these, as well as all other injuries, are healed by the action of the vital forces alone, and all that can be done from without is to protect the exposed surface from the irritating influence of the atmosphere, and to balance the general circulation, should it become disturbed. People in general trust too much to external agencies, and too little to the only true source of healing, the vitality within.

CUTS AND SORES.

1. Accidental cuts from knives, cutting tools, scythes, etc., are more likely to occur on the face and limbs than on the body. All that is requisite in general is to bring the parts together as accurately as possible, and to bind them up; this is usually done by adhesive plaster, when the cut ceases to bleed. Nothing is so good for this purpose as paper previously washed over on one side with thick gum water and then dried; when used, it is only to be wetted with the tongue. When the cut bleeds but little it is well to soak the part in warm water for a few minutes, or keep a wet cloth on it. This removes inflammation and pain, and also a tendency to fainting which a cut gives some persons. If the bleeding be too copious, dab the part with a rag wetted with creosote. 2. A good salve for sores is unsalted butter and grated carrots simmered well and strained clear. 3. To stop bleeding from wounds, an equal quantity of salt and flour, put on a cloth and applied to a wound, will stop bleeding. It may be left on for days or weeks. 4. The best application for any and all flesh-cuts and raw sores is gas-coal tar, which may be had at any gas works where gas is made from coal. A barrel of it, costing $2, has been in use at the Kirby homestead for ten years and is not half gone yet. Coal tar, when applied to a flesh-cut, shuts out the air and thus stops the smarting; it will also keep off the flies. It is very healing, and it is antiseptic—that is, cleansing—and will prevent the growth of proud flesh.

France Richer than Great Britain.

According to late estimates, Great Britain is not the wealthiest country on earth, as has been believed. France values her private property, real and personal, at $43,110,600,000, and her navy, palaces, public buildings and other public property, excepting highways, at $1,475,000,000, making $44,585,600,000. The aggregate estimate for England, Scotland and Ireland, without reckoning public highways, is $42,500,000,000. Real estate in France greatly exceeds in area that of England, while in the latter there is a great excess of personal property over the former.

BIRDIE'S BATH.

Down beside the river,
In a quiet path,
Did you e'er see birdie
Take his morning bath?

First he takes a drink,
Then he takes another,
Hops and looks about
Waiting for his brother,

On the branch above him,
Looking very wise
Down upon this birdie,
Blinking both his eyes.

Now he hops again,
Then he flies around,
Takes another sip,
Whirls upon the ground,

Wades into the water,
Turns and lifts his eye
To make sure if any
One is waiting nigh.

Dropping now his bill,
He jerks the water quick
Over head and shoulders—
Quite a birdie's trick;

Opens, then, the feathers
Wide upon his breast,
Flirts the water through them,
As upon his crest;

Ducks under and then out
In such a dexterous way
That the clear, cool water
Down his back shall play—

Whirls and springs about
Quick as any flash,
And returns again
For another splash.

Once more on the bank,
Gives a little shiver,
Shaking out his feathers,
Making each one quiver,

Sways around a moment,
Like a passing breeze,
Then he flies away,
Up among the trees.

Crickets and Hogs.

A few weeks ago, from the north and northwest of this valley—Nevada—millions of crickets were coming in to devour and destroy the grain and grass our farmers expected to harvest this dry season. Nearly all the hogs in the valley have been got together, and are herded to meet the crickets. The hogs are getting the best of the fight, and fattening in their onward march.—*Paradise (Nev.) SABBATH READING.

This World Is All a Fleeting Show.

This world is all a fleeting show
For man's illusion given;
The smiles of joy, the tears of woe,
Deceitful shine, deceitful flow—
There's nothing true but heaven!

And false the light on glory's plume,
As fading hues of even;
And love and hope and beauty's bloom
Are blossoms gather'd for the tomb—
There's nothing bright but heaven!

Poor wanderers of a stormy day,
From wave to wave we're driven,
And fancy's flash and reason's ray
Serve but to light the troubled way—
There's nothing calm but heaven!

TOM MOORE.

The Creator.

SERMON BY PROF. DAVID SWING.

Although to most reflecting minds moments of doubt will come as to whether the world has any creator, yet these moments are very few in the lives of most persons. And these times are not so much moments as rapid instants, such as that division of the pendulum beat which shows a flash of lightning. There are involuntary states of mind which come at unexpected moments to hold us by a strange spell. Many persons, when standing on some pinnacle of rock or temple, feel suddenly some voice within saying, "Cast thyself headlong," and the foot steps back from a feeling of sudden helplessness. Many, not upon any such height, when in peace at home, experience the strange feeling of the suicide. And so instants will come when one doubts his sanity, and even doubts his real existence. Thus there are few reflecting minds to whom moments of involuntary atheism will not appear suddenly. All the proof of God suddenly fails, and, as upon a precipice the foot steps back under the awful spell of self-destruction, so at times the belief in a God fails, and then the heart shrinks with the chill of a coming annihilation. After one has estimated all these instants of blackness, one will easily see that they are but a small part of the whole lifetime; and, like lightning flashes, make up but a small part of the long summer of life. In the most days and months and years of most persons, God is ever around to receive reproach for our adversity and thanks for prosperity. When some piece of good fortune befalls even a wicked man, it is wonderful how he will confess that the Great Being has been merciful and good.

What more than all else holds the human race to the feeling that God is a reality, is that law of cause and effect located in the soul—a law which associates an intelligent cause with an intelligent effect. Religion is not simply the result of an instinct, but also of a formal argument, which leads the mind from a design inevitably to infer a designer. While we are all right in denominating religion as a sentiment, yet it is not wholly an appetite like that of hunger and thirst, but it is a sentiment which is continually reinforced by the dicta of logic. Man perceives the marvels of the earth and sky, the amazing adaptations and variations and decorations, and so full are these of wisdom that he inevitably infers that some mind made all this external world.

The effort was made many hundreds of years ago to deduce the universe from spontaneous action of matter, but all these many centuries since that effort have been able to find but few advocates of the theory. In a very hasty survey of the universe, one might find a delicate support for the thought that the worlds were made by star-dust, rolling itself together by attraction, but th moment one moves away from these generalities and passes into the details of earth, or of man, of man's mind and heart, or into the details of any part of the natural world, the idea that the universe was made by chemistry, or came by chance, all goes to nothingness. A single song-bird, a single laughing child, the speech, or eloquence, or poetry of manhood, the beauty of woman, come in to reduce to naught all our accident or chemistry. We are made such that we must seek an adequate cause.

Select a pink, or a rose, or a mocking-bird, and chance and chemistry could no more have produced one of these than they could have composed the plays of Shakspeare. Select a plant like the "morning glory," and then ask what chance or insensate chemistry would needs do to place in our world such a flowering vine. The power of rapid growth they would have to give it that it might in two months cover the doors and windows of the cottage; they would need so to instruct it that as the blossoms a few days old should die there would be new ones opening, so that no morning for two months need be without this matinee of color; they would be compelled to teach it to shut up its delicate cups by 10 o'clock, to keep fresh their vital moisture and their rare pigments; and then, above all, chemistry or chance would have to teach the "morning glory" how to make balls of seeds in the autumn and to hold them up high and dry through the winter, to sow them again in the spring. Instead of making a heaven full of such stars as Sirius and Jupiter, and our sun, chance or chemistry cannot make this poor man's creeping, blossoming vine, and teach it to blossom while the dew is on and make seeds for the next May.

Or take a little ball of fruit, for example the strawberry, and ask the chance of Lucretius or the naturalism of Huxley to produce it, and there is no language by which to express our despair over a supply for the table from these philosophic sources. These philosophers are a rare kind of food for the intellect, but ask their chance or "progression" to make for us a basket of oranges, or a bunch of grapes, and they ask us blushingly to accept their excuses and regrets.

It would seem that each cluster on the vine and each apple on the branch, which, besides being so marvelous to the sight and the taste, contain within themselves the seeds of another vine and tree, should render atheism impossible. That inherent force of which the scientists have said so much, must still be in the universe, and yet it is doing nothing in the present by the way of making strawberries and grapes and apples for our gardens and tables. If God made the universe, He would have the right to pause at any instant in the production of new forms of vegetable or animal life, but if the universe came from insensate agents, they cannot suspend action, but must be doing in the present what they are alleged to have done in the past. And, if the ancient oyster and monkey tended onward and upward, and became man, the modern oyster and ape should show some signs of the intention and effort to become men and women, orators and poets and statesmen. An oyster dare not lay aside his innate ambition.

Pass from the world of blossoms and fruits to the nest-building creatures, the birds, and here our atheism is rendered almost a moral insanity. The oriole builds its nest on such a slender twig that no serpent, or cat, or animal, or bird of prey can find a basis for acting against the contents of the little home. Nothing but the breeze can touch the eggs or little ones. The nest is built like the poor man's house—with door but no window, but it is lined with tapestry, for all the threads the wise birds can pick from old rags or steal from the dooryard are woven into that part of the home which is next to the little brood and away from the storm. When atheism tells us that there was a bioplasm once in the bottom of the ocean which developed upward until at last it had gold-colored wings, and built a nest, and lined it with stolen lace, we feel that atheism is making sport of our sense and is attempting to learn the limits of our gullibility. The house of the hornet and the cell of the honeybee are equally wonderful, and would tax to the utmost the constructive powers of accident or development.

It weighs heavily against any notion that the world is self-made, that in the historic period of 6,000 or 10,000 years the world has not shown us any specimen of this work. Our birds are not springing up out of this potential mud, but are "with wonderful unanimity coming forth from the blue, or speckled, or brown, or white eggs, and with amazing faithfulness our morning glories, and pinks, and dahlias are depending upon the seeds that were formed but of the blossoms of yesterday, and in 10,000 years nature has not made a new seed, or a flower without a seed. Now, a personal God can cease making flowers when He chooses, but it is the quality of a natural law or a chemical action that it cannot suspend its business. If our earth once created animals, it should be in that line of action still, and rivels of man should be coming along from oyster or ape.

Bill Arp on Dogs.

I knew that Harris had got hold of some sheep meat somewhere, for he had another violent paragraph against dogs the next morning. I can always tell when he has had mutton for dinner. It seems to affect his head, though I never did consider him mutton-headed. He is too dogmatic for that. Old Bows is dead, my loving and trusting friend, the defender of my children, the protector of my household in the dark and silent watches of the night. For thirteen years he has been fond and faithful, and now we feel like one of the family is dead. Bows was the best judge of human nature I ever saw. He knew an honest man and a gentleman by instinct. He never frightened a women or a child—he never went tearing down the front walk after anybody, but the very looks of him would mighty nigh skeer a nigger to death. When they had come to our house they begun to holler "hello" a quarter of a mile off. Bows loved to skeer 'em, he did. He had character and emotions. Having no tail to wag (for he was not curtailed) he did the best that he could and wagged where it ought to be. Bows was a dark brindle. He was a dog of ancestors. His father's name was Shylock, and his grandfather's name was Sheriff. They were all honorable dogs. I never knew him to run up and down a nabor's palings after the dog on the other side. He was above it—but he never dodged a responsibility. He has come in violent personal contact with other dogs a thousand times, more or less, and was never the bottom dog in the fight. And, then, what an honest voice he had. His bark was not on the C, but was a deep, short basso profundo. We have buried him on the brow of the hill where he used to sit and watch for tramps and stragglers. Slowly and sadly we laid him down. Talk about your sheep—I wouldn't have given him for a whole flock. Sheep are to eat and wear, but Bows was a friend. It's like comparing appetite with emotion—the animal with the spiritual. But I am done now. Let Harris press on his dog law. I've got nothin agin sheep—in fact, I like 'em. Ever since Mary had a little lamb I've thought kindly of sheep, and I am perfectly willin' to a law that will exterminate all houns and suck-egg pups and yaller dogs, and bench-leg fices. They are a reflection on Bowses memory.—Atlanta Constitution.

Informers Assassinated.

A Southern correspondent writes: "Pickens county, Ga., has had a bloody sensation, and the excitement caused by it is still high. The county has always been famous for illicit distillers, who live so close in the mountains that revenue officers have to employ native informants to enable them to make arrests. Two brothers named Poole had become famous for rendering such services and were objects of hatred to moonshiners for miles around. In spite of frequent warning they continued to guide Government detectives and report offenders. The elder brother was specially active, and some of his victims resolved on revenge. Sunday night a large mob, armed with guns and revolvers, proceeded to Poole's house and called him out. Poole came to the door, but showed fight. He emptied a revolver at the mob. His brother then rushed to his side, and was about to shoot when the mob fired a dreadful volley. The elder Poole fell headlong from several wounds, while his brother reeled and fell dead with his body full of bullets. The mob then fled, but Mrs. Poole says she recognized as the leader Mike Stoner, a well-known moonshiner. She has given the names of several others, for whom warrants are out. The county is in commotion over the murder."

TYPICAL OCCURRENCES.

A TOLEDO (Ohio) paper relates the following: During the storm yesterday morning, the house of Frederick Diel, one and a half miles east of New Riegle, was struck by lightning and badly damaged. Mrs. Diel was in the house at the time, and, by a strange freak of the lightning, nearly every bit of her clothing was torn from her body without injuring her in the least, save a slight shock received.

BIG snakes, graveyard serpents, form the summer sensations of the Ashford (Ct.) ruralists, and stories of reptiles from six to ten feet long are numerous. The sexton of a cemetery in the south part of the town, where snakes abound, tells how, when he was digging a grave recently, he broke into an old coffin and discovered a snake at least eighteen inches in circumference. His theory is that it found its way into the coffin and had grown so fast and become so large that it was unable to get out by the way it went in, and thus became a prisoner for life.

MR. WILSON, of Butler county, Ky., had a fearful and successful fight with a large snake a few days ago. He was working on a piece of new ground when the serpent sprung upon him and coiled about him. Mr. Wilson was at first almost paralyzed, but in a moment regained his composure sufficiently to grasp the enemy by its neck and choke it until it was forced to loosen its hold. He then took a hoe and killed the reptile. The snake measured six feet five inches in length, and was two and three-fourths inches in diameter in the largest part of its body.

THE Danbury (Ct.) News relates the following: "There was a heavy rainstorm on Tuesday night. On Wednesday morning an extraordinary spectacle was presented on the Long Ridge road, at the reservoir of the Bethel Water Company. The road and the banks thereof, for a distance of eighty rods, swarmed with young frogs. They were hardly an inch in length. They were in constant motion, and yet so immense in number as to be unable to get out of the way of passing teams. The ground, as far as the eye could reach, was covered with them. They fell in the rain Tuesday night."

AT the Brown street market in Philadelphia, an old Irish woman approached a fish stand, and appealed to the proprietor for help. He declined to give her anything. She moved away, but not out of the building. Unobserved, she went behind the stand, where a large tub covered with canvas attracted her attention. Cautiously lifting the cover, so as not to make any noise, she ran her hand into the tub, and then she yelled. The tub contained several snapping turtles, and one had caught hold of her fingers, causing much pain. "Och! Mister! may God bless you; take the crathur off, do, please," was her pleading remark to the owner of the snappers. It was found necessary to kill the turtle before the fingers could be liberated.

SOME days ago, Thomas Chancey, who lives near Big Indian creek, in Houston county, Ga., shouldered his rifle and went to the swamp hunting for squirrels. Soon after entering the swamp his dog treed a squirrel, and Chancey began looking for the game. While thus engaged he observed an ox feeding around near by, but did not apprehend any danger from him. While walking around the tree he was suddenly and unexpectedly attacked by the ox. He says the first thing he knew he found himself lifted into the ethereal regions on the horns of his oxship. He held on to his rifle, and the ox continued throwing him up and catching him as he descended, between his horns, until finally the hammer of the rifle came in contact with a bush, which discharged the gun and caused the stampede of the beast. Chancey had a narrow escape from death, as the ball from his rifle passed under his clothing and burnt the skin near a vital part of his body.

A Savage Outlaw.

Gen. Scott was the name of an Indian who during the last winter and spring hung about a camp in the Black Hills, near Deadwood city. He was an outlaw. No tribe would acknowledge him. A few weeks ago the General was suspected by the miners in the camp of several bold thefts that had occurred. One night guards were posted along the ravine at the edge of the camp. Shortly after midnight an object was seen crawling towards the water from the farther side. The guards fired. Next morning the General's left moccasin was picked up at the point of aim. That was the clew. All the miners in camp turned out as to a Fourth of July spree. Twenty-one men, well armed, started on the hunt. The General's trail was struck a half mile above the camp, among the timbered hills. One mile further the foremost miner, a man named Chalmers, felt the sting of Scott's first bullet as it plowed a furrow along his scalp. The miners saw that Scott had come hotly to bay under a ledge of rocks, and that he was game. The twenty men began to surround him, when, after firing three shots from a revolver, he flew across a valley, zigzagging his course to dodge the twenty balls that whistled after him. But in a moment he fell, struck in the leg. When he dropped he rolled into a sinkhole and was again at bay. His shouts of defiance echoed among the rocks. All at once he arose and, knowing his fate, hobbled towards his pursuers. At every step he fired a shot and took or dodged one. Charles Judson fell, mortally wounded. Even when the desperate savage went down his finger pressed the trigger again, sending a bullet into the clouds. The scalps of two white men were found in his camp.

Gored to Death.

A little son of the Rev. B. C. Spiller, of the Methodist church near here, met with a terrible death this forenoon. A man was hauling manure from the barnyard to the field with an ox-team, and, while he was in the rear of the wagon loading, the child went in front of the ox, having in his hand a large red handkerchief. The ox seeing this became maddened and dashed at the little fellow and gored him. The man ran to rescue the child from the infuriated animal, but before he reached him the ox broke and ran, trampling the child under his feet, and, turning suddenly in another direction, brought the child into the track of the cart-wheels, which passed over him and crushed him to death.—Richmond (Va.) paper.

OUR EXCHANGE MENAGERIE.

A YOUNG lady, Miss Caledonia Linton, Texas, residing on Cottonwood creek, while walking in the woods, met a large alligator. She got a rope, tied it around the alligator's neck, and dragged it two miles to her home. The brute came near striking her with his tail several times.

IN Cass county, Texas, while Mr. Babe Henderson was out on a hunt, his dogs roused a panther, which took to a tree. Babe, his gun being loaded with small shot, took deliberate aim, and shot both eyes of the panther out as the animal was preparing to spring down upon him. The panther measured six feet nine inches from tip to tip.

NEAR Howellsville, Warren county, Va., recently, a fisherman saw his cork disappear. On landing his prize it proved to be a large jug, having inside a fish much too large to be released through the mouth of the jug, and which had swallowed the hook of the fisherman. It is supposed the fish entered its queer home when it was small.

MR. WM. BARTLETT, who lives near Lumpkin, Ga., has a hen that has peculiar notions about laying eggs. She lays every day like most other hens, but every other egg is as large as a goose egg; the others are of ordinary size. One of the larger size weighs 3¼ ounces and measures 6¼ inches around the shortest circumference, and 7¼ the longest. The same hen laid eggs in the same manner last season.

THE Anthony (Kan.) Journal says: "We hear of a very warm-hearted, motherly hen down on Bluff creek. She is regularly brooding a litter of seven-pound puppies; she has to spread herself to do it, but she takes them all under her wing and tucks them in nicely. The youthful canines know and heed her gentle cluck. They get their victuals of their natural mother, but their love and attachment is most tender and affectionate toward adopted Mother Biddy."

A TERRIBLE pull at their net warned some shad-fishers, who were plying their vocation below Fort Delaware, N. Y., that they had something bigger than a shad to deal with. One of them barely saved himself from going over the side of the schooner. It took a dozen men to pull in the prize, which proved to be a turtle eight feet long, five feet wide, with a head twice as large as a man's, and room enough on its back for half a dozen cane-seat chairs. It attacked one of its captors, who stepped on it, and its weight was "something less than 800 pounds."

ABOUT ten years since Mr. J. M. Bennett, of Cumming, Ga., was, by legal process, declared to be a lunatic, but, being harmless and inoffensive, was not sent to the asylum. About three years ago an old gander took up with him, and would follow him wherever he went. In Mr. Bennett's rambles through the woods, or about the neighborhood, this faithful body-guard always attended him, as if to ward off all attacks upon its charge, and hissing at hogs or any animal they chanced to meet. Whenever the old man would stop to rest or lie down, the gander would sit down near by, and remain until the old man left. While walking along the road, if Bennett found a grain of corn, or anything that the gander could eat, he would pick it up and put it into his pocket until he rested, and then he would give it to his companion. Whenever the old man went into the house the gander would seem to be wild, and would make such a terrible noise that the attendants were obliged to let him in. Just as soon as the fowl saw its companion it would become perfectly quiet. A short time ago it became so troublesome at night, by trying to get into the house, where its master was, that they killed it.

Cemeteries.

The old system of cutting cemetery grounds into small lots surrounded by hedges, bids fair to pass away entirely. All over the country, the park landscape or lawn system is gaining favor. It consists in a series of plantations of shrubs and trees, so arranged that the effect of the entire cemetery, from the main drives, is that of an extensive park, all evidence of existing burial grounds being shut off by foliage. Of course, in this system, the hedge-and-fence monstrosity finds no place. Vaults or catacombs are excavated in the hillsides, and memorial buildings of all kinds erected in retired nooks. More land is required for this arrangement, but its attractive, rural character seems to commend it to all.

Building in St. John, N. B.

The amount of building that has been done in St. John, N. B., since the great fire there is shown in an elaborate article in the Globe, of that city. The two years give a total of 413 brick and stone buildings at a cost of $4,023,000, and 639 wooden buildings, at a cost of $891,602. Besides, there have been built in the city, outside the burnt districts, in 1878–'79, buildings valued at $100,000, and in 1877–'78 buildings at $92,000. The estimated total value of the buildings erected in the city during the two years would, therefore, be $5,106,602.

IN Hartford a vicious stallion belonging to the street railroad company—a full-blooded Morgan chestnut, 5 years old, with four white feet—needed shoeing. He got loose in the stable-yard, and when the foreman of the stables, John Crilly, tried to capture him, the stallion reared and sprung at him. Crilly jumped between his legs. Then the stallion came at him with flattened ears and open jaws. Crilly seized the stallion's tongue and twisted it, extorting a shrill cry of rage and pain. That ended the fight. Crilly didn't let go of the tongue until its owner was back in his stall and firmly secured.

FARM NOTES.

BUY for cash.

A WRITER in the London Garden finds that the cracking of pears is prevented by grafting more than one variety on the same stock. He is very positive about it.

THE carrot prefers a light, sandy loam of medium fertility. A good coat of manure applied to the soil the previous year will prove of advantage; but, if it is manured the same season, it should be with guano after the crop is up. For garden-culture the earliest crop should be sown as soon as the ground is fit to work. Late crops for winter use can be sown any time before the middle of June. The seed should be soaked a couple of days in water, and immediately afterward mixed with a small quantity of ashes or plaster. This will prevent the seed from adhering together, and it can then be sown more evenly. Sow in rows fifteen inches apart, and cover the seed with about half an inch of soil. Later, the young plants should be thinned to three inches apart in the row. Cultivate diligently, and remove all weeds from the rows. The carrot crop is one of those crops that are irrevocably damaged if the weeds are allowed to get the start. The Early Horn and Atringham are among the best varieties for cooking purposes.

COVERING GRAPEVINES.—In some localities the hardiest vines never need covering. But there are occasionally severe winters when even the most hardy are benefited by protection. Intense cold often blunts vitality when it does not destroy. At such times a vine which has been covered will open its leaves in spring before one which has been exposed has fairly swelled its buds. Many are deterred from covering their vines because they take a laborious way for doing it. They need not usually place earth upon them. It is often quite sufficient to prostrate them, holding them in place by sticks of stovewood, or with bricks, or with flat stones. An additional thin or partial covering with corn stalks will be useful in protecting from sharp winds and in holding the snow. Earth, if heavy and compact, tends to rot the buds if they have not ripened well, or if left on a few days too long in spring. Winter covering has another advantage. It renders late autumn pruning safe—an operation too often postponed till too late when left till spring.

IN selecting the site for your fruit garden be sure that the soil is naturally dry; if not, its drainage should be the first thing attended to. Trees will not long flourish with their roots in the cold, stagnant water. By draining, the air will have free access to the soil, its temperature will be thereby raised, and the feeding and growing properties of the roots will be stimulated to greater activity. The drains in an orchard should not be less than four feet if a fall of that depth can be secured. If the depth be less, the roots will be likely in a short time to choke them. Drainage is not all that is necessary in the preparation of the ground for the orchard. It should be thoroughly cultivated the year before planting—it should be ploughed deep, and, if possible, subsoiled. It should also be well manured with a root crop, that it may be mellow, fertile and free from weeds. Belgian carrots, or, better still, parsnips, are a good preparatory crop, their long roots penetrating deep into the earth, separating its compact particles and quickening the inert elements of fertility. The value of these crops gives sufficient remuneration for the expenses of improvement; and their culture and growth always tend to the improvement of the soil—not merely the surface, but a depth of from one to two feet.—Farmers' Advocate.

IT has been generally conceded that smut on corn-stalks, or that portion of the husks left hanging on the stalk, and which stock eat, is the cause of many deaths among cattle, when they are first turned among the stalks in the fall. Prof. Kedzie has recently been making some experiments to test the matter, and the result of the investigation appears in the last monthly report of the Kansas Board of Agriculture, as follows: "In accompanying this paper with a thorough analysis of the fungus, the accuracy of which was proved by closely-corresponding duplicate results, he says that, up to date of this analysis, there was but one on record—that of Dulong—which was never completed, and was not accepted as satisfactory. A characteristic result of Prof. Kedzie's analysis was the entire absence of starch in the smut, and no traces whatever of the poison which exists in ergot or spurred rye. He quotes the experiment of Dr. Gamgee, given in the report of Commissioner Capron in 1871, who fed forty-two pounds of smut to two healthy cows, mixed with corn-meal, three times daily, at the rate of three ounces at a time, afterward increased to six ounces. One cow was fed on wet, and the other on dry, food; the former gained in flesh, the latter lost; but they remained healthy. This experiment proves that smut is not an active poison, and Prof. Kedzie thinks that its bad effects, whatever they may be, are owing to its dry and indigestible condition, and absence of nutriment—the same results being produced by feeding animals on old, hard and dry stalks. Steamed or moistened, and mixed with an abundance of soft food, no harm could be feared. He objects to turning animals into a field of corn which has stood until dead ripe."

A Startling Opinion.

To the Editor of the New York Sun:

Various publications have appeared in different parts, particularly in the London papers, setting forth a proposed plan of flooding the Desert of Sahara, thereby making it an ocean or inland sea, by opening a canal or channel from the Atlantic ocean.

The depth of the desert below the level of the ocean is stated as 500 to 750 feet; the area in square miles is over 2,000,000; the average depth is not generally known, but suffice it to say that if such a project should be started, and not under the complete control of those in charge of the work, the earth could, and no doubt would, be thrown off its present balance, and the surface of all the waters to a certain extent would be changed in their level, which could be ascertained with certainty if the actual size and depth could be known; for "if every grain of sand removed alters the balance of the world," what would this great change do? It might cause the "end of the world," which, according to the prophecy of "Mother Shipton," will be in 1881. In this project all the world is interested.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

CRANBERRY JELLY.—Wash and pick over two quarts of cranberries, add one pint of cold water, and place on a quick fire in porcelain-lined saucepan; stir occasionally to prevent burning; when soft, mash through a colander, add one quart of sugar, boil ten minutes, and pour into fancy molds.

CHOCOLATE CREAM.—Mix the yelks of six eggs (strained) with two ounces powdered sugar and two ounces grated chocolate; add one pint of milk; set the mixture on the fire in a double saucepan, the inner one filled with hot water, and keep stirring till the cream thickens; dissolve in a little milk four sheets of best gelatine, add this to the cream, and strain it all into a bowl; put this over ice, stirring till the mixture begins to set; then add one pint of well-whipped cream; put a mold in the ice, pour in the cream, cover it with ice, and, when set, serve.

GERANIUMS TO KEEP OVER WINTER.—Geraniums, fuchsias, salvias and other plants that you may wish to keep over winter, without any care of them, may be taken up with a ball of earth attached to them and placed in one corner of your cellar, provided it is warm enough not to freeze potatoes; pack them close and bank the earth firmly about the roots. In January or February you can bring the fuchsias to the window, and they will form beautiful flowering plants in about six weeks' time.

FRUIT-EATING.—When fruit does harm it is because it is eaten at improper times, in improper quantities, or before it is ripened and fit for the human stomach. A distinguished physician has said that if his patients would make a practice of eating a couple of good oranges before breakfast, from February to June, his practice would be gone. The principal evil is that we do not eat enough fruit; that we injure its finer qualities with sugar; that we drown them in cream. We need the medical action of the pure fruit acids in our system, and their cooling, corrective influence.

TO FRY BEEF'S LIVER.—Cut the liver in slices about two-thirds of an inch thick; soak in cold water about quarter of an hour; have ready some butter in the spider; when hot, put in the liver; season with salt, pepper, and an onion chopped fine; dust a little flour over the top; cover tight to keep steam in as much as possible; add a little water while cooking, to keep from getting dry (do not let it burn); when brown, turn on the other side; put on a little more salt, pepper and flour; when done, take the liver out on a platter, put in about a teacup of sweet milk; if not thick enough, add a little more flour, wet with milk until you get it about the thickness of beef gravy; pour over the liver and serve. This is the Swedish way of cooking it.

HOME CONTRIVANCES.—I recently brightened up my sitting-room at a trifling cost. My carpet was nearly worn out. In the first place I turned the breadths and sewed over the carpet so as to make all the worn places come as nearly in the center of the room as possible. By cutting and contriving I managed this, having a fine array of holes and patches grouped together. I bought four yards of small figured ingrain carpet resembling drugget at 90 cents per yard. I cut this in halves, sewing the breadths together, which gave me a foundation two yards square. For a rug I bought eight yards and a half of carpet-bordering at 35 cents per yard, with which I bordered my square, giving me a bright, large rug, which I tacked down in the worn places in my carpet, covering a good part of the center of the room. My rug cost me $6.40, and my floor looked fresh and neat. I can assure you the effect was excellent.

Tea Culture in the South.

The result of the Southern tea-planting experiment has been quite successful. A correspondent, gossiping about the first crop of American tea, says that as early as 1860 the attempt to raise tea in the South was made. Then a large number of growing plants were sent to Georgia, North Carolina and South Carolina by the Agricultural Bureau. The war coming on, the plants were lost sight of, but grew wild. Last fall one of the firm of Gillett & Co., of Baltimore, made a trip through the South, at the instance of LeDuc, to ascertain if tea could be cultivated successfully in that section. As a result of this tour, a barrel of tea-leaves was sent to Baltimore last week from Georgia. The leaves had been plucked out of season, and, fermentation having set in, they were rendered useless. Of another barrel, received from South Carolina, one-third was in fair condition. Experiments were made with these. The leaves were put in wire sieves and steamed. They were then passed through a clothes-wringer to extract the tannic acid. The structure of the leaf was also destroyed by this process. No care was taken to retain the shape of the leaf, however, but the mass was put in an ordinary pan and dried. This process was productive of a delightful aroma and a leaf somewhat resembling the teas of India. From the leaves thus procured some tea was brewed. This was the first native-brewed tea of this country, and is said to have had a remarkably fine flavor.

ONE of the charges against a Seneca Falls (N. Y.) minister is that he hired a livery horse and wagon, was gone two days, swapped horses six different times, and came back to the stable with the same horse he took out, having made $100 by the operation. Such rare business capacity should have a wider field than the pulpit.

Found Floating on the Water.

The first thing which I distinctly remember was being held in my nurse's arms to look upon the ocean. I could not have been more than four years old, and the impression then made on my mind has never been effaced.

Of the scenes which immediately succeeded I have no recollection. All is a blank until the period when many persons, men, women and children, came to see me, taking my hands in their own and gazing earnestly into my eyes as they repeated, mournfully:

"How strange! Floating on the water."

I can recall the curious way in which they scrutinized me as they crowded around, the eager questioning of each other, the long recital that I did not understand, and which always ended with, "Found floating on the water."

Surrounded by comforts, by luxuries even, my wishes granted for the asking, kindness and love were so showered upon me during my first remembered years, that I neither thought nor cared who I was or how I came to be an object of such affectionate devotion.

I was sheltered as much as possible from every annoyance and from all vulgar observation by my beloved mother; and yet I often overheard her, to friends from a distance or to strangers, relating in low tones a long story, which somehow seemed to have reference to me, although evidently not intended for me to hear.

Methinks I this moment feel her kind hand as she smoothed my long curls, and hear her kinder voice utter those words, which, from being so often repeated, became stereotyped on my memory.

"When all was over, this dear child was found floating on the water."

As I became more advanced in years these words were less frequently heard. It was becoming an old story. The present, with its tangible realities, was crowding out the, to me, uncertain past. Faces and forms which hitherto had indistinctly haunted my imagination gradually faded. In my solitary musings they would sometimes stand out from the gathering oblivion like spectres; and like spectres instantly vanish if duty or pleasure recalled me to myself. I had heard of another Christine—my angel sister. My playthings had been hers. Dreams of her in her far-off home would come to me, as I reposed on her little cot, and Ponto kept guard over my slumbers. All these appeared to me like the details of a pleasant story, some portions of which were fresher and more recent than the rest because they had happened lately.

My mind matured with my years: and although those mystical words, "Found floating on the water," were not now heard, they were never forgotten. They had been to often repeated in my hearing to pass entirely out of my mind. Occasionally, too, the suspicion would arise that I had not always lived in A——; that at some time other and different scenes had surrounded me.

One evening, having heard these strange words again, resolving to penetrate their meaning, I went to my little bed wide awake, and waited the accustomed visit. My mother soon came. I heard her voice, and the words alone of the hymn fell on my ear. My mind was elsewhere. This night "The Happy Land" had no charms for me. I was "of the earth, earthy." I soon interrupted her with the inquiry:

"Mother, when shall I have a birthday?"

"When you are a little older," she replied.

"When shall I be 9?"

"Not for a great while;" and the hymn immediately went on again. But I was not to be put off thus.

"Did I ever float on the water?" I asked.

For a moment she was silent. I could contain myself no longer. Bursting into tears, I opened to her my heart. The circumstances which had taken place when I was the object of so much interest, my impressions, recollections and suspicions, confused as they were, were all narrated.

My mother saw at once that my mind was awake and must be satisfied—that the time had come for a revelation. Taking my hand, she said:

"Shall I tell my dear Christine a story? A true story?"

"Yes, mother," I replied; "tell a story about me—about me when I was a baby."

Wrapping around me her large shawl and taking me in her arms, she seated herself in an easy chair by the side of my bed. Of that time or of that place I have never lost sight. Methinks I see her now, so gentle, so quiet, just as she sat in that still room.

There, in the silence of early night, my dear mother related to me in simple and plain language, the calamity which at one fatal blow, had probably deprived me of both parents, and made me an orphan. Not a syllable did I lose then; not one has since been forgotten. During that short period, and even while he words were being drunk in I passed from babyhood to thoughtful, actual maturity.

In the spring of 18—, a noble steamer left the quay, Southampton, freighted with human life, with bright hopes and cloudless anticipations of coming pleasure. On the eve of that happy day the bright sun went down amid mirth and music and joy. On the morrow that same sun rose in his glory to behold sorrow and silence and death. In the calm midnight that shipload of sound sleepers were sadly aroused from their dreams of happiness by the awful cry of "Fire!"

At daylight a passing vessel came with swift wings to the rescue—alas! too late. All had perished with the exception of a single sailor, who miraculously clung to the burning timber—all save one little child. When all was over, the sailor and this child were found floating on the water. I needed not my mother's assurance to convince me who that child was.

She then told me of herself. Just before this calamity occurred God had taken away her husband and her only child—a dear daughter named Christine. Hearing of the little child whom both fire and waves had spared, she hastened at once to adopt me. Heaven seemed to have directed her, for on the gold clasp of my sleeve-tie was found a single name—the name of her own dear child, Christine.

A German clergyman, who was traveling, stopped at an inn much frequented by wags and jokers. The host, not being used to having a clergyman at his table, looked at him with surprise. The guests used all their artillery of wit upon him without eliciting a remark. The clergyman ate his dinner quietly, apparently without observing the gibes and sneers of his neighbors. One of them, at last in despair of his forbearance, said to him: "Well, I wonder at your patience! Have you not heard all that has been said to you?" "Oh, yes; but I am used to it. Do you know who I am?" "No, sir," "Well, I will inform you. I am chaplain of a lunatic asylum. Such remarks have no effect upon me."

Chips for the Housekeeper.

Use kerosene to clean unvarnished furniture.

Try benzine for removing paint spatters on window glass.

Blankets, and indeed flannels of any kind, should not be washed with soap which has rosin in it.

If cheese gets too dry to eat, grate it, pour on brandy and pack it into jars.

An excellent wax varnish for furniture is made by dissolving over a gentle heat, three ounces of wax in one quart of oil or turpentine.

Use waste paper for cleaning stoves, tinware, knives, spoons, windows, mirrors, lamp-chimneys, etc.

Dissolve four or five pounds of washing soda in boiling water and throw it down the kitchen sink, to prevent the pipes stopping up with greese, etc. Do this every few weeks.

Sweet-oil is recommended for polishing pianos. Apply with chamois skin and rub with different skins as they become saturated with the oil. It requires one or two hours hard rubbing to restore an instrument to its original lustre.—Rural New Yorker.

An Old-Time Bloody Duel.

Among the many bloody duels on record as having been fought by congressmen was one in which James Jackson, of Georgia—who had been and who was afterward a United States senator—was the challenged party. He was "an Englishman," like the hero of Pinafore, by birth, but he came to Savannah when a lad, studied law, was a leading Free Mason, and fought gallantly in the revolutionary war. He killed Lieutenant Governor Wells in 1770 in a duel, and was engaged in several other affairs of honor, until he finally determined to accept a challenge on such terms as would make it his last duel. So he prescribed as the terms that each party, armed with a double-barreled gun loaded with buckshot, and with a hunting-knife, should row himself in a skiff to designated points on opposite sides of the Savannah river. When the city clock struck 12 each party should start and row his skiff to a small island in the middle of the river, which was wooded and covered with underbrush. On arriving at the island each party was to moor his skiff, stand by it ten minutes, and then go about on the island till the meeting took place. The seconds waited on the main land until after 1 o'clock, when they heard three gun-shots and long and angry cries Then all was still. At daylight, as had been agreed upon, the seconds went to the island and found Jackson lying upon the ground, insensible from the loss of blood, and his antagonist lying across him dead. Jackson recovered, but would never relate his experience on that night, nor was he ever challenged again. He died in this city, while serving his second term as United States senator, March 19, 1806.

Imperialism in the United States.

[From the New York Herald.]

In the United States there was never any real danger to the permanence of the republic until the sycophants and flatterers of Gen. Grant conceived the idea of electing him a third time. If, against all our precedents and traditions, he could be elected thrice, he might be re-elected indefinitely by the aid of military glare and fame, and the American republic seemed for the first time in real danger. But this danger has been dispelled by the potency of an aroused public sentiment. Although France, our ancient and honored ally, is still disturbed by the aspirations of pertenders, we are exposed to no corresponding danger since the collapse of the great hippodrome performance which had been planned for escorting Gen. Grant across the continent from San Francisco.

Little Bob, the Cabin Boy.

There is not one of us, however young, says the Youth's Visitor, but he may do some good. Every little child can be useful. I will tell you how useful a little cabin boy was, who was sailing on a large ship over the wide sea.

It happened that on the voyage the sailors quarreled with the captain, who was so proud and overbearing that none would submit to him. This gave the captain so much trouble, and prayed so much on his spirits, that he became very ill; so ill as to be confined to his bed. None of the sailors cared for him; so there he lay very ill, and all alone. No one thought of speaking a kind word to the poor sick captain but Little Bob. His bible had taught him a lesson which the sailors knew nothing about. It had taught him to be kind to everybody, even those who had used him ill; so he stole softly to the captain's door, and knocked. "Who's there?" asked the captain in a very gruff voice. "It's Little Bob, sir; can I do anything for you?" "Go to your work, you scoundrel," cried the captain in an angry tone. "Don't come plaguing me."

"Little Bob stole away even more softly than he came, but his heart was not filled with an angry feeling. He pitied the captain even more than he had done before.

The next day he resolved to try again. He saw that the poor captain was not on deck, and again he went and knocked at the door. "Who's there?" "Captain, can I do anything for you to-day?" asked Little Bob. No, no; go away, said the captain. Bob was pleased that the captain did not speak in so harsh a voice as he did before, and he made up his mind to try again. Meantime the captain's heart grew warm toward the little fellow. He thought how differently he had acted from the unfeeling sailors, who had not once inquired for him all the time of his illness, and he determined that, if he came again he would let him in.

When Bob came next day, the captain said, "Come in." Bob walked in on tip-toe, and said, very tenderly, "Please, sir, can I do anything for you? Shall I make your bed, or get you a cup of coffee? I'll do it in a minute." "Well, Bob, you may, if you like," said the captain. Away ran Bob, and in a few minutes everything was ready, the coffee, and the hot toast, and he brought it on a tray to the captain's bedside. Bob always carried with him the bible in his pocket; and as he came in the room, the captain observed it.

"What book is that?" said he. "It is the book my mother gave me," said Bob; the nicest book you ever saw. "Can you read it Bob?" "Oh, yes, sir," said the boy, "and I should like to read it to you." "Aye, you may." said the captain; "as soon as I have finished my coffee you may begin." Bob cleared away the coffee, and sat himself down on a box beside the captain's bed, and opened on the history of Jesus, and read how he went about doing good: how he pitied the wretched, how he healed the sick and forgave their sins. The captain listened very attentively, and asked the boy to come again the next day.

From this time he came every day and instructed the poor captain in the knowledge of Jesus the Savior. He asked him many questions, and Bob knew how to answer them—thanks to his mother and to his Sunday-school.

One evening the captain said, "Leave me that book of yours, Bob; I should like to look at it myself." Bob willingly left it. The next morning he went as usual, and tapped at the cabin door. No answer came. Again he tapped, and louder. Still no answer. He opened the door and walked in. The captain was on his knees, and the bible was lying open on the chair before him. Bob spoke; still there was no answer. He came nearer, the captain never stirred. He looked; the captain was dead. He had died on his knees, praying over the bible. We trust that through the instructions of little Bob the had sought and found mercy at the hands of the Savior of sinners. Is there a little boy or a little girl, now reading this, who can not do as much as this poor cabin boy? "Go and do likewise."

Chips for the Children.

When a boy sees a nice, round, smooth stone lying on the ground, he always thinks it rather mean that there isn't a yellow dog in the vicinity.

"I wish I could mind God as my little dog minds me," said a little boy, looking thoughtfully on his shaggy friend; "he always looks so pleased to mind, and I don't.

The boy who won't roll up his pantlegs and take a run through a half an acre of nettles to show the girls that he isn't afraid, will make a poor husband for a woman who hears burglars every night.

'Marion,' he asked, in that style which a big brother assumes when patronizing a little sister; "Marion, do you know that, the earth turns round?" Of cos I does, answered Marion, resenting the imputation of ignorance; that's the reason I tumbles out of bed.

A little boy, hearing some one remark that nothing was quicker than thought, said; "I know something that is quicker than thought." "What is it Johnny?" asked his pa. "Whistling," said Johnny. "When I was in school, yesterday, I whistled before I thought; and got whipped for it, too."

Brainard's Musical World.

The July number of the Musical World is on our table filled with the usual large amount of choice new music and interesting musical reading. The music in this number consists of a splendid ballad by Sullivan, "If Doughty Deeds;" a pathetic song and chorus by Winchell, entitled "Mother Comes to Me in Dreams;" and Alf Wyman, the comedian, contributes a pretty character song, "Yakie und Leddie Louvise," as sung with great success in the new comedy, "Yakie." There is a beautiful selection, "The Dream of Love," romance for piano; a spirited piano duet, and a violin solo with piano accompaniment. Each number of the World contains over $2,00 worth of new music besides all the musical news of the day and interesting articles on music by the best writers. It is the oldest, largest and most successful musical monthly in the country; and is issued simultaneously in Cleveland, Chicago and Cincinnati, by S. Brainard's Sons, the well known music publishers, who have an extensive music house in each of the above cities. The terms are only $1.00 per year, single copies will be mailed for 15 cents. For full particulars, complete catalogues of music, &c., address S. Brainard's Sons, Cleveland, Ohio.

Commissioners' Sale of Land.

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of an order of the DeKalb circuit court, in the case of Mariah Dixon and others, against Sebastian Tustison, I, as the Commissioner in said cause, will on the premises herein described, on

Saturday, July 26th, 1879,

at about one o'clock p. m., offer for sale the following real estate to-wit:

The east fraction of the south west quarter in section fourteen, (14), in township thirty-three, (33), north of range fourteen, (14), east, (except the right of way of the Baltimore, Pittsburgh and Chicago railroad company,) also the south fraction of the north west quarter of the same section, containing one hundred and thirty and 75-100 acres more or less. For any sum not less than two-thirds of the appraised value, on the following terms, to wit: One third of the purchase in hand, and the balance in three equal annual payments, with six per cent. interest, waiving valuation laws.

The Grand Armee.

[Sung by ex-Confederate Col. W. H. Roberts, on the receipt of his appointment by Hayes as Codifier of the laws and regulation of the army of the United States.]

Not very long ago I drew my sword,
To destroy the Union my soul abhorred.
I fought so well, and I gained such fame,
That a full-fledged Colonel I soon became,
So well did I manage my Coloneloee,
That now I make the laws for the Grand Armee.

The war being ended, I tried my skill
At dishing up talk for a newspaper mill.
In the newspaper mill I showed my sense
By balancing well on the top of the fence,
The fence I bestraddled so carefulee,
That now I make the laws for the Grand Armee.

As I sat on the fence and looked abroad,
I saw a log blocking the wheels of Fraud,
Then straightway I hastened to O-hi-o,
And rolled out the log, to let the wheels go,
I rolled away the log so ingeniouslee,
That now I make the laws for the Grand Armee.

I bargained with Hayes that the solid South
Should hold its tongue and close its mouth,
And Hayes then promised to obey the law,
And the troops from the South soon to withdraw,
And both of us bargained so sagaciouslee,
That now I make the laws for the Grand Armee.

The honest people may grumble as they please
When over their heads I rise at my ease,
The reason I rise is no other than this,
That I know what to do at a great cri-sis,
I did what I knew so industriouslee,
That now I make the laws for the Grand Armee.

Ex-Confederates all, whoever you may be,
If you want to rise to the top of the tree,
Stick close to the fence, and never go abroad,
Until you can drop on the side of Fraud,
On the side of Fraud you must drop so free,
If you want to make laws for the Grand Armee.

THE CARICATURE IN POLITICS.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer makes the following comment on a recent occurrence:

"It is a funny kind of a Republic they have in France, as is evident from the following London dispatch of the 20th ult.:

'A Paris dispatch states that the editor of the Tribulet has been sentenced to six months imprisonment and 3,000 francs fine for caricaturing president Grevy, Minister Terra and Lepere and M. Gambetta.'

The arrest of an American caricaturist for lampooning a public man would be deemed a strange and dangerous event in this country."

And, yet, our own history can show a parallel. In 1798 congress passed an act known as the "Sedition Law," which provided that "if any person shall write, print, utter or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered or published, or shall knowingly and willingly assist or aid in writing, printing, uttering or publishing any false, scandalous and malicious writing or writings against the government of the United States, or either house of congress of the United States, or the president of the United States, with intent to defame the said government, or either house of said congress, or the said president, or to bring them, or either of them, into contempt or disrepute, or to excite against them, or either or any of them, the hatred of the good people of the United States." * * * * "such person being thereof convicted before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000 and by imprisonment not exceeding two years."

That was during the administration of the elder Adams, when there was a struggle between the two political parties of the country as to what should be the character of the government of the United States, whether of a monarchical or republican tendency. The party of monarchical tendency had possession of every branch of the government—legislative, executive and judiciary. A recurrence to the history of that day will show how that "Sedition Law" was construed and administered.

Matthew Lyon, a member of congress from the state of Vermont, was the first victim under the law. He wrote a letter to a Vermont paper in which he declared that with the federal executive "every consideration of the public welfare was swallowed up in a continual grasp for power, an unbounded thirst for ridiculous pomp, foolish adulation and selfish avarice." In regard to the fast day, he said that "the sacred name of religion" had been used "as a state engine to make mankind hate and persecute each other," &c. Mr. Lyon was tried before judge Patterson, of the supreme court. The jury found him guilty, and the Judge, after a severe reprimand, sentenced him to four months imprisonment and a fine of $1,000. The history of the case says that a private lottery was gotten up to raise money to pay the fine, but the proprietor of the Vermont Gazette, in which the scheme was published, was found guilty under the same law, and sentenced to pay a fine of $200 and be imprisoned two months.

Another case: Charles Holt, publisher of the Bee, printed at New London, Connecticut, was found guilty of defaming the president and discouraging enlistments in the army, and was sentenced to three months imprisonment and to pay a fine of $200.

Another: Thomas Cooper was found guilty of defaming the president, and sentenced by Judge Chase to six months imprisonment and to pay a fine of $400.

Another: James T. Callander was tried for a libel on the president under the "Sedition Law." His counsel raised the question of constitutionality of the law. Judge Chase refused to hear them on it, and treated them with the most arbitrary rudeness. They threw up their briefs and left the court. He was convicted, sentenced to pay a fine of $200 and be imprisoned nine months.

The same history tells of another case: A Mr. Baldwin, of New Jersey, was fined $100 under the following circumstances: President Adams, on his return from the seat of government, passed through Newark. Some cannon were discharged in compliment to him while passing through that place. Mr. Baldwin said he wished the wadding from the cannon had been lodged in the president's——.

There were other victims of the same law. Judge Jared Peck, a senator in the legislature of New York, had the audacity to offer to his neighbors for their signatures a petition to congress for the repeal of the Alien and Sedition Laws, in which the odions features of those laws were severely handled.

The United States District Attorney at New York had him indicted; and he was arrested in the midst of his family by an officer and put in prison.

So soon as the democrats got control of the government, with Mr. Jefferson as president, all fines and imprisonments under the "Sedition Law" which were still unsatisfied were remitted and the victims set at liberty.

Our Cleveland cotemporary will perceive that that "funny kind of a Republic" was once with us, and that fine and imprisonment for speaking disrespectfully of public men were occurrences in our own history. To repeat that now would doubtless be a dangerous experiment. But as Mr. Jefferson said, speaking of those times, twenty-five years later: "Monarchy, to be sure, is now defeated, and they wish it should be forgotten that it ever was advocated. They see that it is desperate, and treat its imputation to them as calumny, and I verily believe that none of them have it now in direct aim. Yet the spirit is not done away. The same party takes now what they deem the next best ground, the consolidation of the government—the giving to the federal members of the government, by unlimited constructions of the constitution, a control over all the functions of the states, and the concentration of all power ultimately at Washington." The present struggle between the democratic party and the modern Republican party is the old fight over—the fight of the days of Adams and Jefferson as to what shall be the character of the government of the United States, whether of a democratic or monarchical tendency, whether inclining to the strengthening of popular liberty or inclining to the concentration of all power ultimately at Washington.

"Putting the Tail Where the Head Ought to be."

[Louisville Democrat.]

It is well-known that Hendricks accepted second position to Tilden very much against his inclination and interest. He was not and had never been a candidate for vice-president. He represented the west; Tilden the east. The decision rested with the south, and was given, we think, through weakness, to the east. To make the ticket strong in a "combination," but not in a political sense, the St. Louis convention thrust the nomination for second place upon Hendricks. It was putting the tail where the head ought to be. The man with the longest and best political career was made the tool of a pool of New York politics. It can therefore be justly claimed that he made a sacrifice in fact, in feeling and ambition for the sake of his party and at its demand. The ticket thus made was elected, but failed to be inaugurated for sundry reasons. Much blame is cast by many perhaps by a majority of democrats, upon Mr. Tilden, the head of the ticket, for not encouraging the people to make a popular demonstration in behalf of their well-won control of the federal government. Such in brief is the state of circumstances under which Hendricks declines to be a tail to the Tilden kite in 1880. Is there any moral or political wrong in this determination?

Did Jefferson Write the Declaration of Independence ?

To the Editor of the Sun—Sir: Like nearly all the rest of mankind, you assume without question that Thomas Jefferson wrote the declaration of Independence. But how week is the evidence of his claim. If his life had been shortened only three years there would have been no proof whatever that he was the author of that unequalled production; for not till he had passed his eightieth year did he venture to say, "I drew it."

In the early days of the republic there were many who believed that he did not write it but for reason which will presently appear, the real author was unknown.

Six months before independence was declared an anonymous pamphlet was published, entitled "Common Sense." Its success was unprecedented. The copyright was assigned to the colonies by the aurthor, and not until several editions were issued was it accredited to Thomas Paine. In a literary point of view it was one of the finest productions in the English language. But the author was not an aspirant for literary fame: his sole aim was the achievment of American Independence.

Paine was the bosom friend of Franklin. They were both very secretive men, and Franklin, who had induced Paine to come to America, knew that he could trust him. Franklin was a member of the committee to draft a declaration. The task was assigned to Jefferson, and in a very few days it was completed.

Now this is the way I conceive it was done; Franklin handed to Jefferson a draft already prepared by Paine, and assured him that he could trust the writer never to lay claim to its authorship. What could Jefferson do but use it? It was far superior in style to anything he could produce. So with a few verbal changes he reported it, and it was adopted by the congress, after striking out several passages more eloquent than any that remain, as for instance, one about the slave trade.

The adoption of this declaration placed Jefferson in an embarrassing position Not daring to say outright that he was its author, he studiously evaded that point whenever it became necessary to allude to the subject. But at last, when Franklin had been dead thirty-three years and Paine fourteen years Jefferson ventured to claim what no one then disputed. It would never have done for him to name the real author, and who could be harmed, he doubtless thought, by taking the credit to himself? But the science of criticism, like the spectrum analysis which reveals the composition of the stars, points unerringly to Thomas Paine as the only man who could indite that greatest of all literary masterpieces, the Declaration of American Independence.

WASHINGTON, July 6. W. H. B.

Anthony Wayne's Two Graves.

There are few persons who know that the remains of Gen. Anthony Wayne, the hero of Stony Point and the north-western Indian wars, are intered in two graves—one being in his native county of Chester, in the south-east corner of Pennsylvania, and one on the shore of Lake Erie, in the north-western corner. History makes no mention of this singular fact, but it is well authenticated. The circumstances connected with it will be of peculiar interest now, as the centennial anniversary of the storming and capturing of Stony Point, one of the most important events of the revolution, it to be celebrated at the scene of "Mad Anthony's" great exploit.

In 1796 what is now the city of Erie was Fort Presque Isle. The fort was nothing more than a wooden stockade. Gen. Wayne, after his successful campaign against the Indians, returned to Presque Isle in the above year. He soon afterward died in the fort of gout. He was buried at the foot of the flag-staff. In 1815 his family obtained permission to remove the remains to Chester county. A son of Gen. Wayne's made the journey clear across the state, much of it then a dense wilderness, with a horse and gig. He had informed Dr. John C. Wallace of Presque Isle of his intention to remove the remains and requested him to disinter them and prepare them for removal. Dr. Wallace was an old Indian fighter, and had accompanied Gen. Wayne through all of the latter's campaigns. He exhumed the remains. He was surprised to find that the body had not decayed, but that the flesh had become as hard as bone, and of great weight. Knowing that it would be impossible for the son to carry the body to Chester county in that condition, Dr. Wallace determined to remove the flesh from the bones. This was done by boiling and the use of knives. The bones of Gen. Wayne were then carefully packed in convenient form, and were delivered to the son on his arrival. He was not informed of the operation that had been performed. He returned with the box to Chester county, where its contents were buried with appropriate ceremonies. A fine monument commemorative of the dead hero and his deeds, was subsequently erected at the grave. The portion of the remains removed by Dr. Wallace were placed in a coffin and returned to the grave where Gen. Wayne was buried in 1796. The lid of the coffin bore the initials of the deceased, his age, and date of his death, made by brass-headed nails. Fort Presque Isle gradually went to decay; in the course of a few years nothing remained to mark its site or that of the grave. The parties concerned in preparing the remains for removal died, and everything connected with the burial was forgotten. Four years ago an antiquarian was digging for relics around the ground where the old fort stood. Two feet below the surface he found some pieces of wood, which he removed. On one of the remnants was found the initials "A. W." in brass-headed nails. These decayed pieces of wood proved to be the remnants of the coffin in which the detached remains of Gen. Wayne had been buried. They were returned to the earth, a mound made, and the spot enclosed by a heavy iron chain hung on four posts. Last winter the citizens of the city petitioned the legislature for an appropriation to pay for the raising of a monument over this grave of Gen. Wayne. Inquiry by members of the legislature resulted in establishing the above facts. The grave in Chester county, already marked by a monument, was regarded as the real burying place of Gen. Wayne, however, and the appropriation was not made. The citizens of Erie are now moving to rear a monument on the old Fort Presque Isle grave by voluntary contribution.

Union Soldiers in the Civil War.

A statement has been issued by the war department giving the number of men furnished the Union army by each state and territory, and the District of Columbia, from April 15th, 1861, to the close of the war of the rebellion. It shows that the total number of volunteers was 2,678,967, and distributed as follows:

Maine, 72,114; New Hampshire, 366,295; Vermont, 352,662; Massachusetts, 152,048; Rhode Island, 23,699; Connecticut, 57,379; New York, 467,047; New Jersey, 81,010; Pennsylvania, 366,107; Delaware, 13, 779; Maryland, 50,316; West Virginia, 32,068; District of Columbia, 16,872; Ohio, 319,659; Indiana, 197,147; Illinois, 259,147; Michigan, 89,372; Wisconsin, 96,424; Minnesota, 25,052; Iowa, 76,309; Missouri, 109,111; Kentucky, 79,025; Kansas, 20,151; Tennessee, 31,092; Arkansas, 8,259; North Carolina, 3,156; California, 15,725; Nevada, 1,080; Oregon, 1,810; Washington Territory, 964; Nebraska Territory, 3,157; Colorado Territory, 4,903; Dakota Territory, 206; New Mexico, 6,561; Alabama, 2,576; Florida 1,290; Louisiana, 5,224; Mississippi, 545; Texas, 1,965, Indian nation, 3,503. The troops furnished by southern states were, with the exception of those of Louisiana, nearly all white. Florida furnished two regiments of cavalry. Alabama one white regiment, Mississippi one battalion, and North Carolina two regiments of cavalry.
